I was however, anything but content with some aspects of the November 5 agreement. The possibility of making legal equality between men and women subject to a provincial legal override was, to me, horrific, and I am glad the provinces have since withdrawn. The removal of section 34, now section 35, removing the recognition of the rights of aboriginal peoples and removing the definition of aboriginal peoples as Indians, Inuit and Métis, was a nightmare disappointment, with the gravest potential for harm to Canada. Fortunately, the reaction of the Canadian people caused the provinces to withdraw, and the essence of this section is restored.

The result of all these constitutional events is a sufficient document for now.

Senator Flynn: No tears for Quebec?

Senator Austin: Real gains have been made for Canada, but many areas remain as causes for concern in the immediate future. Foremost among these areas of constitutional concern, which must be addressed immediately following patriation, is that of the divisiveness which exists in Quebec. It is a matter of the greatest regret for the Government of Canada that it was not possible for the provincial government in Quebec to accept the Accord of November 5. Perhaps it might have been possible to have an agreement. The Victoria formula giving Quebec a veto, together with the deadlock-breaking mechanism of the referendum, which Prime Minister Trudeau and Premier Lévesque seemed to agree upon, might have been the route, but the premiers of the western provinces, and some in the Atlantic region, would not have it.

Senator Asselin spoke eloquently earlier in this debate but, with respect, he had blame pointed in the wrong direction. It was not the Prime Minister of Canada who denied this solution, but the premiers of Alberta, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, who belong to the same political party as he does. It was Senator Asselin who supported his leader, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, in his not only those that there be no change in the Constitution without the agreement of a substantial number of the provinces. Thus, the Progressive Conservative Party helped greatly in bringing about this result in Quebec.

We have seen deep divisions emerge over the years of this century among the French-speaking people in connection with the role which has been cast for them. With the advent of Premier Lesage and the Liberal government of Quebec, the quiet revolution was seen to begin, but it had been under way long before that moment in the processes of Quebec—processes which gave rise to the emergence of a political party in that province, the Parti Québécois, seeking a not only those of independence from Canada for the people of that province.

Senator Asselin: What about Ryan?

Senator Austin: The members of the Parti Québécois were not daunted, and are still not daunted, in their quest to destroy this beautiful country of ours. They mean to succeed, and they will try again; but no Canadian will forget the dangers of separatism to the well-being of us all. I am glad, at least, that the Parti Québécois in its convention of this past weekend has made it clear to all Canadians, and to Canadians of French and English origin and other origins in Quebec, where it stands on the subject of Canada. It is a party for independence; it is a party for destroying this country, and I warn all who give any sympathy to it, or any encouragement to it, or who collaborate with it, that it will destroy this beautiful country, and it will destroy the well-being of the Quebec community as well as the rest of the country.

It is a pity that Quebec separatists fail to understand that if they could achieve what they wish to achieve, they would be acting against their own real interests in every possible way.

We have seen, over a period of Quebec history, a struggle by the Quebec community to define the best way by which the cultural and linguistic survival and the progress of its people can be maintained. The idea of total independence on the North American continent has had its advocates, but what would be the result of independence? There would be a French-speaking island of juridical sovereignty, but de facto dependence on the English-speaking population of the North American continent. There would be a French-speaking island with a population of 6 million on an English-speaking continent with a population of 250 million.

Think of the struggle necessary to maintain the French language and culture with the attractions and the competitive nature of the English-speaking society. Think of the pressures of the North American melting pot upon Quebec with regard to the protection of its culture and its language. The laws of Quebec would become harsher; its employment preferences would become harsher; the mobility of the French-speaking people would be severely limited and trade with the rest of the continent would be conducted in the language of its commerce—English.

The genius of French-speaking leaders such as Lafontaine, Cartier, Laurier, Ernest Lapointe, Louis St. Laurent, and Pierre Elliott Trudeau has been in the recognition that the struggle for the survival and positive well-being of the French-speaking people of Quebec requires the support and the acceptance of a portion of the English-speaking community on the North American continent. That portion of which I speak is the English-speaking community of Canada. It is a community that, under our leadership since the time of Confederation, has been continuously growing more fair, that has recognized that if there are 24 million Canadians standing together for a Canadian reality in North America, which reality includes that of the French-speaking community, then indeed that community can prosper and thrive within a total Canadian context. It is in this way that Quebec is not isolated or alone; it is a partner—a vital partner—in a national experiment.

Historically speaking, we have recognized that the modern Canadian nation was founded by two peoples, the French-speaking and the English-speaking, and added to by peoples of many lands, including the original peoples of this country. In the family of nations, Canada is a land with a noble purpose. There are many nations made up of a people with a single historical experience and a single language. It is easier for those nations to feel themselves as having a common purpose in a common place. Canada is not that kind of land. We are a nation made up of people from all parts of the world. It is our opportunity to provide one of the noblest sentiments of human civilization. As Isaiah said, "The lion and the lamb will lie down together and the people of the world will make war no more." It is to our national credit that peoples from many parts of the world can come together, bringing the strength of their countries and the contributions of their various national experiences, to make out of Canada an example of a creative yet tranquil nation, one which is tolerant of diversities but which has an identity clearly its own, demonstrating for the whole world that the family of man can live together in such a way that strengthens the human experience.

Honourable senators, there are still many items of constitutional work which must be done in order to address the issues in Quebec. These issues must be addressed by this government in an expeditious manner. However, will the PQ seek a solution in Canada? This past weekend it was clear that it would not. Perhaps Premier Lévesque will follow his party and perhaps he will not. Clearly, though, the struggle for the minds and passions of the people of Quebec will continue.

We are trying to build a national family in Canada which is based on a society of tolerance and respect for differences. That society draws its sustenance from the strength brought to this country by many diverse people. The Charter of Rights has, as its golden purpose, the establishment for all Canadians of a basic code of citizens' rights based on the simple foundation, as far as human skill can achieve it, of equality for each Canadian in terms of rights and freedoms. Section 15 is as simple as it is noble in its declaration of this principle. Honourable senators, I quote:

Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

● (2325)

No nation which aspires to greatness can declare otherwise; no nation which aspires to greatness can practise otherwise. At this time, as we debate and, I hope, carry this Resolution, we declare our purposes. But none of us should be deceived that the hard work of putting into practice what we preach and aspire to remains ahead.

[Senator Austin.]

The human mind is not easily disabused of its learned or taught lessons. Discrimination of various kinds, for various reasons, has been practised throughout history. I suppose, biologically, we are built to survive and in our defensive system to fear the unknown, to reject that which has not been tested and found true and to identify as hostile that which is not similar to ourselves. The ascent of man, as Professor Bronowski demonstrated over and over again, was based on his capacity to overcome his primordial system by the introduction of an intellect based on a common need to come to terms with his fellow man and to gain the strength of sharing the human experience and the human condition. All these historical fears have been expressed in many ways in our Canadian society against our minorities, and I use that term to define groups in society who are discriminated against for some common reason and who are located remote from the sources of societal power.

The minorities I am talking about have not been able to acquire political proximity to the great national decisions which affect their destinies. Historically, the definition of minorities has been based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour or religious status, sex or cultural identity. Those are some of the words used in section 15.

In recent times we have identified the existence of new minority configurations, such as new immigrant communities in our older society, or by age. As Senator Croll and his committee, as well as many other Canadians, have demonstrated to us, our senior citizens are a distinct minority group; but I must admit that they, as a group, are closing their distance to political power by becoming self-aware and militant on behalf of their interests.

Gender is a new minority definition, although it is one of the oldest historical areas of discrimination. The social revolution which has given rise to the search for equality of gender in our society is perhaps as old as this century alone, although earlier in Britain and elsewhere there were active groups.

The Senate itself played a significant role in identifying the depth of discrimination against women. All of us are aware of the famous "persons" case in which five now quite revered women, then not so appreciated, pressed the issue as to whether women were entitled to be members of the Senate, only to discover, by judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, that they were not "persons" under Canadian law and were therefore not entitled to that position. The decision was not right. It was reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and, as a result, Prime Minister Mackenzie King was able to appoint the first woman senator in 1935. That is history within the memory of most of us in this chamber.

In spite of dramatic changes in the political clout of women in our society, they are still, as a class, disadvantaged members of patriarchal societies the world over. Although not discriminated against to such a high degree in Canada as in most societies, nonetheless they are still disadvantaged here. They are, however, learning clearly how to wield political power in Canada. I want to say that a considerable amount of the original credit for that goes to our own Senator Bird and her work as chairperson of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: The physically handicapped have recently bound themselves together as an interest group in recognizing their minority status within the general community. They are gradually becoming able to influence political systems on behalf of their needs. I was particularly proud of the all-party group headed by David Smith, M.P., which prepared the report that became generally available at the end of last year and played a significant role in providing for the special concerns of the physically handicapped in our Constitution.

Section 15 also identifies people with mental disabilities as a minority group to be protected, and those people have special handicaps. I spent one year as Treasurer for the World Federation for Mental Health and learned something of that matter. The mentally ill, above other minorities, have a far greater handicap in speaking for themselves and in caring for themselves. There is a special need for assistance to care for them and to do things on their behalf.

I want to speak for a moment on section 15(2), which provides for the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or minorities. Consistent with the definition of a minority people remote from political and financial power are the conditions of financial weakness or, to give it a clearer label, "poverty"—poverty in education, in undertraining and underemployment. These conditions exclude too many in Canadian society from full participation in the mainstream of political and economic activity in Canada.

I refer again to Senator Croll's work in the Senate and his famous Senate Report on Poverty which helped to identify many of the causes of poverty and to indicate the directions which our policies should pursue. With 20 per cent of Canadians living at or below the poverty line, it is no great credit to us as a nation. I am not suggesting that the Constitution will provide instant relief or find early remedies to these concerns. I do believe that it sets the framework for equity. It establishes in the Constitution rights which bring the minorities about whom I am speaking tonight closer to political power, political awareness and a share in the political process. If they are denied their rights through political action, then they are entitled to the protection of our legal system once we have a Charter of Rights.

The salient feature of being a member of a disadvantaged minority is that the individual is placed in the situation of being disadvantaged through no fault of his or her own. Discrimination, prejudice and exclusion from power are suffered because one happens to belong to a socially disadvantaged group. We can do little worse to our fellow Canadians than to visit on them the experience of dehumanization—that is, being a person less than the rest by reason of their identification with a discriminated-against minority. That is an individual and social tragedy from which all Canadians must, through this new Constitution, be allowed to escape.

A third area in the forefront of national concern demanding immediate attention from the Government of Canada and the provincial governments is that of aboriginal rights. As a western Canadian from British Columbia, I have been deeply exposed to the social, economic and political disadvantages which our Indian and Métis communities have experienced. I have been in remote communities in British Columbia and Alberta, in the Yukon and Northwest Territories in the 1950s and 1960s, and I have seen more than I want to see of the tragedies of the Indian and Métis community life. I have also seen much of the nobility of those communities and its members, but that nobility struggled and struggles still against incredible forces to express itself.

In 1963 I began a two-and-a-half year experience as executive assistant to the Honourable Arthur Laing, the then Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Through my experience in that department, I became close to the Inuit communities and their peoples, as well as to the many other native peoples north of 60. Honourable senators, Canada cannot be a caring, equitable and tolerant society and not address itself to the rights and problems of the aboriginal peoples. Canadians have done a great deal in the last 20 years to address those issues and we have had the co-operation of many communities, native and non-native. Housing, health and education have improved. The people of Canada are funding the study by natives of their rights and history. The claims settlement process is underway, but it is only a beginning to redress wrongs which have continued for too long.

I spoke about the dehumanization which membership in some minorities creates. In many ways this has been the experience of our native communities in their contact with the aggressive, competitive and adversarial European-originated society. That is why it is so important, not only to the aboriginal people but also to all Canadians, that the idea of their having rights be clearly established as part of their entitlement as Canadians—that is, to give them the status in our Constitution and amongst Canadian citizens of equality as a community with all the other communities of our country and to begin from that fair base what will no doubt be a difficult and painful negotiation to establish specific terms of agreement between them and the greater Canadian society. I am not frightened of that process or of the pain of it, because it represents over time the reconciliation of old and difficult grievances, and the alternative would be unthinkable.

The aboriginal community had referred to it three clauses of the resolution which is now before us. Section 25 meets the request of the various organizations of the aboriginal peoples, to ensure that nothing in this Resolution can abrogate or derogate further rights they have secured to this time, whether by way of royal proclamation, land settlement or other legal means.

● (2335)

Section 35 constitutes a historic recommendation of equality of constitutional standing of the aboriginal peoples with other communities in Canada. It reads:

(1) The existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.

(2) In this Act, "aboriginal peoples of Canada" includes the Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada.

I said, when the terms of the Executive Agreement on November 5 between the Government of Canada and nine of the provinces of Canada became known, that I grieved for the absence of section 35. I considered it a social, political and legal tragedy that Canadian society, particularly as expressed through the political actions of those provinces, had not matured to the point that this historical acknowledgement could be achieved.

I want to express my delight at being wrong on the assessment of the maturity of Canadian society. For, indeed, public opinion in Canada, which had expressed itself through opinion polls as favouring the Charter of Rights, including section 35, fell like a battering ram on the provinces, and they gave way.

The word "existing" has been added to the text of section 35 as it was originally drafted by the joint committee. This was at the insistence of one and possibly two of the provinces. It certainly is not a meaningful word when we look at the political process of addressing this nation to the negotiations to a more specific meaning of aboriginal rights.

I am not certain whether it has any significance for the judicial process should the courts be a place for the pursuit by the aboriginal people of their remedies. Perhaps it will have some meaning in that respect, but I must say that I would rather have section 35 in the joint resolution included as is, rather than not have it at all.

I referred to the political process and that matter is raised in the third section which is contained in the joint resolution affecting the aboriginal peoples. I am referring to section 37 which provides for the holding of a constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister and the first ministers to be convened within a year of Part IV coming into force. Under the provisions of section 37, the rights of the aboriginal people to be included under the Constitution of Canada shall be the subject of that conference, and the Prime Minister shall invite representatives of the aboriginal people to participate in those discussions.

For me, that is a political watershed in the lives of the aboriginal people of Canada. To this point, they were obliged to struggle, to obtain rights to which they were entitled as minorities. The Nishga tribe in my own province, who occupied lands in the Nass River valley since time immemorial, lost a case before the Supreme Court of Canada to establish their aboriginal rights to that land.

Now this Parliament has the opportunity of redressing their claim in the Constitution and to provide a legal basis for it. But, more important for all the aboriginal peoples, there will be the entitlement to the political process to negotiate with the political leadership of Canada, problem by problem, issue by issue, and place by place. It is a remedy that Canadians have suppressed and, for the many other reasons I have expressed today, it makes me especially proud to be a Canadian because I believe that we are all, collectively, now expressing our own desire, through this Constitution, to be an exemplary people in the family of nations—exemplary in tolerance, in economic equity, in social fairness, and in the democratic sharing of power with all our people.

Honourable senators, there is a fourth area of urgent concern which must engage us in the immediate future. I want to speak for a few moments about the historic impact of this resolution on the nature and role of the Senate of Canada. By virtue of section 47, the Senate will no longer hold an absolute veto over amendments to the Canadian Constitution. Our legal entitlement will be to a suspensive veto, meaning that we will be able to delay constitutional amendments for 180 sitting days of Parliament after we have received constitutional amendments from the House of Commons. This is a measure which could lead, and I think it likely that it will do so, to the evolution at some future time of the Upper Chamber. I spoke at some length on the subject of Senate reform on December 14, 1978, and there is much in that address which I should like to incorporate by reference in today's remarks.

Suffice it to say that I cannot imagine a nation so large, so diverse and so regionally separated without the regional role and representation of an Upper Chamber. We have had all too much experience with the sometimes unbalancing of affairs and inequitable dictation of interest that comes from the House of Commons which is substantially representative of one part of our nation by virtue of population distribution. A compensating equity can only be served by a second chamber whose interests are directed to allowing a larger role to the regions of Canada with smaller populations.

I say all this in spite of some rather dramatic constitutional changes that we have seen in the last three or four years as a result of Bill C-60 and the work of the joint committee examining that bill. The then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Otto Lang—

Senator Flynn: It was Marc Lalonde.

Senator Austin: —made a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada which, in time, advised that the provinces had a role to play in any amendments affecting the nature and jurisdiction of the Senate of Canada. This was followed by the Supreme Court of Canada's decision of September 28 last that the provinces, by constitutional convention, had a role to play in amendments to the Canadian Constitution.

• (2340)

They played their role in the intervening period to November 5 to make, as the Supreme Court of Canada said, an arrangement under which some of the power that might have been exercised in the Senate for regional balance in the area of a constitutional change would now be exercised by the provinces directly through the amending formula. If we have not been superseded in constitutional matters, we have certainly been moved off to some degree, and while for this last moment we would legally and constitutionally deny our consent, I think there is no one here who would suggest or advocate that in the evolution of the Canadian nation that would be an appropriate step, or that we would have any political mandate from whatever part of Canada to do so.

The historic truth is that the power of the Senate to represent regional interests, consented to be the founding provinces in 1867, although legislated by Great Britain, has been in part returned to them in the arrangement of constitutional change which is before us. The provinces have a role today perhaps not envisaged by the Fathers of Confederation, but they have it.

The Senate retains, however, within that very great area of law-making which does not relate to the Constitution, still a powerful legislative capacity charged with representation of all of the parts of Canada and all of the communities and minorities of Canada to look after their interest in the federal law-making system.

Honourable senators, we shall have to focus in the next few years on the nature of our institution, its role, its membership and its procedures in order to ensure that the responsibilities which remain, and which undoubtedly will grow, are properly discharged for the well-being of Canadians everywhere.

In my speech of December 14, 1978, I spoke in this chamber about reform of the Senate based on proportional election. I argued then, and still do, that the credibility of a second chamber will depend on some mandate directly conferred by the people of Canada.

We must also take into our earliest consideration the emergence of western Canada as a part of Canada with growing economic power. This new relevance to carrying a larger part of the national economy brings with it, in my opinion, entitlement to a larger representation for western Canada in the Senate. This must be dealt with as a priority in the next round of constitutional change if this national Parliament is to deal with the issue of western alienation.

Honourable senators, you will be pleased to know that I have come to the end of my remarks. At this moment I feel deeply about our Charter and what we have achieved in the way of social reform in this country. One could not have been a member of the Special Joint Committee and not felt deeply, after hearing briefs from the public, that this constitutional change is a vital change and is in the interests of all of the people of Canada.

One last time I wish to say how much I regret that there remains divisiveness in some quarters of Quebec, but I rest my confidence on the judgment—

Senator Asselin: It is not our fault.

Senator Austin: —of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliot Trudeau, and his 73 colleagues from the province of Quebec and their advice that this is, indeed, an historic moment and a moment to move forward for Quebec, as well as all of Canada. I trust that advice.

I give my admiration to the Prime Minister for the decisive way in which he has acted on behalf of all of Canada. I give my appreciation to the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, for accepting this measure, even at this moment, and to the Leader of the New Democratic Party as well.

I also wish to acknowledge the work of the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, which was exemplary in bringing us to this time, and the work of all members of the House of Commons and all members of this chamber.

Honourable senators, I hope that when the time to vote comes we will consider our consciences, our nation, and the needs of the people of our nation, and act according to those needs.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

● (2345)

In referring to section 47 in the resolution before us, he used the expression "180 sitting days." Bearing in mind that the section provides for a suspensive period of 180 days, and that the only period that does not count in computing the 180 days is the period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved, the number of sitting days required to meet the conditions of that section could be as small as two. Does the minister agree with that?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I will look at Senator McIlraith's question in the Debates of the Senate tomorrow, and speak with him about the matter.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I should like to advise you that there remain about 20 more senators who wish to speak, and that it means that, first, I think we have to accept the suggestion of Senator Flynn that we might sit through the luncheon period tomorrow because doing so would give us about six-and-a-half hours. If we keep up the present average of approximately 25 to 30 minutes for each speaker, we would not finish when we hope to. That, in turn, leads to the suggestion that perhaps honourable senators will remember the care and eloquence with which their predecessors have addressed this important resolution, and keep in mind that we are hoping to have Senator Flynn begin at about 3.15 tomorrow afternoon, thereby giving Senator Perrault approximately half an hour to close the debate. I mention that in order that those 20 senators who will be speaking tomorrow—and we all look forward eagerly to hearing their speeches—will keep in mind that it would be helpful if their speeches could be kept perhaps to less than half an hour each. I will leave it at that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have another suggestion. If it is not possible to hear those 20 senators between 10.30 a.m. to 5 o'clock in the afternoon, could we not postpone the debate to Wednesday?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, rather than do that, I should like to ask the deputy leader to remove my name from the list. I will abstain from speaking in order to shorten the debate.

Senator Flynn: With the sense of humour which characterizes Senator Guay, I drop my suggestion.

Senator Frith: I must say that choosing between the "Guay formula", namely the cancellation of speeches, and the "Flynn formula", namely, going on until Wednesday, I would have to vote for the "Guay formula" by a hair.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, has the Deputy Leader of the Government consulted with Mrs. Thatcher in the event we have to go on until Wednesday?

Senator Frith: No, I have not.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Will you do it tonight, please?
The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10.30 a.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 8, 1981

The Senate met at 10.30 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Canadian Dairy Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the years ended July 31, 1979 and July 31, 1980, pursuant to section 22 of the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, Chapter C-7, R.S.C., 1970.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 3429.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 9th December, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1035)

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to make one comment about this motion. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture had arranged a series of hearings, one of which was to be held in Guelph. That hearing was cancelled and arrangements were made for the witnesses to come to Ottawa. For that reason, it is felt that the permission of the Senate should be granted.

I use the occasion to ask that, in future, committee chairmen ask for an opinion as to whether they should sit, or present a motion that they should sit, while the Senate is sitting, before rather than after they arrange for the appearances of witnesses. It is difficult to find any room for priorities or to reschedule committee meetings if witnesses are already travelling from various parts of the country to attend a meeting, permission for which has not been sought prior to the arrangement for their attendance.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—POSSIBLE ACCEPTANCE OF SENATE AMENDMENTS BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government regarding the debate that is to be resumed shortly on the constitutional resolution. Can the Leader of the Government inform us whether at this supreme moment, the government, that supreme authority, agrees to have the Senate adopt the main amendments that were proposed, which are likely to meet the objections not only of the Government of Quebec but of the vast majority of the Quebec National Assembly, particularly where they concern fiscal compensation in the case of opting out by a province or transfer of authority?

[English]

● (1040)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to undertake that kind of commitment.

Senator Flynn: When you say you are not in a position to undertake that kind of commitment, do you mean that you will not inquire or that you do not know? I am simply asking whether there is any possibility that the government will become more flexible and, seeing the danger that lies ahead, change its position.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is aware, of course, that these options have been known to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the government for some considerable period of time. The Leader of the Opposition is not bringing us new tidings of some portent or of an innovative nature. These possibilities have always been there and the government has been quite aware of them.

Senator Flynn: When you speak of possibilities, is there any possibility that the government will, today, accept either of the amendments I have mentioned? Yesterday the Prime Minister said "No" to the Leader of the Opposition in the other place when he made his request, and that was despite the fact that Mr. Chrétien had over the weekend mentioned that the matter was still open to negotiation.

I am not speaking of concessions that would require the agreement of Quebec on the whole matter, but of concessions that would simply meet with the wishes of the majority of Quebecers and the wishes of the large majority of the National Assembly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated earlier, I cannot give a commitment that the government will support such amendments. I will be in communication with Mr. Chrétien later this day and with the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. But honourable senators are aware, I think, that these requests have been received from the Government of Quebec. They have been widely publicized. They really do not constitute anything new. I am not in a position to give any such commitment at the present time, and the government does not contemplate supporting such amendments at this time.

Senator Flynn: Well, that is a little clearer now and it leads me to ask what the Leader of the Government meant a few minutes ago when he suggested he might inquire. Does the leader agree to inquire? If he does inquire, will he inform the Senate as soon as possible, because if any concession were to be made with respect to the two areas I have mentioned it could have a profound effect on the course of the debate in the Senate. It would affect the views held by senators on all sides of the house. If the Leader of the Government tells me that there will be no deal, no concession at all, then we on this side will act accordingly; but, if there is any hope, we might reconsider the position we have taken and intend to take.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated earlier, I can see no possibility at this time of acceptance, of the type of amendments that have been requested by certain political spokesmen for the Province of Quebec. However, the Prime Minister has stated on many occasions that this is merely the beginning of the constitutional reform process; that other meetings will be held this year and there is the possibility of change down the road.

● (1045)

The honourable senator is aware of the process which has brought this measure to the Senate for debate. He is aware of the support accorded the constitutional proposals by the leader of his party in the other place, the national Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

I can say that the government is always sympathetic to the aspirations of people, wherever they live in this country or whatever their province.

Senator Flynn: Except Quebec.

Senator Perrault: However, it is not feasible for the government to accept amendments of this kind at the present time. When I stated that I would be in contact with the office of the Minister of Justice and the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, of course, we have been in continuing communication with both of those offices with respect to the speeches made by various senators, because the opinions of the senators are held in high regard by both those offices.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I can only interpret the reply of the Leader of the Government to be "No".

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I would do so.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: That is answering your own question.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has never learned how to give a straight answer.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret very much that on this rather historic day for the Senate and the nation—

Senator Flynn: A day of mourning for many.

Senator Perrault: —such bitter remarks should come from the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Bitter?

Senator Perrault: We are all interested in the expanded views of the honourable senator, which, I am sure, he will outline in his speech this afternoon, and we will all be in our places.

PRESENTATION OF AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—POSSIBILITY OF LEADER OF GOVERNMENT IN SENATE
ACCOMPANYING MINISTER OF JUSTICE TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, considering what the Leader of the Government has just said, namely, that it is quite possible no amendments will be approved by the government when a vote is taken later this afternoon; considering that, given the majority on the other side of this chamber, the resolution will be adopted by the Senate; considering that it has been heavily publicized that the document will be presented to the Queen by the Honourable Mr. Chrétien, Minister of Justice, representing the government and the House of Commons; and considering that there are still two chambers in Canada and that the Senate will have voted on the resolution, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate accompany Mr. Chrétien to present the document to Her Majesty the Queen?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Senate has yet to make its decision on these proposals. It would be highly out of order to discuss travel plans for anyone until the Senate has spoken. Insofar as the position of the government is concerned, I have heard truncated news reports that it is expected that the majority of the Senate may well support this constitutional proposal, but the vote will be taken at 5 o'clock this afternoon and the senators will decide for themselves at that time.

Senator Asselin: Don't tell me that you are not already aware of the result.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The Leader of the Government says that it would be improper to discuss travel plans. Is it proper to have a celebration at Rideau Hall pre-arranged?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is a rhetorical question.

Senator Perrault: That, of course, is a rhetorical question. Certainly, if the Senate supports these proposals this afternoon, I would think that it would be very appropriate to have some sort of observance at Rideau Hall. I hope that the Honourable Senator Flynn will be in the group that makes that historic journey, and I shall do my best to find a place for him.

Senator Flynn: If you think that I will go to that place, you are wrong.

COMMITTEE FOR ORIGINAL PEOPLES' ENTITLEMENT

NEGOTIATION OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State. It has to do with Senator Steuart who, I understand, has been travelling in the north with the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement and becoming involved in the negotiation of land claims. Would the honourable senator inform me of the progress of those negotiations?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I have not had the opportunity to be briefed by Senator Steuart, so I cannot give an up-to-date report on the status of the COPE discussions. I will seek that information as quickly as I can, perhaps today, and speak with the honourable senator after lunch.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Will the minister inform us as to whether Senator Steuart will be here for the vote, especially on the amendment moved by Senator Walker?

Senator Austin: I am not aware of Senator Steuart's whereabouts.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to 10 provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

A respectful address be presented to Her 15 Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, 20 respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth:

que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la 10 Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications, il est proposé que soit présentée respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont 15 la teneur suit :

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,
Très Gracieuse Souveraine :

Nous, membres du Sénat du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, 20 demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu :

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Loi donnant suite à une demande du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

2. No Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.

4. This Act may be cited as the Canada Act.

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :

qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin, sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

1. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1981, énoncée à l'annexe B, est édictée pour le Canada et y a force de loi. Elle entre en vigueur conformément à ses dispositions.

2. Les lois adoptées par le Parlement du Royaume-Uni après l'entrée en vigueur de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1981 ne font pas partie du droit du Canada.

3. La partie de la version française de la présente loi qui figure à l'annexe A a force de loi au Canada au même titre que la version anglaise correspondante.

4. Titre abrégé de la présente loi : Loi sur le Canada.

PROCEDURE FOR AMENDING CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

General
procedure for amending Constitution of Canada

38. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

- (a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and
- (b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces

PROCÉDURE DE MODIFICATION DE LA CONSTITUTION DU CANADA

38. (1) La Constitution du Canada peut être modifiée par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée à la fois :

- a) par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes;
- b) par des résolutions des assemblées législatives d'au moins deux tiers des provinces dont la population confondue repréthat have, in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

Majority of members

(2) An amendment made under subsection (1) that derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a majority of the members of each of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies required under subsection (1).

Expression of dissent

(3) An amendment referred to in subsection (2) shall not have effect in a province the legislative assembly of which has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of its members prior to the issue of the proclamation to which the amendment relates unless that legislative assembly, subsequently, by resolution supported by a majority of its members, revokes its dissent and authorizes the amendment.

Revocation of dissent

(4) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of subsection (3) may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of the proclamation to which it relates.

Restriction on proclamation

39. (1) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) before the expiration of one year from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder, unless the legislative assembly of each province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

Idem

(2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

Compensation

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers provincial legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

Amendment by unanimous consent

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters

sente, selon le recensement général le plus récent à l'époque, au moins cinquante pour cent de la population de toutes les provinces.

(2) Une modification faite conformément au paragraphe (1) mais dérogoire à la compétence législative, aux droits de propriété ou à tous autres droits ou privilèges d'une législature ou d'un gouvernement provincial exige une résolution adoptée à la majorité des sénateurs, des députés fédéraux et des députés de chacune des assemblées législatives du nombre requis de provinces.

Majorité simple

(3) La modification visée au paragraphe (2) est sans effet dans une province dont l'assemblée législative a, avant la prise de la proclamation, exprimé son désaccord par une résolution adoptée à la majorité des députés, sauf si cette assemblée, par résolution également adoptée à la majorité, revient sur son désaccord et autorise la modification.

Désaccord

(4) La résolution de désaccord visée au paragraphe (3) peut être révoquée à tout moment, indépendamment de la date de la proclamation à laquelle elle se rapporte.

Levée du désaccord

39. (1) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise dans l'année suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification que si l'assemblée législative de chaque province a préalablement adopté une résolution d'agrément ou de désaccord.

Restriction

(2) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise que dans les trois ans suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification.

Idem

40. Le Canada fournit une juste compensation aux provinces auxquelles ne s'applique pas une modification faite conformément au paragraphe 38(1) et relative, en matière d'éducation ou dans d'autres domaines culturels, à un transfert de compétences législatives provinciales au Parlement.

Compensation

41. Toute modification de la Constitution du Canada portant sur les questions suivantes

may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

- (a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;
- (b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

50. The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

"Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy"

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

- (a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;
- (b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and
- (c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

tions prévues par cette partie pour une modification par proclamation.

49. Dans les quinze ans suivant l'entrée en vigueur de la présente partie, le premier ministre du Canada convoque une conférence constitutionnelle réunissant les premiers ministres provinciaux et lui-même, en vue du réexamen des dispositions de cette partie.

PARTIE VI

MODIFICATION DE LA LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1867

50. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867) est modifiée par insertion, après l'article 92, de la rubrique et de l'article suivants :

«Ressources naturelles non renouvelables, ressources forestières et énergie électrique

92A. (1) La législature de chaque province a compétence exclusive pour légiférer dans les domaines suivants :

- a) prospection des ressources naturelles non renouvelables de la province;
- b) exploitation, conservation et gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, y compris leur rythme de production primaire;
- c) aménagement, conservation et gestion des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique.

(2) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour légiférer en ce qui concerne l'exportation, hors de la province, à destination d'une autre partie du Canada, de la production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production d'énergie électrique de la province, sous réserve de ne pas adopter de lois autorisant ou prévoyant des disparités de prix ou des disparités dans les exportations destinées à une autre partie du Canada.

Parliament

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) derogates from the authority of Parliament to enact laws in relation to the matters referred to in that subsection and, where such a law of Parliament and a law of a province conflict, the law of Parliament prevails to the extent of the conflict. 5

(4) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation in respect of 10

(a) non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the primary production therefrom, and 15

(b) sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy and the production therefrom, whether or not such production is exported in whole or in part from the province, but such laws may not authorize or provide for taxation that differentiates between production exported to another part of Canada and production not exported from the province. 25

production"

(5) The expression "primary production" has the meaning assigned by the Sixth Schedule.

Existing powers or rights

(6) Nothing in subsections (1) to (5) derogates from any powers or rights that a legislature or government of a province had immediately before the coming into force of this section." 30

Idem

51. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following Schedule:

"THE SIXTH SCHEDULE

Primary Production from Non-Renewable Natural Resources and Forestry Resources

1. For the purposes of section 92A of this Act,

Parlement

(4) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour prélever des sommes d'argent par tout mode ou système de taxation : 10

a) des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production primaire qui en est tirée; 15

b) des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique, ainsi que de cette production même.

Cette compétence peut s'exercer indépendamment du fait que la production en cause soit ou non, en totalité ou en partie, exportée hors de la province, mais les lois adoptées dans ces domaines ne peuvent autoriser ou prévoir une taxation qui établisse une distinction entre la production exportée à destination d'une autre partie du Canada et la production non exportée hors de la province. 20

(5) L'expression «production primaire» a le sens qui lui est donné dans la sixième annexe. 30

droits existants

51. Ladite loi est en outre modifiée par adjonction de l'annexe suivante :

Idem

«SIXIÈME ANNEXE

Production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières

1. Pour l'application de l'article 92A : 40

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or 5

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, 10 refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is 15 primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood." 20

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction 5 du milieu naturel,

(ii) soit le produit non manufacturé de la transformation, du raffinage ou de l'affinage d'une ressource, à l'exception du produit du raffinage du pétrole brut, 10 du raffinage du pétrole brut lourd amélioré, du raffinage des gaz ou des liquides dérivés du charbon ou du raffinage d'un équivalent synthétique du pétrole brut; 15

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de 20 bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

PART VII

GENERAL

52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect. 25

(2) The Constitution of Canada includes
(a) the Canada Act, including this Act;
(b) the Acts and orders referred to in Schedule I; and
(c) any amendment to any Act or order 30 referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

(3) Amendments to the Constitution of Canada shall be made only in accordance with the authority contained in the Constitution of Canada. 35

53. (1) The enactments referred to in Column I of Schedule I are hereby repealed or amended to the extent indicated in Column II thereof and, unless repealed, shall continue as law in Canada under the names 40 set out in Column III thereof.

PARTIE VII

DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES

52. (1) La Constitution du Canada est la loi suprême du Canada; elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de toute autre 25 règle de droit.

(2) La Constitution du Canada comprend :
a) la Loi sur le Canada, y compris la présente loi;
b) les textes législatifs et les décrets figurant à l'annexe I;
c) les modifications des textes législatifs et des décrets mentionnés aux alinéas a) ou b).

(3) La Constitution du Canada ne peut 35 être modifiée que conformément aux pouvoirs conférés par elle.

53. (1) Les textes législatifs et les décrets énumérés à la colonne I de l'annexe I sont abrogés ou modifiés dans la mesure indiquée 40 à la colonne II. Sauf abrogation, ils restent en vigueur en tant que lois du Canada sous les titres mentionnés à la colonne III.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 is the result of over a year of bitter and acrimonious bargaining between the federal government and the provinces. Finally, after much manipulation behind the scenes, the first ministers, with the exception of the Premier of Quebec, reached the Accord of November 5, reflecting the tradition of compromise and consensus, often referred to as the "Canadian way."

In this respect, this is a unique method of constitution-making, even though Parliament is involved. Most modern states of the world have drafted their constitutions at constituent assemblies or constitutional conventions which, through elections, represented the will of the people. In the debate, the political leaders in Canada showed that they were more concerned with power than the general good of the people. Hopefully, this document of law will be the end of a beginning and not the beginning of the end, as Winston Churchill once stated in a different context.

Since my speeches in this constitutional debate on November 3 last year and on March 26 this year, several improvements have been made. I am particularly happy that the new constitutional document includes equal rights for women, for which I introduced an amendment in the Senate; aboriginal and treaty rights of native peoples; and the recognition of multiculturalism. Welcoming the inclusion of these rights in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the women, the natives and the ethnic groups of non-Anglo-Celtic and non-French origins complained that their rights were not adequately defined and had little clout in their implementation.

Let us examine the place in the Constitution for the "other Canadians," those who are neither Anglo-Celtic nor French, who constitute nearly one-third of the population and who are almost as numerous as the French Canadians. They have been in this country for many generations and have contributed significantly to the economic, social and political life of our country. The main reference to them is found in section 27 which states:

This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

That is a very broad and general statement. What does it really mean and how can it be enforced? It is merely a recognition of the fact that Canada is a pluralistic society, composed of many ethno-cultural groups, whose cultural heritages are valuable enough to be preserved, perpetuated and developed for all Canadians to share—a motherhood principle. There is no provision for the ways and means of preserving and enhancing this multicultural heritage, and no provision preventing provinces from opting out of this section.

Of course, it will be stated that, if the ethno-cultural groups have a reasonable grievance, they can now make their case in the courts. We all know how costly this procedure would be, making it virtually impossible for the smaller and weaker minorities to get justice. Even if, after great cost, effort and time, a case reached the Supreme Court, we all know that legal interpretations can twist decisions, with inconclusive results. Therefore, this protection of the rights of these minorities is, in reality, meaningless.

There is another reference in this Constitution to these minorities. Section 22 states:

Nothing in sections 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the coming into force of this Charter with respect to any language that is not English or French.

This sounds reasonable, but let us now look at subsection 16(3) which states:

Nothing in this Charter limits the authority of Parliament or a legislature to advance the equality of status or use of English and French.

This section can be fully enforced by the governments, using large appropriations of money coming from all the taxpayers of Canada. There is no such provision in section 22 for the advancement of other languages which, under these circumstances, will be allowed gradually to die, as will these other cultures.

Obviously, the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 has many limitations and shortcomings. It is not a complete, modern Constitution which will meet present-day needs and be flexible enough to provide the means for the solution of future problems. A complete, modern Constitution should delineate the distribution of powers between federal and provincial governments, set out the functions of the houses of Parliament, establish the structure and function of the courts to prevent partisanship of judges, include and improve the Charter of Rights, provide for a more representative electoral system, contain a suitable amending formula and all matters that go into the making of such a Constitution.

As I have earlier stated, most democratic countries drew up their Constitutions in constituent or constitutional assemblies. Since the United States of America is a federal state much like Canada, I draw attention to the method of creation of the American Constitution. The Articles of Confederation drawn up by the states in the summer of 1776 provided for a continental congress composed of delegates chosen by each state. There was much quarreling among the states at the two continental congresses, so the delegates decided to call a constitutional convention in May 1787. The 55 representatives of states, under the leadership of such able men as Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamilton and others, drafted a constitution in four months, which was then ratified by the states and became the law of the nation two years later in 1789. This is a good example of the constitutional convention.

I believe that the people of Canada desire a new, modern Constitution. This can be best and speedily achieved by a constitutional convention. This body should consist of experts drawn from all walks of life, as well as representatives of classes, women, minorities, regions, and so forth. The delegates would have at their disposal a considerable amount of material and recommendations made by a joint parliamentary committee in 1972, the Pepin-Robarts Task Force, several federal-provincial conferences, a special Senate committee and numerous briefs and testimony by authorities and experts in the past 10 years.

In a short while, the Constitution Act, 1981, with an amending formula, will probably be approved by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and the revised B.N.A. Act, with amendments, will be domiciled in Canada. We shall be recognized, then, as a sovereign, bilingual and multicultural nation. Let us fulfil our nationhood in the near future with a complete, modern constitution, based on democratic principles and procedures.

[Translation]

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, this debate will undoubtedly go down in history as one of the most important parliamentary debates our country has ever known, and I am proud to be a participant on this occasion.

The period of gestation of the draft resolution before us today was a long and sometimes uneasy process. I wish to thank those who were involved, as authors or participants, for their dedication, and I wish to congratulate them on the successful achievement of this goal. It was no easy task to obtain a consensus that would bring together nine of the ten provinces of Canada. I can only regret that the political authorities of my own province preferred not to join the vast majority of Canadian politicians speaking on behalf of the other components of this nation, despite the good will shown by so many politicians of Canada who were able to transcend their many differences of opinion and different political views.

My congratulations go first and foremost to the Prime Minister of Canada, who did everything in his power to find a common ground for agreement with his provincial counterparts. In my speech, as you probably expect, I shall be criticizing the positions taken by a number of those who took part in preparing the draft, but I shall try to avoid excessive language and especially personalities, because I am firmly convinced that our country deserves a debate in which this subject is discussed in a spirit of equanimity and understanding of the politicians and others who prepared the draft resolution.

In this short introduction, I also wish to say a few words about the tremendous task that faced our courts of appeal when they had to analyze the various aspects of the thorny and complex issues put before them, and the remarkable flexibility and consummate skill with which they prepared their decisions.

I shall now consider briefly the issues that were put before the courts, as well as the clear and precise rulings they were able to formulate.

I feel that the most difficult question was the original plan for unilateral patriation of the Constitution with a Charter of Rights affecting certain provincial jurisdictions and an amending formula. The parties opposed to this initial plan protested vehemently from the outset and questioned particularly the legality of proceeding with patriation of the Constitution and the amendments I have just mentioned, when eight Canadian provinces had already formed a solid bloc, both substantively and formally. Their main arguments were based on the premise that the initial plan violated constitutional law and constitutional conventions. They then took their cases to the appeal courts in each of the eight provinces, finally resulting in an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, which pronounced its judgment on September 28 of this year.

I shall review briefly the judgment by the Supreme Court of Canada, a review that my honourable colleagues will probably think is too superficial, which, of course, I cannot deny.

The basis of the main argument was that the procedure chosen was not consistent with Canadian federalism, and in this respect I noted the following sentence at page 12 of the reasons of the Supreme Court by Justice Owen of the Superior Court of Quebec:

The provincial argument was weakened by the fact that Canada is not "the theoretical ideal confederation contemplated by text-book writers".

This sentence was of course taken from the reasons of the Quebec Appeal Court, in reply to the reference of the province.

• (1105)

On the other hand, quite a number of cases had been cited on which counsel for Manitoba relied to support his contention of conventions crystallizing.

At page 16 of the reasons, the Supreme Court answers as follows:

"It was urged before us that a host of cases have given legal force to conventions. This is an overdrawn proposition. One case in which direct recognition and enforcement of a convention was sought is Madzimbamuto v. Lardner-Burke, [1969] 1 A.C. 645. There the Privy Council rejected the assertion that a convention formally recognized by the United Kingdom as established, namely, that it would not legislate for Southern Rhodesia on matters within the competence of the latter's legislature without its government's consent, could not be overridden by British legislation made applicable to Southern Rhodesia after the unilateral declaration of independence by the latter's government. Speaking for the Privy Council, Lord Reid pointed out that although the convention was a very important one, "it had no legal effect in limiting the legal power of Parliament."

The chief support put forward for the "crystallization into law" proposition of Duff C.J.C. in Reference re Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, (1936) S.C.R. 461, better known as the Labour Conventions case when appealed to the Privy Council, (1937) A.C. 326.

At page 21, the Supreme Court quotes the portion of the reasons of Sir Lyman Duff that contains the passage relied on, but places it in its proper context. They are, in this case, the conventions entered into under the auspices of the Labour Organization of the League of Nations ratified by the Government of the Dominion concerned. Following this clarification, the Supreme Court quotes the two following paragraphs from Chief Justice Duff's ruling, at page 22 of its reasons:

"Indeed, agreements between the Government of Canada and other governments in the form of an agreement between Governments, to which His Majesty is not a party, have been recognized by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as adequate in international law to create an international obligation binding upon Canada (Radio Reference, [1932] A.C. 304.)"

"Ratification was the effective act which gave binding force to the convention."

At page 23, Chief Justice Duff indicated his view of convention as allegedly maturing into law in its context in Reference re Disallowance and Reservation of Provincial Legislation, [1938] S.C.R. 71. There it was urged that a certain portion of s. 90 of the British North America Act (incorporating, in respect of the provinces, ss. 56 and 57, with some modification) had by reason of convention become spent and was suspended by the alleged convention. As to this, the Chief Justice said (at p. 78):

We are not concerned with constitutional usage. We are concerned with questions of law which, we repeat, must be determined by reference to the enactments of the British North America Acts of 1867 to 1930, the Statute of Westminster, and, it might be, to relevant statutes of the Parliament of Canada if there were any.

At pages 28 and 29 of the reasons, the Supreme Court refers to an article by Munro, "Laws and Conventions Distinguished," (1975):

The validity of conventions cannot be the subject of proceedings in a court of law. Reparation for breach of such rules will not be effected by any legal sanction. There are no cases which contradict these propositions. In fact, the idea of a court enforcing a mere convention is so strange that the question hardly arises.

At page 25 of the reasons, the Supreme Court comments on a contrary view relied on by the provincial appellants and expressed by Professor W. R. Lederman in two published articles, one entitled "Process of Constitutional Amendment in Canada (1967)", and the second entitled "Constitutional Amendment and Canadian Unity (1978)". It is further added the Professor Lederman himself recognized that there are contrary views, including those of an equally distinguished scholar, Professor F. R. Scott, in "Essays on the Constitution (1977)".

At page 30 of the reasons, the Supreme Court further comments:

Professor Lederman relies in part on a line of cases that has already been considered, especially the reasons of Sir Lyman Duff in the Labour Conventions case. The leap from convention to law is explained almost as if there was a common law of constitutional law, but originating in political practice. That is simply not so. What is desirable as a political limitation does not translate into a legal limitation, without expression in imperative constitutional text or statute.

The position advocated is all the more unacceptable when substantial provincial compliance or consent is by him said to be sufficient. Although Professor Lederman would not give a veto to Prince Edward Island, he would to Ontario or Quebec or British Columbia or Alberta. This is an impossible position for a court to manage.

The Supreme Court then turns to the authority or power of the two federal houses to proceed by resolution to forward the address and appended draft statutes to Her Majesty the Queen for enactment by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There is no limit anywhere in law, either in Canada or in the United Kingdom, having regard to section 18 of the British North America Act, as enacted by 1875 (U.K.), c. 38, which ties the privileges, immunities and powers of the federal houses to those of the British House of Commons to the power of the houses to pass resolutions. Under section 18 aforesaid, the federal Parliament may by statute define those privileges, immunities and powers, so long as they do not exceed those held and enjoyed by the British House of Commons at the time of the passing of the federal statute.

At pages 33 and 34 of the reasons, the Supreme Court adds:

"For the moment, it is relevant to point out that even in those cases where an amendment to the British North America Act was founded on a resolution of the federal Houses after having received provincial consent, there is no instance, save in the British North America Act 1930 where such consent was recited in the resolution. The matter remained, in short, a conventional one within Canada, without effect on the validity of the resolution in respect of United Kingdom action. The point is underscored in relation to the very first amendment directly affecting provincial legislative power, that in 1940 which added "Unemployment Insurance" to the catalogue of exclusive federal powers. Sir William Jowitt, then Solicitor General, and later Lord Chancellor, was asked in the British House of Commons about provincial consent when the amendment was in course of passage. The question put to him and his answer are as follows (see 362 U.K. Parl. Deb. 5th Series, H.C. 1177-1181):

Mr. Mander, the member concerned, put the following question to Mr. Jowitt:

In this bill, we are concerned only with the Parliament of Canada, but, as a matter of interest, I would be obliged if the Solicitor General would say whether the provincial Canadian Parliaments are in agreement with the proposals submitted by the Dominion Parliament—

Sir William Jowitt answered as follows:

One might think that the Canadian Parliament was in some way subservient to ours, which is not the fact. The true position is that at the request of Canada, this old machinery still survives until something better is thought of, but we square the legal with the constitutional position by passing these acts only in the form that the Canadian Parliament require and at the request of the Canadian Parliament.

My justification to the House for this bill—and it is important to observe this—is not on the merits of the proposal, which is a matter for the Canadian Parliament; if we were to embark upon that, we might trespass on what I conceive to be their constitutional position. The sole justification for this enactment is that we are doing in this way what the Parliament of Canada desires to do . . .

And Sir William Jowitt goes on:

In reply to the honourable member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander), I do not know what the view of the provincial Parliaments is. I know, however, that when the matter was before the Privy Council some of the provincial Parliaments supported the Dominion Parliament. It is a sufficient justification for the bill that we are morally bound to act on the ground that we have here the request of the Dominion Parliament and that we must operate the old machinery which has been left over at their request in accordance with their wishes.

At page 34, the Supreme Court states that it has been asked, in effect, to enshrine as a legal imperative a principle of unanimity for constitutional amendment to overcome the anomaly—more of an anomaly today than it was in 1867—that the B.N.A. Act contained no provision for effecting amendments by Canadian action alone. Although Saskatchewan has, alone of the eight provinces opposing the federal package embodied in the resolution, taken a less stringent position, eschewing unanimity but without quantifying the substantial support that it advocates, the provinces, parties to the references and to the appeals, are entitled to have the Court's primary consideration of their views.

We now come to a position that the Province of Quebec seems bent on upholding, namely that it has and has always had a right of veto on any amendment to the Canadian Constitution even though the effect to the present resolution is to terminate any need to resort to the United Kingdom Parliament in the future. In line with its rejection of unanimity, Saskatchewan asserted that it sees no violation of the principles of federalism in the resolution so far as concerns the amending formula proposed thereby.

An important question was raised by the Saskatchewan position which invited this Court to take a severable view of the substance of the resolution, namely, to hive off the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and perhaps other elements, save the amending formula and the patriation feature. This was not the position of the Attorney General of Canada nor of any of the other provincial attorneys general; they were all of the view that it was the whole package that was involved in the legal issue posed by question 3 and question B. Indeed, the legal arguments pro and con do not engage the contents of the package, and it is impossible to qualify the issue of legality by considerations of fairness or equity or political acceptability or even judicial desirability.

The Court believed that the stark legal question was whether it could enact by what would be judicial legislation a formula of unanimity to initiate the amending process which would be binding not only in Canada but also on the Parliament of the United Kingdom with which amending authority would still remain.

It would have been anomalous indeed, overshadowing the anomaly of a Constitution which contains no provision for its amendment, for the Court to say retroactively that in law we have had an amending formula all along, even if we have not hitherto known it; or, to say, that we have had in law one amending formula, say from 1867 to 1931, and a second amending formula that has emerged after 1931.

The Court added that no one could gainsay the desirability of federal-provincial accord or acceptable compromise. That does not, however, go to legality. As Sir William Jowitt said in the passage quoted earlier, we must operate the old machinery perhaps one last time.

The Court was then invited to regard the Balfour Declaration of 1926 as embracing the provinces of Canada and, presumably, the states of the sister Dominion of Australia in its reference to "autonomous communities".

The Court then cites that well-known statement of principle, a political statement in the context of evolving independence of the Dominions in their relations with the United Kingdom, and I quote the following excerpt:

They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

At page 38, the Supreme Court adds:

Although the Balfour Declaration cannot, of itself, support the assertion of provincial autonomy in the wide sense contended for, it seems to have been regarded as retroactively having that effect by reason of the ultimate enactment of the Statute of Westminster. That statute is put forward not only as signifying an equality of status as between the Dominion and the provinces vis-à-vis the United Kingdom parliament, but also as attenuating the theretofore untrammelled legislative authority of that Parliament in relation to Canada where provincial interests are involved.

And then:

The germ of these consequences was said by the Newfoundland Court of Appeal to be in the Balfour Declaration, arising out of the Imperial Conference of 1926 and embodied in the report of that conference.

At page 39, after citing the reasons of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court expresses the opinion that if the significance attached to the Statute of Westminster is, indeed, what is asserted in the above-quoted passage and what has been urged by the provinces in this Court, there is no need to resort to the Balfour Declaration, save possibly as a footnote. The course of events leading to the Statute of Westminster is detailed in numerous writings. It is sufficient to refer, in general, to the discussion in Wheare, the Statute of Westminster Dominion Status (1953, 5th ed.), passim; and see, especially, Chapter VII, The Statute and the Legal Status of Canada.

The submissions made on the Statute of Westminster by counsel who were before this Court engage the preamble to the Statute and several sections and paragraphs listed at page 40.

The Court then reviews the Statute of Westminster, the Colonial Laws Validity Act, the report of the 1930 Imperial Conference and even pronouncements by political figures and persons in other branches of public life. With regard to those pronouncements, the Court adds that "there is little profit in parading them".

Support for a legal requirement of provincial consent to the resolution that was before the Supreme Court, consent which is also alleged to condition United Kingdom response to the resolution has been, finally, asserted to lie in the preamble of the B.N.A. Act itself, and in the reflection, in the substantive terms of the Act, of what are said to be fundamental presuppositions in the preamble as to the nature of Canadian federalism.

At page 58, the Court concludes that the law knows nothing of any requirement of provincial consent, either to a resolution of the federal Houses or as a condition of the exercise of United Kingdom legislative power.

Finally, at pages 59 and 60, we find the following:

Nothing said in these reasons is to be construed as either favouring or disapproving the proposed amending formula or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms or any of the other provisions of which enactment is sought. The questions put to this Court do not ask for its approval or disapproval of the contents of the so-called "package".

What is central here is the untrammelled authority at law of the two federal Houses to proceed as they wish in the management of their own procedures and hence to adopt the resolution which is intended for submission to Her Majesty for action thereon by the United Kingdom Parliament. The British North America Act does not, either in terms or by implication, control this authority or require that it be subordinated to provincial assent. Nor does the Statute of Westminster interpose any requirement of such assent. If anything, it leaves the position as it was before its enactment. Developments subsequent thereto do not affect the legal position.

In conclusion, I submit that the Supreme Court of Canada, in its judgment of September 28, clearly established the legality of the federal proposal with regard to the resolution now before us, while stressing that constitutional conventions should be taken into consideration despite the fact that they are not legally binding.

May I be allowed to give my interpretation of that important judgment, without attempting to distort the pronouncement of the honourable court: it did seem to me that it wanted to draw to the attention of politicians involved in the proceedings and decisions the need to bear in mind the political decisions of the past and constitutional conventions. In addition, I feel that the representatives of the federal government as well as of the provinces did take notice of the shade of difference in the judgment of the Court and acted accordingly in their negotiations, with the result that several major changes were discussed in depth and later implemented. We therefore have before us a resolution that has been changed several times and then agreed to by nine of the ten Canadian provinces.

The amendments added to the original patriation project deal with the amending formula and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which were accepted by all sides, with the exception of Quebec, as a result of the climate created by the last part of the judgment delivered by the Supreme Court to which I have just referred.

Honourable senators, I would like to apologize because I am fighting a bad flu.

I was strongly impressed by Senator Robichaud's emotional plea last Friday. He stated the various reasons why he was proud to be a Canadian, especially proud of taking part in this debate on the project the main purpose of which will be to give Canadians a Constitution which, together, they will progressively improve from year to year on the basis of the experience gained as a result of the enforcement of the new Canadian Constitution. He mentioned several very important aspects of that new Constitution, to which I would like to add the following.

- (1) Fundamental freedoms mentioned in section 2;
- (2) Democratic rights of citizens;
- (3) Mobility rights for Canadian citizens to enable them to earn their living in any province;
- (4) Legal rights from section 7 to 14 inclusive;
- (5) Equality rights including equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination, especially discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability;

(6) Official languages of Canada—status and equal rights and privileges as to the use of English and French in all institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada and in all institutions of the legislature and Government of New Brunswick, while it does not limit the authority of Parliament or of a legislature to advance the equality of status or use of the English and French languages.

(7) Sections 16 and 17 deal with the advancement of status and use.

I think that we have here the answer to a point raised during this debate, when it was suggested that the Canada clause was not going as far as Bill 101 in effect in Quebec. I should point out that the last part of clause 38(6) on official languages provides that nothing in that section may limit the power of Parliament or of the legislatures as to the advancement of the status of French and English or their use. This means that a minimum has been set, but it does not prevent the provinces from going further if they wish to do so. Contrary to what was apparently suggested in this house the other day, there is no inconsistency between the resolution now before us and Bill 101.

I will now refer to the minority language provision commonly known under the name of Canada clause, that is section 23.

Opposition has also been voiced against the restrictive clause of the Charter dealing with "Application where numbers warrant"; it is, in my opinion, because of a failure to recognize that this is at least a privilege or right which the francophones outside Quebec did not enjoy. That is therefore a step in the right direction, and just as my friend senator Robichaud said the other day, I wonder how anybody can object to such a provision. I am aware that several of my colleagues consider this resolution as the end of the world, that it will become untouchable, that it will never be improved. But this is not so. And on any future amending proposal, the provinces will have their say just as they do now under the B.N.A. Act. I do not think that this innovation which allows for the teaching of both the French and English languages should be discarded, even with the restrictive clause concerning sufficient numbers.

In that regard, I feel the old Quebec saying applies—half a loaf is better than none. At least, we are taking a step forward.

Now to get back to the headings and short titles in the Charter of Rights:

(8) Enforcement of guaranteed rights and freedoms;

(9) General provision guaranteeing certain ancestral, treaty and other rights and freedoms to the aboriginal peoples of Canada; the cultural heritage of Canadians; equal rights to both sexes; rights respecting certain schools, namely separate denominational and separate schools;

(10) Confirmation of the existing rights of the aboriginal peoples; definition of "aboriginal peoples of Canada";

(11) Equalization and regional disparities; commitment to promote equal opportunities: (a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians; (b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; (c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians; commitment on the part of Parliament and the government of Canada to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation;

(12) Obligation for the Prime Minister to convene, within one year after Parti IV comes into force, a constitutional conference composed of the first ministers of the provinces and himself, representatives of the native peoples of Canada and the elected representatives of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

(13) Procedure for amending the constitution of Canada with the participation of the legislative assemblies, in accordance with the provisions set forth in sections 38 to 40 inclusive.

(14) Amendment to the Constitution Act, 1867 with respect to matters relating to non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources and electrical energy.

(15) In the field of education or in other cultural matters where there is a transfer of provincial legislative powers to Parliament, the obligation for Canada to provide fair and reasonable compensation to the provinces concerned.

(16) Unanimous consent on any amendment to the Constitution of Canada related to the following questions. First, these amendments shall be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General of Canada where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province.

Such amendments shall be limited to the following matters: (a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province; (b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force; (d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada is subject to the same rules.

(17) Any amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with section 38, with all the requirements and restrictions of that section, especially subsection (1): (a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada; (b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting senators; (c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of senators; (d) subject to paragraph 41(d), the Supreme Court of Canada; (e) the extension of existing provinces into the territories; and (f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces, and so on and so forth. (Sec. 42)

I close this list which is probably too long already by saying once again that we have here a very innovative constitutional proposal which provides Canadians with a Charter that can grow in the future with the help of all concerned citizens of this country.

For all these reasons, I will be supporting the resolution as amended and I recommend its passage to all my colleagues in this chamber, even though some aspects might not meet their full approval.

Before closing, I want to reiterate my deep regret over Quebec's dissidence, which will now stand alone, and its categorical refusal to negotiate and sign the agreement reached by the federal government and the other provinces.

Despite this shortcoming, I remain convinced that my province will not continue to hold such a negative attitude and that Quebec will soon return to the bargaining table. The Prime Minister has expressed this wish several times recently adding that he was always willing, like his other provincial counterparts, to listen to grievances, both before and after the patriation of the Constitution.

I was very happy to see, at the end of the federal-provincial conference of last November, that all the premiers there as well as the Prime Minister, regretted the attitude espoused by Quebec in refusing to sign the agreement and appeared quite willing to listen to and consider any new proposals that Quebec might put forward.

Although I respect the opinion of the Quebec government, I am convinced that it is wrong in choosing, as it announced in an order in council a few days ago, to uphold this negative attitude of opposing patriation by once again appealing to the courts.

In that respect, I think Quebec is making a mistake, because it is entering a legal fight with a sadly shattered armour.

Senator Flynn: This is to your advantage.

Senator Langlois: No, it is not, and I said I deplored it. But if you want me to tell you in what respect that armour is battered, I can do so. It is battered because Quebec itself—and I do not mean one political party but the political authorities in general—Quebec itself through its past attitude, especially when the Victoria Formula was developed, and later at the Toronto consensus, and finally through the so-called Vancouver formula, took actions that in effect relinquished the right of veto it is now claiming.

And at any rate, another gap in its armour is the following: Why, in its referral to the Quebec Court of Appeal, did it not claim the right to veto it is now submitting it has? Another gap in its armour, and this is what I meant, is simply its chances of success before the courts. Another gap is in the fact that the Supreme Court, as I have just established in my review of its judgment of September 28, 1981, rejected any unanimity formula, any supremacy or sovereignty of provinces to legislate, even in areas of their own jurisdiction.

I think this is where the Premier is having an exercise in futility. I wish him every possible luck, but I do not believe his chances are very high.

Honourable senators, I conclude these remarks by apologizing once more for a bad attack of flu. I hope that what has just happened in the process of the very protracted and complex discussions on the Canadian Constitution, will soon be put aside, and that my fellow Canadians, once we have received this new Constitution, will be understanding and open-minded enough—and this includes not only the people in general but our politicians—to try and take advantage of that new Canadian Constitution, so that we may have the privilege to live in a still stronger and more united Canada.

I conclude my remarks with that prayer: May God protect and bless Canada, our beloved country!

● (1140)

[English]

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise to take part in the most significant debate that this chamber has ever known. I am unlike the nominator at the political convention who says all the good things he has to say and then keeps the name of the candidate in suspense as long as he possibly can. I have no intention of following that technique. I propose to tell you now how I shall vote, and I propose to vote against this Resolution, against the government proposal which we are considering today.

Having said that, I could sit down. Anything more that I might add would make no difference, but at least you will understand some of the reasons for my action. You will not understand all of my reasons because I do not propose to speak about all of them. I do not propose to speak about the violent exception I take to what was said by Senator Langlois on the state of mind of the people of Quebec. I would much prefer to be advised by Senator Flynn, Senator Tremblay or someone on this side of the house on that matter, because I would be much nearer the truth than if I were to follow Senator Langlois.

However, in order that you may understand some of the reasons for my action, I feel that you are entitled to a few words from me before we are called upon to cast our vote.

First and foremost, unless the resolution calls, in unmistakable terms—which, in its present form, it does not—for the protection of human life from the moment of conception, my conscience will not permit me to support it. I can never put out of my mind the thousands of murders which take place under the present law in Canada each year.

I can never forget that it was the men of the present government who introduced and made possible that present law—men such as Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Jean Chrétien and scores more who were part of the conspiracy which made it possible by putting it in an omnibus bill, wrapping it in programs for which a decent man could vote and thus foisting it upon the Canadian public. Pierre Elliott Trudeau argues that the sanctity of human life is still in the hands of Parliament and that this resolution will not affect that fact. If we take him at his word, Parliament, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, has ruled that the human fetus is not a person. Until the Supreme Court and Pierre Elliott Trudeau are proven wrong, no measure will pass with my vote until it clearly admits that human life is worthy of protection from the moment of conception to that of death.

Moreover, when amendment to the Constitution was first mooted, my party—correctly, I submit—said that the Constitution of Canada should be made in Canada, for Canadians and by Canadians. If I vote this afternoon for the resolution before us, what am I doing? What are you going to do?

Senator Robichaud: If you are asking me, I will vote for it.

Senator Donahoe: But what does your vote mean?

Senator Robichaud: One vote.

Senator Donahoe: Those of you who are listening to me, how are you going to vote? Some will vote one way and some will vote the other, but I want to say to you that I know what I am doing. I am asking the legislators of a foreign country to make laws for me. I do not find such a procedure to fit in with the belief I have held all my mature life, that Canada is a sovereign nation.

I will not support any resolution which will in perpetuity cause me to consult the statutes of a foreign nation in order to understand the basis of my country's Constitution. And if anyone says to me, "But you do that now", my answer is, "Yes, but I don't like it." Here, we have the opportunity to clear up all this misunderstanding, the opportunity to make the world understand that our country, Canada, is, in fact, a sovereign nation.

Since I have mentioned the word "Canada," I would like to say that at this point in my address I yield to no man on this floor in my love of Canada and of this great country. I resent anybody suggesting that because my vote is not with his that I am any less of a Canadian than he, because it is not true, and I love Canada. I was born in the wonderful province of Nova Scotia, part of the Confederation that was at the time known as the Dominion of Canada. With my people and my party, I have supported Confederation all these years, and I have lived to come here to the Senate to see what, in my honest, considered opinion, is the first step towards the disintegration of our nation, the first step in saying to the people of the province of Quebec, "We don't give a damn what you think, this is what we think and this is what we are going to have."

Finally, I cannot vote for a resolution with which nobody is satisfied. Jamie Lamb, a writer for the Vancouver Sun, said that we will soon have a Constitution. She quoted the Prime Minister as saying, "a new imperfect one." Who the hell wants an imperfect Constitution? Are we to fall into the position that it is better to have an imperfect one than none at all?

Lamb says that, yes, it is an imperfect one, but it seems to suit Mr. Trudeau fine—at least, he is asking everyone to vote for it. He is going to ask the British government to vote for it. In so doing, he will ask those people, whom you and I did not elect, to support him. He says that he is going to patriate the Constitution. He is not going to patriate the Constitution that Canada now has. He is going to build a new Constitution to his own model. He will ask that that model be endorsed by the British Parliament and, when the British Parliament has done his will and endorsed it, then he will bring it to Canada and will say to the people of Canada, "Look, you now have your Constitution in Canada." We will patriate our Constitution, but Canada will never be the same kind of country as it was before patriation.

Every effort on the part of the Right Honourable Joe Clark to improve this resolution in the slightest degree was rejected. The Honourable Mr. Broadbent, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, has been for and against this Resolution as long as his stand would enable him to maintain his status in Parliament.

As an aside, consider the attitude of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau to those on his side who had the courage of their convictions and voted against him. He has said of them that there will be no punishment and no action taken against them. He has said that it is their right to vote as they see fit. Therefore, he has approved, not so much of what they have done but of the manner in which they have done it.

Compare his attitude towards those on his own side to his attitude towards those on the opposite side of the House of Commons who did exactly the same thing. You will find that, instead of keeping an open mind, he has poured scorn and disdain on, and has poked fun at, those who—for reasons as valid as those that impelled the men of his party to do as they did—saw fit to take an identical stand. Their reasons may not have been identical, but they were of the same nature.

I do not expect to sway anyone's vote by what I am saying here today, but I sincerely trust that those whose training and opinions on the sanctity of human life are the same as mine, but who, because of party loyalty or any other reason, will not vote as I will, will be able to reconcile their conscience with their actions.

The Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, was asked on television, "When do you expect that the British Parliament will send the Constitution home?" He replied that he did not expect any opposition of consequence or, at least, any that would cause delay. I might say that I, too, expect very little because I, like him, have a true conception of the quality of the minds of the men who occupy the seats opposite me. I know how they reached their present eminence; I know what their position will be; I know they will vote to follow, without any question or hesitation, the wishes of the man who temporarily leads them, and then, when they have voted for him, they may find, to their great sorrow, that he has gone and, what is worse, that they have gone with him because what they are doing today may very well serve as the final knell for this upper chamber.

I know that there are those on my side of the chamber who believe that the Senate could be improved. They believe that instead of being appointed we should be elected. All I would say to them is that we do not require an elected chamber because we already have one.

We are a Confederation which has been put together with a bicameral parliament—two houses, one elected and one appointed. Reason and common sense have always governed the men and women who have formed this Senate. They have seen to it that this Senate has operated, not in any intransigent way and not in any way to defeat the wishes of those elected by the people of this country, but so that those wishes are brought into effect in the best, the most normal and the finest way they can be. We have been and, in my opinion, we should continue to be, a superb example of a second chamber providing sober second thought to the wishes of those who are elected by the people of this country.

The Honourable Jean Chrétien expected no opposition to the resolution. He knew how those opposite would vote. He knew the kind of people who occupy those chairs, and that independence of mind was not necessarily one of their attributes, and his view was shared by others.

Hugh Townsend, in the local Halifax newspaper, stated that "the patriation package must still pass the Senate." It took the media a long time to realize that there is a Senate. I am sure all honourable senators are aware that the media said that it was all over because it had been passed by the House of Commons. Certainly, it was all over, because they were relying on the position to be adopted by each one of you opposite when you vote for this Constitution—not for Canada, but for the Liberal Party. However, Hugh Townsend said that "the patriation package must still pass the Senate," and he went further and said that approval here would be just an academic stamp. It is not an academic stamp with my co-operation.

On the doorstep of this place I see Esmond Butler and Jean Chrétien panting on the mat, waiting to purchase their tickets to fly the ocean and carry the results of your deliberations to the British Parliament. As I stand here today, I have every confidence that that is exactly what they will do, but I have every satisfaction in the world in knowing that, do it they may, but they will not do it with my approval or with my consent.

I trust that anyone who has listened to me today will not be led to believe that the reasons I have advanced are the only ones that motivate me. I have been ill, and because of that fact I will not speak at great length today. I have finished what I wanted to say, but I would add that I could, as my friend before me did, occupy the time of this chamber for a much longer period of time in advancing the flaws and defects in the Resolution before us, which I am expected to vote for and with which we are going to attempt to govern this nation, Canada, which is, in effect, the first ring of the death knell of the country that you and I have known.

● (1200)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I listened with a great deal of attention to the Honourable Senator Donahoe. I certainly cannot agree with his conclusion that what we are doing today is in any way detrimental to the future and the future well-being of this country.

Patriating our Constitution and including in that Constitution some very important provisions which will serve the interests of the citizens of this country, I think, is a giant step forward.

I think the constitutional process that has been followed demonstrates the best way this nation could have gone in dealing with this difficult and delicate matter. The Prime Minister brought in his proposals many months ago. They were discussed at a number of first ministers' conferences; many amendments have been made and are before us today with the approval of nine of the ten provinces, and with the support of an overwhelming vote in the House of Commons, constituting a majority of the members of each of the three political parties. So, I say that this Constitution before us today, and on which we are going to vote, has, in fact, the general support of Canadians, and they will be supporting us when we pass it in this chamber today.

I think that there are some important provisions in the Constitution resolution before us that will, in fact, improve the lot of Canadians. Over the years, many Canadians and many Canadian leaders have fought hard for a Bill of Rights or a Charter of Rights, and today we have an opportunity to support a Charter of Rights. I think that that Charter of Rights is of major importance.

One cannot quote—one does not need to quote—all the various provisions of the Charter of Rights, but there are important guideposts. One of them is the provision of legal rights. I think it is important that the legal rights of all Canadians be spelled out thoroughly, as they are in the constitutional proposal that is before us.

We have not been able to do all we would wish to do in dealing with aboriginal and treaty rights. Our natives look to Parliament for an indication that we support aboriginal and treaty rights. I think that in the circumstances we are doing all that can reasonably be done at this time. Section 35 of the resolution reads as follows:

The existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.

There will be a constitutional conference within a year to deal with this important subject.

The question of providing for equalization payments in the Constitution, setting forth the rights of Canadians to a basic standard of government services, is very important. Those of us who come from provinces where, over the years, we have not had a standard of living or an income level as high as the average in the country, have enjoyed the benefits of equalization payments. As our lot in the west has changed, I think it is well that we support this provision, because it says that while we are likely to enjoy relative wealth, at least in the immediate future, then we should be prepared to share this wealth with the rest of Canada, particularly with those parts of Canada and those citizens of Canada who have an average per capita income lower than that which we enjoy. So, I think that that is very important.

I am pleased that the Prime Minister has been able to entrench language rights so that French-speaking minorities living in the province of Saskatchewan, for example, will have the right, if numbers warrant, to have their children educated in the French language. In the province of Saskatchewan, this has been a controversial question. The current provincial government has been dragging its feet on this, and I think that this provision will help correct that weakness. I am very pleased it is there, and I am very pleased to support it.

I listened to the speech delivered earlier by Senator Yuzyk. I have known Senator Yuzyk for many years, and am an admirer of his and the work he has done in Canada to strengthen our knowledge and understanding of the contribution that Canadians of Ukrainian origin have made and are making to the welfare of this country.

Senator Yuzyk is not the only senator who takes an interest in multiculturalism and in the promotion of the rights of our ethnic citizens. Senator Bosa has been very active in the Italian communities; Senator Haidasz, a former Minister of State for Multiculturalism, has made a most valuable contribution. I think it is a step forward to tell our citizens of ethnic origin that the right to their culture is being imbedded in the Constitution of Canada. I think that this also is an important step.

In reference to language rights, our multicultural community and equalization payments, I think that these are important steps forward. I think one of the most important steps forward is the provision assuring equality of treatment for the disabled and that provision setting forth equality of the sexes. I think that the recognition that women should have equal rights in every way in this country with citizens who are males is most important. Soon after the provisions of this Constitution have passed, I think it will have a widespread effect. I can see it having a major effect on employment; I can see the banks in this country, with this provision in the Constitution, correcting their whole employment policy with regard to the sexes. I think it is just incomprehensible, it is not understandable, that with the huge banking system we have in this country there is just a handful of women who are branch managers. I think that the airlines, because of the Constitution that we are passing today, will have a substantial number of women pilots and co-pilots.

There is a case under consideration in which it is alleged that the CNR has discriminated against women in its hiring process. I can see this Constitution, in setting forth equal rights for the sexes, will have a very important and major effect in the employment of women in our whole society.

The Whip has asked of me to be brief, and I hope to be brief so that others can have an opportunity to make a contribution to this debate. I regret that Quebec is not part of this agreement at this time, as do other members of this chamber, but it is not from a lack of trying on the part of the Prime Minister and Mr. Chrétien. The only reason I see for Quebec not being part of this has been the attitude of the Premier of Quebec. My hope is that, as the days unfold, Quebec will, in every way and in every appearance, be as supportive of this Constitution, which is a Constitution for all Canadians, as I am sure are all Canadians from other parts of this nation.

A country as broad as ours and with so many regions is, of course, difficult to govern. People from various regions have different needs. Away from the capital, many of them feel alienated and ostracized. It is easy for citizens to become very provincial in their outlook, but I am convinced that Canadians from coast to coast are loyal and patriotic.

● (1210)

I hope that we can take a step forward, after the Constitution has been brought home, by following a practice that would encourage young Canadians to travel and see this country while they are in high school, or soon after they leave high school.

Probably the single most important factor that can convince us that we live in a great land of which we are privileged to be citizens, is to travel across Canada and see what a wonderful country we have.

Over the years, I have had the opportunity to travel from coast to coast, and, I believe, Canadians generally are very loyal and supportive of their federal institutions and of this great country.

There are those who are doubting Thomases and there are those who are picking holes in the Constitution that is before us, but I am fully convinced that, when this Constitution is brought home, Canadians, generally, will celebrate and will be pleased with these milestones that set forth the rights of Canadian citizens, and all of us who had a part to play—even though it has, in most instances, not been a major part—in bringing our Constitution home will today be serving Canada well.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I shall not be long. I should like to pay tribute to the Honourable Ernest C. Manning, C.C., the first member of the Order of Excellence of Alberta. I should also like to pay tribute to him on his excellent speech on the Constitution which he gave on December 3. It portrays the hallmark of statesmanship. As a Canadian from Alberta, I offer to him my sincere congratulations on both the honour bestowed on him and the quality of his speeches in this chamber.

I should like to thank and commend all honourable senators who conscientiously worked on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, particularly Senator Roblin, Senator Asselin and Senator Tremblay. I was given the opportunity to substitute for Senator Roblin and Senator Asselin on one or two occasions. At other times, I sat in the audience and watched and listened.

Honourables senators, as I enter this debate I find myself in a very questioning mood. In a book entitled In Times Like These by Nellie McClung, the author says:

Two prisoners looked out once through the bars,

One saw the mud, the other saw the stars.

Today, I feel that I am both of those prisoners in one, for I can see both the mud and the stars.

Is this a time of great rejoicing and great opportunity, or is this beloved country of ours in serious trouble, perhaps even in grave danger? Is this a new commitment and a fresh start that will meet the needs of Canadians, not only in the 1980s, the 1990s, but also for generations to come? Will it give rise to internal dissension, and give cause for lasting bitterness and much litigation?

No sooner was the Address to Her Majesty tabled in the other place than there was evidence of omissions here, a loophole there and the sense of security that Canadians might have had was shattered. Once again came the cautions and admonitions that there were to be no amendments; a threat or fear that the Accord would be broken if any were to be proposed.

Women soon discovered that section 28, unanimously accepted last April, was subjected to a legislative override. Women, once again, were denied full equality in law. Once again, they took up the fight. Whoever performed emasculation did not get very far. Women marshalled their forces across the nation, as they did on February 14 and 15, 1981. This was accomplished in an effective united fashion. The result was a recall of the override. Now section 28 states:

Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

This marks a signal victory, and Canadians will be able to say with pride that in the United Nations Decade for Women we have moved one step forward toward equality, development and peace.

In 1981, Canadian women have kept faith with the Famous Five—Emily Murphy, Nellie McClung, Henrietta Muir Edwards, Irene Parlby and Louise McKinney—the five who took their case to the Supreme Court of Canada and were denied, but were not stopped because they moved on to the highest court of appeal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Britain.

On October 18, 1929, women then received the news that women, indeed, are persons. In the ensuing 52 years, how far have women progressed? Where are women at today? I will not subject you to a list, but I will simply ask you to refer to a fact sheet put out by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women entitled "Women and Poverty". A quick reference may be found in the Honourable Flora MacDonald's speech in the other place on November 24, 1981, at pages 13195 and 13196 of Commons Hansard. In the interest of time, I will simply say that equality for 52 per cent of the entire population of Canada has long been overdue.

Senator Williams covered concerns of our native peoples much more eloquently and better than I can. Senator Yuzyk, along with Senator Argue, made some mention of the ethnic cultural groups. Senator Donahoe made specific mention of the fact that he was born in Nova Scotia, and that he was proud to be a Canadian.

[Senator Bielish.]

I was born in Alberta of parents who were brought up in Central Europe—in the province of Bukovina, Ukraine, then under Austria. My father was ten when he came to Canada, and he had some schooling in the old country. My mother came to Canada when she was seven, and she and her family moved into the wilderness, into that great free land that they were promised. They lived 13 miles from the closest school, not knowing any language but their own. My mother lived and died totally illiterate, and I am proud to say that. It did not stop her from instilling in us the fact that this was to be our country, that she would do what she knew how to do and could do, but that there was an opportunity in this country for us if we worked, if we studied, and if we put our best efforts forward.

● (1220)

I will not say more. She lived for 37 years and left eight of us. We have survived. She was going to learn English before she passed away. At that time I was just back from normal school and we were going to assume some of her responsibilities in an effort to ease her load.

However, my story is perhaps beside the point. The point is that I feel no less a Canadian. I thought we had reached the place in the Constitution where we could say, "We are Canadians from the east coast to the west coast, from the Arctic to the Great Lakes." I propose to close my remarks with a prayer taken from In Times Like These, by Nellie McClung.

Lord, if Thou wilt Thou canst take us today
To the Mount of Decision,
And show us the land that we live in
With glorified Vision!

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, this is indeed an historic debate in which we are now engaged. All of us, I am sure, are anxious to ensure that our Constitution will be patriated; and I am equally sure that we share a sense of relief that it will be returned as a made-in-Canada document.

The constitutional package gives Canada a workable process within which each province, through further compromise and understanding, can achieve its particular objectives, in balance with the best interests of the nation.

It is no secret that many Newfoundlanders, as relatively new Canadians, were quite concerned that our rather special situation was not being understood and reflected in the earlier resolution before Parliament. Accommodations have been made, compromise has been achieved.

The premier of my province, Newfoundland, the Honourable Brian Peckford, and his Minister of Justice, the Honourable Gerry Ottenheimer, played an active role in the negotiations leading up to the signing of the Accord. The only living Father of Confederation, the Honourable Joseph R. Smallwood, has publicly supported the negotiated document.

My late father, a former member of this chamber, the Honourable Ray Petten, a Canadian by choice rather than by birth, would have warmly supported this resolution.

Honourable senators, I am grateful for the opportunity to actively support this resolution, in the certain knowledge that we will further amend and improve it, in the best interests of all Canadians, following its return to Canada.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, it is a great privilege for me to be able to participate today in what I believe is a significant beneficial and historic milestone for Canada. The last time I spoke in this chamber with reference to the proposed changes in our Constitution was on November 3, 1980 when the first draft resolution, laid before both houses, was being discussed. I stated at that time that I supported in principle the thrust of the resolution and the objectives it was apparently attempting to achieve. But I confined myself to criticizing those provisions which, because they seemed deficient in principle or application, would not have protected fundamental and legal rights in the way and to the extent that each of us would wish them protected.

Today I look at the Constitution resolution before us and I am filled with quiet, if not complete, satisfaction at the changes which have been made during the past 14 months. Those changes have been brought about by the dedicated efforts, persuasiveness—bulldog determination, if you will—and literally thousands of hours of long and hard work by multitudes of people, many of whom we shall never know. But we do know that all of the parties in the two houses of Parliament participated in the process and contributed to the result; the provincial governments wrought major changes in several areas, and individuals and organizations from coast to coast have made a significant impact. They all had a share in fashioning what will be our first truly Canadian Constitution incorporating a Charter of Rights. I cannot help mentioning particularly the contribution of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and his Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien. Without their vision, inspiration and determination, this major accomplishment in our constitutional history would not have become a reality.

Most of the misgivings that I had with the first draft resolution have now been allayed. There have been important changes to the section dealing with legal rights, so that the test of reasonableness will now apply in both interpretation and application.

As we all know, the classes to which equality rights apply have been expanded to include those persons who suffer from mental or physical disabilities. Hopefully the quality of protection under that section has also been strengthened.

I need hardly say that I am delighted with the inclusion of those clauses which re-affirm and re-emphasize equality of the sexes, and also the aboriginal and treaty rights of the native peoples of Canada, who are truly our founding Canadians.

In my earlier speech I said that Senator Bird and I, as well as other women members of Parliament, were going to fight for the inclusion of that recognition and those protections. I did not realize then how much effort by so many people it would take, and that we could almost lose our prize even when it was within our grasp. Many men joined with hundreds of women to help them attain their goal, and many members of Parliament in both houses joined with the native groups who wished greater protection of their ancient rights within the Charter.

That was a battle well worth winning, but we must remember that, human nature being what it is, the war against discrimination and inequitable treatment of people will probably never end. The non obstante provision in clause 33 will serve to keep us vigilant and will provide a challenge to legislators each time its application is proposed.

I have mixed feelings about that provision, because I do not believe it should apply without exception to our fundamental freedoms, since, in any case, they are subject to "such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". On the other hand, I believe there will be times and situations when Parliament or provincial legislatures may have to derogate from the broad principles of the Charter in order to attain certain carefully targeted objectives.

So this provision should reassure those people and governments—and I understand that the Government of Quebec was among them—who insist that Parliament and legislatures must have the means if necessary to override the courts.

The existence of a sunset provision, whereby all legislation containing a non obstante clause automatically ceases to have effect, and must be renewed in the appropriate forum each five years, is reassuring for all of us. However, the presence of a comprehensive Charter of Rights in our Constitution will not end the battle for recognition of our fundamental freedoms, and our civil or legal rights. It simply gives us another weapon with which to fight.

I could not approve clause 44 in the first draft of the Constitution because, according to the formula which was then proposed for making future changes in the Constitution, the power of the Senate could have been diminished, or the Senate could even have been abolished without the consent of the provinces. The proposal we are now considering has the concurrence of nine out of ten provinces, as well as the Government of Canada. Because I have, for several years, supported the idea of a Senate having on a suspensive veto, even with respect to legislation touching its own powers, I am quite content with the present provisions.

In clause 52 the primacy of the Constitution is proclaimed, and the many acts, orders and amendments thereto which form part of it are specified. That provision is extremely important to ensure the paramountcy of the Charter of Rights contained in the Constitution over other legislation. I am disappointed, however, that there is not a further clause which asserts that this paramountcy applies as well to orders, rules and regulations made pursuant to the legislation, because, as I am sure most of us are aware, many infringements on, and violations of, civil and legal rights have occurred because of the application of regulations which have not been approved or, often, even scrutinized by legislators. Such a provision was contained in some of the draft Charters of Rights which were considered by the first ministers over the past few years, but it has not appeared in any of the draft resolutions which we have considered in the last 14 months. That is a pity, and an omission which, I trust, will one day soon be rectified.

Many people, and some parliamentary leaders, including my own, may not be as happy with the present amending formula as they were with the first proposal, but I am. I have been a resident of Ontario for many years, and, of course, I represent that province here. However, I have also lived in many parts of Canada. I did not like the first so-called Victoria amending formula, because it would have given a veto to Ontario and Quebec for all time, regardless of how different the demography of Canada may be 100 years from now. Either one of those provinces still has a virtual veto for the foreseeable future, provided it can marshal enough support from a reasonable number of other provinces. To me, this formula is much more equitable for all components of Confederation.

The referendum provisions are gone, and that relieves my mind. I have always believed that a referendum procedure should be very severely restricted as to the occasions upon which it is used, and confined, when used, to single, clear-cut issues. The complexities involved in constitutional amendments are, in my view, beyond the ability of elected representatives of the people, or laymen learned in political science and constitutional law, to explain in simple terms, without passion or bias, to the people who would vote. The responsibility for making decisions on constitutional amendments must remain with our elected representatives and governments.

The inclusion of linguistic rights in the Charter has been, for many of us, an achievement, but for others a disappointment, because the recognition and enforcement of those rights do not go far enough. I understand and sympathize with the frustration of the latter group, and can only hope that the present Charter will be the goad and inspiration for all Canadians and the provinces in which they reside to give broader and, hopefully, legislative recognition to our English and French heritages and languages.

The greatest sadness and concern for all of us in this chamber, as we prepare to vote on this historic resolution, which will make our Constitution truly Canadian, and give us a renewed and strengthened Charter of Rights, is that the Government of Quebec could not bring itself to join in the Accord. In that regard, much as I respect our colleague Senator Asselin, and admire his devotion to his province, I cannot accept without reservation his interpretation of certain events during the negotiations which led to the adoption of the recent Accord on the Constitution without Quebec's consent. I believe that we here are all federalists who want nothing more warmly than to have every government in our Confederation join in this resolution, even though certain of them may have misgivings or reservations about particular elements of it. It is regrettable that the Premier of Quebec has denied his province the right to participate because he had to protect and re-affirm his separatist status with his supporters. He was given room to manoeuvre and to negotiate in order to protect and enhance the unique quality of his province within Confederation. However, after he apparently outmanoeuvred himself and his province, he has chosen simply to deride and to threaten. The events of the past weekend suggest that the premier may not be able to ride the whirlwind created by his intemperate talk and actions over the past few weeks.

I want my Quebec cousins to remain with us in Canada, and I do believe, in spite of a nagging worry when I read and hear some of the comments that are made, that the great majority of them also desire that for themselves and their children. I hope that those people will soon be given the opportunity to elect a new government in Quebec which believes in its future within Canada, even though it feels that changes in its status are still necessary.

When we receive this new Constitution of Canada, let us all remember that Quebec is very much a part of it. Let us remind her that we will always want her to be a part of Canada, a very special part, and that we also understand why she feels she must still struggle for a special recognition which she considers vital to her existence.

One of our eminent French-Canadian historians, Jacques Monet, has just complete a series of fascinating articles in the Globe and Mail on the history of Quebec. He concluded the series with the words of another French-Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

"Canada," he said, "has been the inspiration of my life. I have had before me as a pillar of fire by night and a pillar of cloud by day a policy of true Canadianism, of moderation, of conciliation . . . In all the difficulties, all the pains, and all the vicissitudes of our situation, let us always remember that love is better than hatred, and faith better than doubt, and let hope in our future destinies be the pillar of fire to guide us in our career."

Those words remind us that our country was conceived in pain, and that it has evolved in doubt, but they also inspire us to move with determination towards the goal of a harmonious unity, and with the undiminished hope that we shall attain that goal.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, would the honourable senator permit a question? I put it only to clear up a possible misunderstanding that I would not want on the record.

The honourable senator said she was disappointed "that there is not a further clause which asserts that this paramountcy applies as well to orders, rules and regulations made pursuant to legislation." As honourable senators know, I am Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. For seven or eight years we have operated on the basis that regulations are law with the same legal effect as statutes. I wonder if the honourable senator is aware that in the Statutory Instruments Act a regulation is defined as something having a legislative effect. Regulations are known in the vernacular, in legal circles, as subordinate legislation, subordinate law. The provision in section 52 as to "any law" surely applies to regulations as well.

Senator Neiman: Senator Godfrey, you may be and probably are entirely right; you are always right.

Senator Hicks: I wouldn't go quite that far!

Senator Frith: Call in the members!

Senator Neiman: If my memory serves me correctly, Professor Walter Tarnopolsky expressed doubts on this very question. He has argued that, because of certain judicial decisions, it is not clear whether regulations would in fact be subject to a Bill of Rights or to a Charter of Rights. He formulated a provision, to which I referred, which was included in the earlier draft charters which were discussed by the first ministers. Professor Tarnopolsky felt that it was necessary to have that additional provision included, just to remove any doubt whatsoever. I am inclined to agree with him.

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, my participation in the debate will be limited to the motion of Senator Perrault on the Constitution Act of 1981, and I shall be brief. I must admit that I am very disappointed in certain aspects of this act. First of all, the Charter of Rights entrenched in the act does not contain what I consider to be indispensable, namely, the right to enjoyment of property, which I discussed on March 18 of this year. The right to enjoyment of property is fundamental in a democracy. It is also essential under a free market system, as it enables the individual to improve his circumstances as far as he is able, without being prevented from doing so by any arbitrary decision of the state to impose a new division of wealth in order to achieve political or ideological ends. In other words, the profile of our society depends on the freedom of citizens to choose their way of life and to improve or change it.

It is unnatural for a country like Canada not to include the right to enjoyment of property among its fundamental freedoms, since after all, property is the reward for work in a free enterprise society.

Removing the right to enjoyment of property goes against our Canadian way of life. It makes nationalization easier and even acceptable. It makes the state the repository of tremendous financial power and of rewards for the individual, which in fact gives the state absolute control over the welfare and values of its citizens.

I hope that this right can later be entrenched in the Charter of Rights according to the provision for subsequent amendments.

Another aspect of the resolution which I regret is of course related to the absence of Quebec from the agreement. As Senator Manning and several others said so eloquently last week and this week, it is hard to imagine the coming into being of this act without the participation of Quebec.

Serious attempts to remedy the situation have been made, and I am thinking of the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, who, despite the flexibility and patience he showed in trying to reconcile the differences of both parties, was nevertheless turned down by Mr. Lévesque. And that is why, last week, I supported a resolution by Senator Flynn aimed at making a last effort to obtain the agreement of the Government of Quebec.

However, as I again realized this weekend, the option of the present Government of Quebec, and in fact the raison d'être of the Parti Québécois, is to persuade the province to separate from the rest of Canada, in other words, to break up Canada as we know it today.

Although I do not share his views, I respect the right of Mr. Lévesque and the members of his political party to work towards that objective, as long as they do so democratically and without using public funds.

We should not be surprised at their refusal to continue negotiations, since an agreement would be incompatible with their political objectives. You all know, honourable senators, the history of the negotiations on the amending formula that took place among the eight provinces who, at the time, were opposed to the resolution. The Accord was signed in April and a common front was the result, falling apart suddenly when Quebec opted for amendment by referendum.

Thus, the mere fact of suggesting the referendum formula which had not been accepted by the seven other provinces, basically meant that Quebec no longer wished to be associated with them. Is it so surprising that they should decide to accept the amending formula we are now considering? Mr. Lévesque claims that he gave up Quebec's veto right for the sake of obtaining fiscal compensation for opting-out. I fail to understand the reasoning behind this, because it looks too much like swapping principles for fiscal compensation.

Nevertheless, the issues at hand are always negotiable, even after the new act is passed. I have always believed in our democratic institutions and the good faith of partners in a federation such as ours.

The Constitutional Act provides for an amending mechanism that will no doubt be used if Quebec's rights are tampered with. Were those conditions of good faith to disappear and Quebec be harmed, I would be the first to support Quebec's separation from Canada.

In certain circles, there may be some surprise at my attitude concerning this proposal, and I may be accused of lacking in patriotism. Beforehand, my answer is that I have no lesson to learn from anybody on that matter. As a Quebecer and a Canadian, when I was needed to defend the principles of freedom that existed in this country during the Second World War, I answered the call of my own free will.

Today, in a different way, I feel I am just as patriotic in putting forward in this chamber my deep convictions on the future of Quebec and Canada.

It would have been much easier for me to vote against the proposal. But in so doing, I would not be reflecting the views submitted to me by a great number of Quebecers of all geographic, economic and social sectors in Quebec.

Honourable senators, I would have much preferred simple patriation with an amending formula. But the provinces we are representing have now concurred in the resolution, and I say this of course in the light of the suggestions I made a few minutes ago, concerning the Quebec government. I know that this Charter of Rights is not perfect, it does not include what I feel are basic rights, such as the right to life, property rights and so forth. It will never be satisfactory for everyone. But when it is enacted, I am confident that all Canadians will be in a position through that amending process, to bring changes that are acceptable to those who do not feel easy in the present context. As I said earlier, I have confidence in the good faith and sound judgment of all partners to the Canadian Confederation.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Madam Speaker, may I rise on a point of order? I had rather hoped that Senator Marchand would be in the Chair, but I see that he is not. Nonetheless, I think I should proceed with my point of order at this time.

As I have said in previous speeches in this house, there may well be a serious impediment to the power of His Honour the Speaker to put this question to the Senate later this day.

I have been reluctant to raise this point of order in the face of the overwhelming significance of the matter before us and because of the political impetus it has attained. However, I do not want us to lose our perspective in the face of immediacy and in the face of the sense of occasion.

A great judge once said, and I am afraid I must paraphrase, that the rule of law is bound up in the interstices of procedure. It is the rule of law that we must sustain, honourable senators, in this chamber in the midst of an on-rushing wave of political expediency.

Section 4 of the Senate and House of Commons Act limits the exercise of the powers of the Senate insofar as the same are inconsistent with or are repugnant to the British North America Act of 1867. The resolution before the chamber now is inconsistent with and is repugnant to the British North America Act, 1867, and is acknowledged to be so by the present government and has been found to be so by the Supreme Court of Canada. Therefore, may I ask the Speaker for a ruling as to whether the motion before us is in order?

[Senator Charbonneau.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Are you asking for a ruling on whether the motion is in order, or on whether there is some impediment to the question's being put? In other words, are you asking whether the resolution itself is in order, or whether there is an impediment to the Speaker's putting the question?

Senator Lang: As to whether the question can be put.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suggest, for the consideration of the Speaker and other honourable senators, that the ruling on this point of order be deferred until later this afternoon.

Senator Lang: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: In support of the point of order, could I say a few words which could also be taken into consideration by the Speaker? Honourable senators, I shall be very brief; I support the point of order raised by the Honourable Senator Lang. I submit that this project is unconstitutional according to the conventions which concern my province, Quebec, which has refused to give its agreement. I would like to make the following points: First, the Supreme Court has judged that this proposal affects the powers of the provinces, including Quebec. This was a unanimous decision.

Second, the Quebec premier came to the last conference with a mandate from the Quebec National Assembly to oppose any action which would affect its powers without its consent.

Third, the Supreme Court stated that there was no rule of law to prevent the government from proceeding with this unconstitutional action according to conventions.

Fourth, the decision of the Supreme Court does not affect the Standing Orders of the Senate. The Supreme Court does not make the law; it only interprets its. If, according to our customs and traditions, our rules prevent us from giving passage to unconstitutional legislation, I ask you, Your Honour, to state that this resolution proposal is out of order as it will reduce permanently the powers of Quebec without its consent. May I add that I would be very happy for His Honour the Speaker to consider this point of order and give his decision immediately before the vote. As former Speaker, I want to add that I shall respect the decision of the Speaker, whatever it may be, and that I shall certainly not appeal it.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just a word in favour of the propriety of the resolution and against the point of order. I agree with Senator Deschatelets's observation that it is not up to the courts to rule on the propriety or impropriety of a resolution or certain procedures in Parliament. If it is asked to, of course, the court may rule on the legality of certain procedures, just as it did; but with respect to our procedure I ask His Honour the Speaker to take into account the fact that our rules clearly provide for a resolution of the kind that is before us, namely, for an Address to Her Majesty. That is specifically and impliedly authorized by the rules, and any resolution in that category, it seems to me, is therefore properly before us. It is an inevitable corollary thereto that, if the resolution is properly before us, it is proper for it to be put to the Senate for a vote.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret that I was absent when this discussion took place. If you will allow me some time to consider the matter, I will tell you what I think later on.

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, if I may, we would appreciate it if you could give your ruling a few moments before the vote.

The Hon. the Speaker: Could I simply ask a question for my own enlightenment? Is it a question of determining the legality or the illegality of the resolution? If it is, I do not think that I have the authority to make such a judgement.

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you could simply defer your decision until you are ready to give it, as long as it is before the vote.

Senator Asselin: Are we to understand that it would be before the vote?

Senator Frith: Yes, before the vote.

Senator Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, would it be possible, so as not to delay our proceedings and prevent the honourable senators from making their comments, for you to inform us of the suggestion made by Mr. Lang and myself?

Senator Frith: And also by myself.

The Hon. the Speaker: I agree with pleasure to postpone my decision.

[English]

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, after many months of intense bargaining, bickering and bartering between the governments of the provinces and the Government of Canada and among the three national parties represented in Parliament, we finally have before us a resolution resulting from an Accord signed by the governments of nine provinces and the Government of Canada. It has received the sanction of the House of Commons. It now requires only the approval of the Senate and concurrence by Westminster to achieve a goal or purpose that has been sought for many years.

We Canadians will then have our own Constitution in Canada. The last remaining symbol of full and complete nationhood will become ours. It will reside here in Canada. That in itself will make worthwhile all of the anguish and anxiety, the pain and the punishment that we have endured.

But it is much more than a symbol. It will be a working document or instrument that wise politicians, and perhaps even some few statesmen, may use as a foundation upon which to build a truly great, although diverse, Canada. God knows, we know our diversity. We have laboured mightily to prove it, to stress it more in negative than positive terms. But we now have almost within our firm grasp our Constitution, with an imperfect, yet basic Charter of Rights and Freedoms and with an amending formula.

That last element, honourable senators, the amending formula, is the most vital part of the resolution now before us. It, too, is imperfect, but it is the best that can now be achieved at this point in time without losing the existing federal-provincial Accord. With the amending formula, the process—and it will be a long and difficult process—of improving the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the protection of individual Canadian citizens from the excesses of government, the process of exchanging respective powers and responsibilities between the respective levels of government, all of these can then begin in earnest.

We must understand that this resolution is not the end of constitution-making; it is only the beginning. Aside from the inadequate and what I believe to be the shamefully watered-down Charter of Rights and Freedoms, all we are really doing at this time is establishing the framework or the ground rules within which the Canadian and the provincial governments must negotiate to build a stronger and more respectable Constitution, a framework within which they will agree upon exchanges of powers and responsibilities to better serve the needs of our people and our nation.

Why do we need a stronger Charter of Rights, one that will avoid the inevitable checkerboard result of the current proposal that was so diluted by provincial demands and pressures? Some do not support even this weak version. They would retain the current system whereby citizens can be separated from their basic rights and freedoms, in varying degrees, from province to province.

In listening to and reading the remarks in the debate by various "status quo" senators, it appears that Senator Manning—and I regret that he is not present at the moment—is their most vociferous spokesman. Here are his words as recorded at page 3168 of the Debates of the Senate, of December 3, 1981. He said:

The British tradition with respect to the supremacy of Parliament, that had been our heritage since our birth as a nation, was to be set aside, and our Constitution was to be Americanized.

Very strange, indeed. Senator Manning further stated:

No longer were the people's representatives to be trusted with the guardianship of citizens's rights; instead, these rights were to be spelled out and entrenched in the Constitution and henceforth the appointed judges of the courts, not the elected representatives of the people, would be the guardians of citizens' rights and the adjudicators when those rights were in dispute.

Not surprisingly, the committee was unable to reach a consensus, and a further First Ministers' Conference resulted in eight of the ten provincial governments rejecting the federal proposals.

At page 3169 of Debates of the Senate, Senator Manning is reported as saying:

—we have a Charter that requires the abandonment of the long-standing British tradition under which Canada's parliamentary democracy has operated successfully for over 100 years.

So, Senator Manning and others would leave Canadian citizens to the tender mercies of the elected provincial representatives. What is the record of their "tender mercies" to their fellow citizens?

Let us look at the record and let us start with Alberta. For years, the Government of Alberta, by legislation, deprived the Hutterites, a people of different religious values, of their basic property rights as Canadian citizens. I need not elaborate on that matter because Senator Manning, as a former Premier of Alberta, is intimately familiar with all the deplorable details. At the close of World War II, the Alberta government was quick to compound the discrimination of the federal government by demanding that it remove as quickly as possible from Alberta's soil those Canadian citizens who, by reason of their Japanese heritage, were there in Alberta as internees. We also remember the legislation of Alberta that would have stifled freedom of the press and which had to be struck down.

Every province in Canada has discriminated to varying degrees against its black citizens, be they of long-standing citizenship or more recent immigrants.

Quebec became notorious for its discrimination on religious grounds against Jehovah's Witnesses.

All provinces have, along with the federal authority, discriminated against our aboriginal peoples almost, in some areas, to the point of genocide.

British Columbia does not have an enviable record in dealing with its citizens of Chinese and Japanese origin.

All provinces, at various times, have enforced the most despicable land expropriation practices against their own citizens.

Some provisions of Bill 22 and Bill 101 in Quebec have been obnoxious to both francophones and anglophones. Discriminating practices of the business and commercial elite of Quebec have been equally unfair and obnoxious to all Quebecers.

For decades, in my own province of New Brunswick, the record of discrimination by governments of both political persuasions towards, not only the minority Acadian community, but most rural residents of the province, in the lack of equality in education, health and social services, was an absolute disgrace.

In Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the covert practices of provincial governments to assimilate and refuse elementary cultural recognition and services to their francophone communities; and in my area, the Acadian communities, have been highly discriminatory.

[Senator McElman.]

The refusal of official basic recognition of its major franco-phone community by the Government of Ontario is beyond all understanding. It is also the cause of much understandable reaction in the province of Quebec.

The list of discriminations and the denial of human rights by provincial governments is long, notorious, noxious and unacceptable. Yet, Senator Manning speaks for those premiers who have watered down the Charter for the most obvious and unwarranted reasons, as they long for a retention of what he refers to as:

—the long-standing British tradition under which Canada's parliamentary democracy has operated successfully for over 100 years.

Honourable senators, each and all of our provincial and federal governments have legislated and practised discrimination. That is why we desperately need even this watered-down Charter and also why we need the amending formula, eventually to eliminate the capability of governments to continue to discriminate against their citizens. The "good old days" were really not the good old days at all, and the remnants of those prejudicial and discriminatory practices must eventually be eliminated.

That is what Canadians want, irrespective of the delaying tactics of some of their provincial governments, and governments that do not at least stay abreast of their electors' wishes will suffer the results so recently experienced by the Lyon government in Manitoba. Canadians want this Charter, even with its imperfections, and they will continue to demand that it be improved and the imperfections removed, and that is as it should be.

Let me turn now to the regrettable circumstances that find the Government of Quebec as the only non-signatory to the constitutional Accord.

Some honourable senators opposite have gone to great lengths to blame the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau, and the federal members of Parliament and cabinet ministers from Quebec for this undesirable situation. In my opinion, those senators are unwittingly, or witlessly, playing the game of Mr. René Lévesque and his PQ Party and government.

Yesterday, Senator Asselin stated that the Quebec veto had been "brushed aside," and he referred to Quebec's "isolation." He said that Quebec had been "badly represented" by its MPs in Ottawa. He referred to what he termed the "provocative" attitude of Quebec cabinet ministers in the federal government. He heaped scorn and some condemnation upon them. He did not go quite so far as to refer to them as "traitors", as has been done by some PQ sympathizers of recent days, and as Mr. René Lévesque has done in the not-distant past.

Senator Asselin also referred several times to the "nine English-speaking provinces." May I remind him once again, as I have felt compelled to do on occasions in the past, that my province, the province of New Brunswick, is the only officially-bilingual province in Canada, thanks to the government of the Honourable Louis Robichaud which began that laudable process and the now government of the Honourable Richard Hatfield, which has continued and strengthened it. Our development as a bilingual province is still incomplete and imperfect, but we are making good progress, and we did not wait for legislative perfection before we began such implementation.

I share the pride and sense of satisfaction with my fellow New Brunswickers that our bilingual status will now be firmly entrenched in our new Constitution. I only wish that the government of the great and powerful province of Ontario would follow the good example of my own small province. Such a step in equity and statesmanship by Ontario would help immensely in overcoming current feelings of distrust, resentment and frustration within our federation.

Let us return to the accusations of some honourable senators. Senator Asselin deplored what he termed "Quebec's isolation." We all share his regret, but who is responsible for that isolation? Certainly not Pierre Trudeau.

Senator Flynn: Well, perhaps Jean Chrétien.

Senator McElman: And certainly not Jean Chrétien. Let us have a look at the facts. Mr. Trudeau has spent the whole of his public life promoting and developing a country in which Quebecers and all of us could feel comfortable and at home in all its parts. Mr. Lévesque, not Mr. Trudeau, founded the PQ Party.

Senator Flynn: Because of Mr. Trudeau.

Senator McElman: He did so to isolate Quebec from the rest of Canada. Let us not forget his purpose. It was Mr. Lévesque, not Mr. Trudeau, who "brushed aside" any claim Quebec may have had of an absolute veto in constitutional matters.

Senator Flynn: So what? You are speaking from both sides of your mouth.

Senator McElman: Confident that he had charmed the majority of his fellow premiers to believe, as Mr. Sterling Lyon put it, "that he is a great Canadian," Mr. Lévesque gave away, "brushed aside," weakened, dissipated any claim to veto, either real or perceived, that Quebec may have had. He did so as part of the Accord by eight provinces that he, Mr. Lévesque, not Mr. Trudeau, officially signed on behalf of the great province of Quebec. He did so because he was confident that that Accord, as concocted, was absolutely unacceptable to the Prime Minister and the federal Government of Canada, including those Quebec MPs and cabinet ministers who are now being condemned by Senator Asselin and others.

While Mr. Lévesque was concocting this scheme that "brushed aside"—Senator Asselin's own words—and gave away any claim Quebec may have had to a constitutional veto, what were Mr. Trudeau, his government, and the Quebec MPs and cabinet ministers doing? They were trying desperately to convince all the premiers of all the provinces, including Mr. Lévesque, to accept and approve an amending formula that would have given the provinces of Quebec and Ontario a constitutional veto in perpetuity. That is what Mr. Trudeau was doing.

Senator Flynn: At the beginning, yes.

Senator McElman: I would ask Senator Asselin and other honourable senators: Who "brushed aside" Quebec's claim to a veto? I think we should keep the record straight on that score. Mr. Lévesque negotiated it away. In Senator Asselin's words, Mr. Lévesque "badly represented" the people of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: Not as badly as Pierre Trudeau.

Senator McElman: English-speaking Canada did not "abandon" Quebec as Senator Asselin suggested. Mr. Lévesque abandoned his principles and his province in his deceptive attempt to solidify the deadlock. In trying to mislead all premiers into an unacceptable Accord and into an immovable and intransigent position, one that could only continue the deadlock and one that would prevent any hope of achieving agreement by the Government of Canada, he tried to become too clever by half and he did not bargain in good faith. He tried to be clever—deceptively so. He tried to impress his fellow premiers with his appearance of moderation but, finally, his deception became clear to his fellow premiers. The mask fell off and his fellow premiers again saw the true face of the obstructionist, the dedicated separatist, and those premiers woke up again from their charmed state to adopt the sense of appreciation of the Canadian way of compromise.

Senator Flynn: And punished Quebec in the process.

Senator McElman: They found a receptive Prime Minister and federal government waiting to negotiate in good faith, waiting to compromise, waiting to join in bringing home our Constitution, and waiting to get on with the job of building a greater, stronger Canada, a Canada that will be more sensitive to the needs, the rights and the freedoms of its citizens.

As the deceptive mask of moderation and sweet reason fell away from the face of Mr. Lévesque at the First Ministers' Conference, so last weekend did the mask fall away from the face of the PQ government and party.

Senator Flynn: Your own mask will fall soon.

Senator McElman: The first rule in dealing with a pressing danger is the act of seeing and recognizing that danger for what it is. The real face of the PQ Party is separation—sovereignty without association. It is dedicated to that purpose. It was a good, revealing weekend for the people of the province of Quebec and for the people of all of Canada. Mr. Lévesque is shaken. He is now threatening his own followers. They have the same end purpose that he espoused long ago, but they are now moving too fast for him. They have destroyed his devised image of moderation, compromise and reasonableness. They are destroying his grand step-by-step plan for separation through gradualism, his plan to have Quebecers follow him piece by piece, step by step, until the day arrived when there could be no turning back and the last step to separation would inevitably be taken.

Gradualism means the gradual destruction of the Canada that most of us know and love. Imperfect as it is, it is still the best nation in the world of which to be, or become, a proud citizen.

Now it is up to the people of Quebec and all of us, as people who believe in the future of Canada, to do all possible to keep the true face of the PQ Party and government and Mr. Lévesque foremost in our minds, to frustrate their purpose of destroying Quebec and Canada, and to contribute to their defeat at the first possible opportunity. That is our responsibility, our duty as Canadians, who believe in our federal state and our nation.

Senator Flynn: You re-elected them the last time.

Senator McElman: Having defeated the PQ Party and Mr. Lévesque, the people of Quebec can then use this renewed and revitalized Constitution as their vehicle, their instrument, and again get on with the job of solidifying and strengthening their place in a whole Canada—a Canada that is becoming ever more receptive to change and improvement; a Canada that is becoming increasingly sensitive to the needs and human aspirations of its people, wherever they may live; a new kind of Canada that Pierre Trudeau has tried so hard and so long to bring into being—Senator Flynn: And badly.

Senator McElman:—despite slings and arrows, despite adversity and setbacks, and despite the distrust, dislike and even hatred that some have tried so continuously to stir up against him personally.

So, there it is in all its stark reality: Trudeau the builder; Trudeau the federalist; Trudeau the dedicated Canadian;—

Senator Flynn: The centralist.

Senator McElman:—and opposed to him we have Mr. Lévesque and the PQ, the destroyers; Mr. Lévesque and the PQ, the anti-federalists; Mr. Lévesque and the PQ, the dedicated separatists. So, let us not confuse the players or their opposing purposes in this vital business of nation building, as some have been doing of late.

I implore those who have been deceived into giving comfort to the now clearly recognizable enemy of Quebec and Canada to stop doing so.

Honourable senators, on a more pleasant note let me congratulate the Honourable Louis Robichaud for the stirring speech he made in this debate. It was “vintage Louis,” and I subscribe to all that he said. He continues to be a wholly dedicated Canadian, despite his detractors.

Permit me also to pay tribute to the strong, leading and constructive role that the current Premier of New Brunswick, the Honourable Richard Hatfield, has played throughout these long and tedious constitutional conferences, debates and negotiations. He, too, is a respected and totally dedicated Canadian.

We New Brunswickers, we Maritimers, we of the Atlantic provinces, are gratified that the new Constitution will include a dedication to the principles of equalization, alleviation of regional disparities, and the equality of opportunity for Canadians in all parts of Canada.

The people of the Atlantic provinces are looking forward to the day, hopefully soon, when we will contribute much more to the economic and fiscal well-being of our nation. We will gladly share the benefits of our new-found wealth with those Canadians who have so generously shared with us.

Before closing, honourable senators, let me express my delight with the elimination of the provision for referenda from this constitutional resolution.

I remember well the words of a wise old parliamentarian at the 1979 meeting of the Canada-European Community Inter-parliamentary Group held in the Conference Centre here in Ottawa. There was a discussion of the pros and cons of referenda. Herr. K. U. Von Hesse, of West Germany, a former President of the Bundestag, defined the word “referendum”. He said it means “a carnival for demagogues.” I share that view. I believe that referenda, in such a diverse and ever more regionalized Canada, can only be divisive and destructive. I am relieved and gratified that that provision has been eliminated.

Finally, honourable senators, let me refer to section 47, which eliminates the absolute veto of the Senate in reference to amendment of the proposed Constitution.

It is no secret to honourable senators that I opposed such a proposal in the earlier resolution; that I fought it out nose to nose with both the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister and was gratified when it was removed from the earlier proposal. But now it is back. This time, however, it is back not only with the approval of the Government of Canada and the elected members of the House of Commons, but it also has the approval and support of the elected governments of nine of the ten provinces. That changes the situation drastically from its earlier appearance.

I will reluctantly accept this expression of the will and agreed wish of the elected representatives of the people, both federal and provincial.

It is my hope that, with the incentive of this provision, the Senate will finally determine and express forcefully its proposals for modification, reform and effective improvement of this house of Parliament.

I would also hope that the House of Commons will reform and reinvigorate itself, as it surely needs to do. With both houses reformed, the people could again be properly and effectively represented by their acknowledged representatives, without imbalance of influence by the executive and the bureaucracy.

Honourable senators, I will support this resolution.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to participate in this historic debate on the constitutional resolution as changed by the federal-provincial first ministers' Accord of November 5, 1981, precipitated by the historic September 28 decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Some speakers on this debate have noted, others have emphasized strongly, and still others have deplored, the weakening of the original constitutional amendments. After much tense negotiation and bartering, we now have before us a compromise Constitution. Due to the intransigence and narrow-mindedness of some provincial premiers, the shortcomings of the Accord have allowed increased provincialization and decreased Canadianization in this country.

The amending formula makes the Constitution mostly an inter-governmental affair. The Accord also reduces most of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to little more than guidelines, which the provincial legislatures may override.

It was sad to hear so many federal legislators say that they willingly and gladly accept an imperfect formula without seizing this unique opportunity to try to present proposals and amendments for improvement or, at least, to try to suggest improvements.

Before coming to the crux of my speech, I should like to state that there are, however, some good sections in this Constitution Act, 1981, especially in part I, entitled "Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms". I wish to refer to section 27 in particular relating to multiculturalism, which was referred to and commented on by Senator Argue, Senator Yuzyk and Senator Bielish earlier today.

When the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, on October 8, 1971, made the declaration in the other place, of his government's official policy of multiculturalism, he stated that within the context of both official languages of Canada there is no official culture, no culture that supersedes the other, and that the policy of multiculturalism will be promoted by the Government of Canada not only to recognize the cultural heritage of all Canadians, but also to assist them in preserving that culture, in developing it, and in sharing it with their fellow Canadians.

He also stated on that occasion that we cannot force anybody nor legislate anyone to preserve their cultural heritage. This is what I want to underline and bring to the attention of Senator Yuzyk, in particular, that the Prime Minister stated on that day that it is really up to the ethno-cultural groups themselves—it is up to their own will of survival, if they wish to retain their cultural heritage.

As the first Minister of State for Multiculturalism responsible for the implementation of that policy, I am proud to see that it has been further improved, so that today we have many programs in place which assist Canadians, not only to preserve their culture, but also to preserve their heritage languages.

I think that one of the essential duties of a legislator is to protect the weak, the disadvantaged and the voiceless. The weakest and most disadvantaged in human society is the unborn child. That is why in my speech in support of the Constitution in this chamber on March 26 last I expressed, as reported in Hansard on page 2182, the desirability of "words to protect more clearly the rights of the unborn".

Along with Senator Sullivan, I believe the unborn child has many rights. As he stated, for example, the right to life, the right to share in an inheritance, in disability and workmen's compensation benefits. A mother should be able to sue for the support of her unborn child, and she should be able to hold a defendant liable for injuries sustained by her unborn child, as a result of accident or assault.

Honourable senators, in some countries a pregnant woman convicted of a capital crime may not be executed until after her baby is born. That is why I commend Senator Sullivan for his motion on December 4 to amend section 7 of the Charter so as to include reference to the unborn child. Unborn children are really members of our human family. That is why I believe that legislators have an obligation to see that their fundamental rights are protected. I also accept the premise that the fertilized ovum is a developing baby. In doing so, I am not enunciating a sectarian or theological viewpoint, for it is biology, not any religious faith, that tells us that a fertilized ovum is the earliest form of human life. I was shocked, as I believe many honourable senators and Canadians were, to learn last week of the announcement by Statistics Canada that in 1980, 65,751 lives of unborn children were snuffed out. Today, we have that many less boys and girls who could be growing up in this beautiful, rich country, and later developing into men and women contributing to the welfare of Canada and mankind.

Senator Sullivan: That is a good expression—"snuffed out."

Senator Haidasz: There were 65,751 lives snuffed out. That is almost twice as many as the 38,584 Canadians who died of cancer in 1980. It is even more than the 50,613 Canadians who died of coronary heart disease in 1980. These deaths, including the snuffed-out lives numbering 65,751, are a great tragedy. They are a great loss to Canada.

• (1340)

Honourable senators, although Senator Sullivan's amendment is commendable, I have been told that there exists some doubt in legal circles that the honourable senator's amendment will truly and completely guarantee full protection for the unborn in this country, because there is the federal-provincial override section, which will allow Parliament to overrule section 7. Furthermore, even without the override, there is still a great deal of uncertainty over the meaning of the phrase in section 7, which reads:

—except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Apparently, few people have come to realize the full weight and meaning of section 28 of the proposed Charter. The inclusion of the word "persons" in section 28 categorically denies any protection to the unborn child. That is based on the fact that in the U.S. Supreme Court abortion decision, in Roe v. Wade, the court held that "person" did not include the unborn child. That U.S. case has been quoted with approval by Canadian courts in the Dehler v. Ottawa Civic Hospital case, which held that the unborn child had no rights until birth. So any law of Parliament to protect the unborn child could be considered by the courts as an imbalance between the rights of an individual, recognized as such by law—namely, the mother—and those of an unborn child, recognized in law as being only capable of asserting rights after birth.

It should also be noted that in section 15(1), dealing with equality rights, the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, replaced the word “everyone” by the word “individual,” apparently to make it clear that the section would apply to “persons” only.

Furthermore, it could be argued in the courts that section 28 of the Charter is paramount and has primacy over any other section—even section 33, the override section—because of the opening words “Notwithstanding anything in this Charter”.

Legal opinion also exists that should the Supreme Court of Canada hand down a decision in favour of abortion-on-demand, the Parliament of Canada would be unable to override that court decision.

It has always been a Canadian tradition to respect and protect human life in the mother's womb. Although the law on abortion was widened by Parliament in 1969, nevertheless the law has, as its purpose, the protection of the lives of unborn children.

In the light of the threat that is posed to the unborn children of Canada by sections 15 and 28, an amendment should be considered. It is therefore my intention to propose a positive amendment which will preserve the authority of Parliament to legislate on behalf of the rights of unborn children. It will not affect either the provincial governments or the legislative assemblies, and therefore will not upset the November 5 Accord. My amendment should also easily find acceptance with the Prime Minister, because it simply makes explicit what the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, in the House of Commons has already made implicit by his assurances that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms would not affect the authority of Parliament to deal with the rights of unborn children.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I therefore move, seconded by Senator McGrand:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended by

(a) adding after clause 31 the following new clause:

(b) by renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the same rule will apply in the case of this amendment, that, pursuant to the order adopted on December 2, 1981, the recorded vote is deferred.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to conclude my remarks by saying, on behalf of the voiceless and defenceless unborn children, that I strongly appeal to honourable senators to support my amendment. In doing so, I believe we shall truly protect the most fundamental right—namely, the right to life—without discrimination. We will then have that peace of mind and satisfaction from knowing that we have at least tried to do our best to improve our new Constitution. Finally, may God bless our efforts in this vital task of legislating for our people and in building a just and strong nation.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, the motion that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada poses for me what I believe to be the most difficult decision I have had to make in the almost 20 years that I have been in the Senate. I know that I am not the only one who is placed in that situation; nor am I the only one who will vote—as I intend to vote, unless in the meantime I am persuaded otherwise—with reservations and with some concern that the issue before us is not more clear-cut, is not one that has, as I believe it could have had, the full support of members of both houses and of all 10 provinces. Such support, of course, is not the case.

For those of us who from time to time have to weigh values one way or another, the values on each side of this matter are strong and many. My decision at the moment is that I will vote against the motion. I am fully aware, of course, that there are differing opinions. I am fully aware that it could be said that, generally speaking, the Canadian public would like to see the constitutional debate concluded and the matter disposed of. I believe that is so because they are probably fed up with the long process that has taken place and with the ad hoc way in which there has been pieced together what we are in future to call the Constitution of Canada.

I am happy that great improvements have been made about the original suggestion of the contents of the Address to Her Majesty the Queen. I am particularly glad that we are not now asked to approve a major step in constitution building which is completely—as it was at one time—unilateral, that is, a decision of the federal government, only one of the partners in Confederation, to push through these fundamental changes without the consent even of a majority of the provinces. Like many other senators, I regret that there is still an element of dissent among the partners. It is my view, and it has been and will continue to be, I think, that we will be making a very great mistake here today if we pass this motion. The mistake will be, in my view, that we will have possibly—and I use the word advisedly, and without any assurance—have made the separation of Quebec from our Confederation inevitable. I am not saying that I am certain that that is so, but I would think that all honourable senators would agree that there is the risk of such an eventuality, and perhaps a great risk.

The question I have to ask myself is, why take that risk? I must also ask myself the question, do we need to take it today? The answer that comes immediately is, No.

Why do we have to take this decision today? The whole history of the discussions that have taken place about the motion proves conclusively that to delay is the way to improve the whole situation. Over and over again, situations have arisen when we have seemed to be up against a stone wall. Hard work, negotiation, compromise, flexibility, made it possible for us to breach that wall, just as Joshua brought down the walls of Jericho by a miracle. The age of miracles is not past. In my view, it is not even past at this moment, in this respect. I think it is still possible that the Senate here today, instead of contributing, as it may well be contributing, to the break-up of our Confederation, can put itself historically in the position of saying, "The Senate saved Confederation".

I am not speaking with any great certainty. I am not saying that I know this is so. I do know, however, that there is a risk, and I do know that it is possible, down the road a few years, that the separation of Quebec will have taken place for one reason or another. If that happens, would anyone deny that any of us who are here or that historians looking back will say, "Wasn't the cause of it what the Senate did on that day in December 1981?" It may turn out that it was not the only cause, but certainly one of the major causes could well be what we are asked to do today.

Then I must ask myself, could we prevent it? Of course, we could. We could delay decision. We could recognize that persuasion is possible, even in the case of Mr. Lévesque. The one power that is left to the Senate at the moment is the power of persuasion, and there is no way, in my view, that we can exercise that power of persuasion, or that anyone else can exercise it, if we take action precipitately today.

I have to ask myself, what is the hurry? I asked this question during the debate in the last few days. I asked the deputy leader what the urgency was. I asked him if there was a deadline. I was told that I would be given the answer, but I have not had it. There is no evidence before me, or, I believe, before the Senate, that this is in the slightest degree urgent today. There has been some talk, of course, about getting the matter over to Westminster, and possibly having a new Constitution before us before Christmas. Is that a good reason for urgency? If there is risk, and if there is a possibility that delay can bring about the compromise that we need to make this a real Canadian Constitution, then why are we hurrying?

I would be much happier if we were being asked to create a Canadian Constitution here today. I have been one, and I am sure this includes every senator here, who has believed for a long time that the time is overdue for the so-called patriation of our Constitution. By "patriation" I thought we meant a Canadian Constitution based on a Canadian act of Parliament. I thought we were going to be able to say to anyone—to our American friends, particularly—"We do not want to hear any more about the fact that our Constitution is an act of the British Parliament. From now on we are going to say, 'It is an act of the Canadian Parliament.'" Nothing of the kind will be the result of this resolution.

This resolution provides for two acts, the Canada Act, which will be an act of the United Kingdom Parliament, and a schedule to that act, an annex, to be found at the back of the act, will be what is called the Constitution Act. This will not be an act enacted by the Parliament of Canada, but will appear as a schedule to an act of the British Parliament. Senator Donahoe stressed this point, and I noticed some honourable senators seemed surprised that he said that this was so.

The evidence of this, of course, is in the wording of the act as presented to us:

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom [we are] requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

That act will be the Canada Act. The Constitution Act, that has been talked about so much here, is set out in Schedule B of the act, and is enacted, not by the Canadian Parliament but by the United Kingdom Parliament. The words are:

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

So all our dreams of a Canadian Constitution, based on an act of the Canadian Parliament, are out the window.

I am concerned also with the suggestion that the Province of Quebec may, by mistake or otherwise, have alienated certain rights, particularly the veto right. It seems to me that that idea can only come from an assertion that the rights, whatever they may be, that we call provincial rights are government rights. Obviously, they are nothing of the kind. Section 92 of the B.N.A. Act makes it clear that these rights are invested in the legislatures. I would not want to make too much of that at the present time, but there has been no consent of the provinces to the alienation of any of their rights as enshrined in the B.N.A. Act. No legislature, so far, has voted to give up its rights. Obviously, the assumption is that the premiers—the governments—would eventually be able to carry their legislatures, and I am sure that is so; but this comes back, as far as I am concerned, to my objection to all this haste. How much better this whole process would be if there were some reasonable delay, and if arrangements had been made that every legislature in Canada, including Quebec, would, in due course, pass the necessary enactment to say, one after the other, "We"—each legislature, not each government—"approve what is being done." Obviously, this is not the case with regard to the resolution which is before us.

I have other reservations, as well. I share those which were indicated by Senator Haidasz and Senator Sullivan in their amendments. I find it difficult to believe that the partially enshrined Bill of Rights, while it provides for the right to life and liberty, assumes at the same time that the right to live is limited by the wording of the bill and by the judgment of the Supreme Court. Honourable senators, I am not a zealot on this subject. It is not a matter of religious faith or dogma with me. It is merely a feeling on my part that the right to live should be dealt with more specifically and realistically than it is in the proposed resolution.

I repeat, honourable senators, that I honestly believe that the Senate can prevent what may be a Canadian tragedy. It is for that reason that I supported Senator Flynn's motion that we defer debate until December 14. I had seriously considered offering an amendment which would have had the same effect. On consideration and consultation with my colleagues, I decided that it would not be an appropriate action to take at this time. There are two reasons for this decision, one of which is the order of the Senate that we will take a vote at 5 o'clock today. The other is that the normal wording would be the so-called "six months' hoist," which is always used to defeat a motion rather than to achieve the intended objective in this case, which is to delay the vote. My intention does, however, express my firm opinion that the Senate could cause a pause at this time. Surely, it would be fully within the great tradition of the Senate to suggest that we pause, think again, and try again. One could almost say that such an action would be the pre-exercising of the suspensive veto which we believe, in due course, will be one of our new powers, if it can be called a power.

Another means by which this pause could be brought about, of course, would be a delay in the proclamation of the act requested of the British Parliament. This was done upon the original proclamation of the British North America Act. The act was passed on March 19; it was proclaimed on May 22; and it came into force, as we all know, on July 1, 1867.

If the Senate does not think it good judgment to take the action that I have proposed, which is to delay, I would then suggest that consideration might be given to delaying the proclamation or the effective date of any act that may come to us from the British Parliament. In this way we will have another opportunity to consider this matter and to ensure that we will not, by taking a vote here today, break up our Confederation.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I want to thank you very much for allowing me to speak on this resolution. Some time ago the Prime Minister and the premiers decided to drop section 35 from the resolution. At that time I felt that all aboriginal peoples had been dropped from the rest of Canada. Since section 35 has been put back in by way of amendment, I feel a lot better standing here in the Senate chamber debating the Constitution.

Honourable senators, for the last four years I have been sitting here in the Senate chamber, living among the people of the south of Canada. Life in the north of Canada is different. People live there in isolation. I think that today we have two voices here in Ottawa, one from the House of Commons and one from the Senate. I think it should be realized that the people living in the north of Canada are Canadians. Up to now they have been living in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, but we understand that in the future both those territories may become provinces.

All honourable senators are aware that a couple of weeks ago the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories came to Ottawa and was here a week in an effort to get section 35 back into the Constitution. At that time it was said that the territories only have a population of 45,000, while the rest of Canada has a population of 24 million. It does not matter how large the population is; we will try to run our country. That is what we are here for. It does not matter how many people live up in the north. They have been living there for a long time, and I think they want to be represented in the Constitution.

We understand that there is a lot of activity going on in the north. People are beginning to realize this and to say that it should be put on to the rest of Canada. The people up there do not want to become part of Alberta, part of Manitoba or part of Saskatchewan. I believe that we want to control ourselves, just as the rest of Canada does.

A short time ago I travelled to other parts of Canada as a member of the Agriculture Committee. I am used to life on a farm. Here in Ottawa I live out in the country because I cannot stand living in the city. When I first moved to Ottawa I found it completely different from my homeland. I lived right in the middle of the city and every time I went out for a walk I found myself just staring at the buildings and missing the open country. I think the people who live in the north, in the territories, like to have the feeling of freedom. They do not like the closed-in feeling you get from living in a town or city. Up north, when they have to go some place, they have the feeling that they are free. They don't have to worry, when they get up in the morning, that somebody will tell them they have to go some place or have to do something. I think a lot of the time that is the way our culture works, especially for the people living up in the north.

I started working when I was 14. I can tell you that we don't have a lot of nice weather up north, so when a nice day does come along even the people with steady jobs will be out on the land, hunting. Somebody will ask you, "How come you didn't come to work today?" The answer is simple. "It's nice weather today and it is the only time I will get the chance to go out. If it's bad weather tomorrow, I'll come back to work."

I think sometimes the only way you should have to live is not to have somebody telling you what to do, and then if it's nice weather when you get up in the morning you can go and hunt.

Honourable senators, with respect to section 35 of the resolution and the proposed amendments to section 42, subsections (1)(e) and (1)(f), I would just remind you of the letter we received from George Braden, Co-Chairman of the Special Committee on the Constitution of Canada, Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories. You will recall that he wanted the Senate to vote against section 42, subsections (1)(e) and (1)(f). But I think, honourable senators, that, under section 37, with the constitutional conferences that will be convened in the future by the Prime Minister and premiers of the provinces, and with the participation of representatives of the Governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, there is no real need to amend section 42. As I say, I think it is covered by section 37, and by section 38 as well.

Honourable senators, I really haven't much to add to what I have said. I hope if we get the Constitution back to Canada that the people in the rest of Canada and the Government of Canada will listen to what the people of the north have to say with respect to the settlement of land claims. I know that there are organizations that have been fighting with the government for the last 15 or 20 years on this question and they haven't gotten anywhere. So, if the Constitution comes back to Canada with section 35 in it, the people of the north will have more of a chance in determining their own future, just as the rest of the country has now.

One other concern I have is for the people of the north living in Quebec and in Labrador. How much of a say will they have in the future with regard to land claim settlements? What power will the Inuit have when it comes time to speak to the people in the rest of the country through the premiers of the provinces? I hope they have more of a chance in the future than they have now.

Well, honourable senators, I think that is pretty well all I wanted to say. Thank you very much for listening to me.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, about a year ago, when this resolution was first put to us, you may recall that I became the "darling" of the Opposition.

Senator Roblin: You always are.

Senator Buckwold: Am I?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you.

Senator Roblin: Any time.

Senator Buckwold: For a change I even had complimentary remarks from the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Jacques Flynn, because I raised many issues on the resolution, not so much concerning its contents as the method of implementing it. You may recall that some of us felt that it was being imposed with a very short time limit. We were anxious to know about amendments. We were questioning how the public would be able to have an input. Again you will recall that the time limit was a bare few weeks. In my opinion, and in the opinion of many other members of this chamber, it was an outrage that the process should be so curtailed.

However, having looked at this matter over the last year I have seen many of those concerns taken care of by a parliamentary system of which I am proud. I can say it was a parliamentary system that was enhanced by a first-class opposition—and that shows the importance of a good opposition. The parliamentary process was strengthened by the pressure of public groups who wanted to have input, and improved by Parliament itself. For that I am truly grateful. I think it is a re-emphasis of the strength of our parliamentary system.

Having at that time, as I say, been the "darling" of the opposition, I can now tell you point blank that I will support this resolution with full heart, because I feel it has achieved at least some of the kinds of things I wanted to see in our Constitution.

A famous man was once asked the secret of his success. He replied to his questioner, "I cannot tell you the secret of success, but I can tell you the secret of failure—try to please everyone." I think there would have been a failure here if we had tried to have a Constitution that would meet with everyone's approval, because in the end we would have had an unworkable document and one which would really not meet the needs of the country. But as the result of the process I was referring to, honourable senators, it seems to me that we now have at least a workable document on which to build.

I am not happy with the "notwithstanding" clauses. My main support for the resolution does not lie in the fact that we are bringing our Constitution back to Canada. It lies in the fact that I am a firm believer in a Charter of Rights. I have spoken on several occasions on that subject. As one whose grandparents left a foreign country in order to escape persecution, I believe it is important to know that Canadians will have a Charter of Rights guaranteed by a Constitution. Those rights are watered down a little now, and for that reason I am not entirely happy with the Charter, but, again as I say, you cannot please everyone. It is a most difficult process we have been going through.

When I delivered my last utterances in this chamber about the importance of provincial rights, I emphasized the concerns of my province, Saskatchewan, over natural resources, native rights, interprovincial trade, multicultural protection, and these things, to a very great degree, have now been met in the resolution we have before us. If I may add a little levity, without in any way being irreverent, I am reminded by this constitutional process of the story of Moses coming down the mountain with the Ten Commandments. One of his lieutenants came upon a group of Israelites who were awaiting Moses and said, "I have had a look at the tablets, and there is some good news and some bad news. The good news is that we have reduced them to ten. The bad news is that adultery is still in." I am not in any way indicating my support for either aspect; I am merely saying that it is impossible to please everyone, and I felt that this might be an appropriate analogy.

In addition, I must pay tribute to the opposition, to the Canadian people who have led the fight, and to those in my province. I believe that Premier Blakeney and the deputy premier, Roy Romanow, have been very persuasive and influential in bringing about a meeting of the minds of at least nine of the premiers. I compliment Senator Asselin on the speech he made yesterday. I, too, am concerned about Quebec.

However, I am confident that the wisdom of the good people of Quebec will once again prevail. Quebecers will realize that what is happening here is not something that is being imposed by nine English-speaking premiers but, in fact, something that they would want Quebec to embrace. Eventually—and I will predict this for my friends who are giving us very dire warnings—their wisdom and genuine intelligence will bring Quebecers to an appreciation of the fact that it is in their interests, as well as the interests of Canada, to live together with their fellow citizens under this Constitution. Having said that, I want to indicate once again that I will support this resolution.

I thank all of you who have participated in the debate, and I reiterate my great confidence in this whole process of Parliament as we have seen it. However, I have one last thought. It seems to me now that we should begin thinking of the amendments that are necessary to make this country work even better. For example, with regard to elected representation in the national Parliament, we find ourselves in a country in which we do not seem to have national parties. This is a topic with which, I feel, both houses must deal. It may end up, for example, in a proportionately elected Senate. At the moment, however, it seems that our system precludes this situation. There is a wide variety of necessary changes.

I shall conclude by saying to my friend, Senator Grosart, who closed his remarks by saying that we should not vote today for the breakup of Confederation, that I believe that in voting for the resolution today we are voting for a stronger Canada and one which in the long run will make us more united than we have ever been before.

Senator Lang: May I ask a question of Senator Buckwold?

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

Senator Lang: This is probably the only opportunity I will ever have to ask a senator from Saskatchewan a question on the floor of this chamber. Is the conventional wisdom that the premier of your province was the instigator of the re-introduction of the suspensive veto in the Senate a correct assumption or not?

Senator Buckwold: My reply must be, I honestly do not know. If what you suggest is true, I am not that concerned. I happen to be one of those who was not upset with the provisions of the original resolution which now constitutes section 47 of this resolution. I felt that if it ever came to the point where the elected Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislature of Canada had in mind a certain concept, then certainly it would be proper and in the interests of this country to have it implemented without a Senate veto.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to begin with just a word or two of congratulation to all of those who have preceded me in this debate. I know it is a subject on which feelings run very deep and very strong, and it would not have been surprising had there been a great deal of evidence that perhaps that feeling took control of the debate and of the words of the people who are involved in it. It seems to me, however, that that is not the case. The standard has been very high and, although I disagree with much of what has been said, I recognize the sincerity, honesty and dignity with which it has been said. I hope I can do as well.

I am an anglophone from Nova Scotia, as everybody who knows me knows. Some may ask—indeed, I have been asked—why I should be concerned about Quebec. My answer to that has been the same for all these many years, simply that I am a Canadian, proud of my country and I want to see Canada survive and grow; I want to see Quebec a continuing and important part of Canada, and I want other Canadians to refrain from action which may tend to put a weapon in the hands of those in that great province who would wish to convince their fellow citizens that their destiny is more fortunate outside the bounds of Canada.

I would like to say a few words in reference to Senator Buckwold's comment, that you cannot please everybody. I do not wish to please everybody, but I do want to avoid giving aid and comfort to a group who want to destroy our country. I want to do that as fervently as I can want to do anything. I think that anyone who suggests that that is trying to please everybody, sincere and honourable though he may be, misses the whole point of what moves me, and that is the preservation of our country as it is and the avoidance of anything which, to my mind at least, may tend to encourage its enemies.

I realize the constraints of time on this debate, and I do not complain about them. I realize we all agreed to the limits which we are trying to follow. In order to avoid using up too much of that time, you will be glad to know that you will not be subjected to all that I intended to say. There are, however, a few things—and nothing very new, I suppose—which I do want to put on the record as my beliefs.

I am glad that at last the British North America Act or, if you prefer, our Constitution, will be patriated. Of course, I support that as I have supported the idea for as long as I can remember in my activities in constitutional law and political life. Being fully aware, however, that we have been completely our own masters since the Statute of Westminster was passed 50 years ago, I think it most unlikely that we shall notice anything very different about that aspect of our national life.

As for the amendment of our Constitution, I am glad a formula has been reached which is acceptable to the federal government and to nine of the provinces. However, how I wish, honourable senators, that one of those nine provinces could have been one of the four provinces which joined together in 1867 to create this great country—the province of Quebec. Alas, that, for the time being at least, is not to be. In my mind, that leaves the present document with a fatal gap.

One of the unfortunate results of the long struggle over this document was—and I note in some places continues to be—an uninformed name-calling attack on the premiers of the provinces of Canada because they did what they were elected to do and what their people wanted them to do. I suppose that for some people name-calling is easier than having to produce reasons. It does seem to me that these very able and devoted gentlemen, carrying out their duties as they believed them to be, and as I believe them to be as well, have been subjected to the most unfair attack that you can imagine in public life. They have not deserved that; indeed, they deserve the thanks and gratitude of the people of their provinces and the people of this country. Had it not been for them, the activities of the opposition to which Senator Buckwold referred, and the activities of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, we certainly would not have this document in the form in which we have it before us today.

Let me turn for a moment to the Charter or Rights. I am not against the Charter of Rights if that is what people want, and I will not vote against this resolution because it contains a Charter of Rights. My reasons for doing so are different. However, I do not regard the Charter of Rights, or any Charter of Rights, with the great enthusiasm that some people do. I believe that, for the most part, having a Charter of Rights will not lead us into a promised land where there is no injustice and where everyone gets what he or she thinks to be his or her rights. Indeed, I do not believe that it will do away with all injustice, real or fancied. It is only the attitudes of people that, in the final analysis, lead to the true preservation of human rights for the people of a country. All the legislation that has been conceived so far in the world has not managed to produce a country in which there is no failure to recognize proper, everyday human rights—or legal rights for that matter.

For instance, we have often heard mention, in this house and elsewhere, of how we Canadians of descent other than Oriental, treated our Japanese Canadians during the Second World War, especially on the west coast. People are prone to point to our draft Charter and claim that no such thing could ever happen if the rights contained therein were only enforced. To them I say three things: First, I say, as I am sure they will recall if they stop to think about it, that the existence of the United States Constitution, to which our attention is so often directed, did not prevent the same thing happening there at the same time; indeed, it may very well be, as I have heard it said, that it was the United States attitude in this matter that led Canada to take the action it then took.

Second, I say to such people that in times of great danger, real or apprehended, nothing but superior force is likely to prevent a nation from doing whatever it considers necessary to meet that danger, and the repetition of similar circumstances, under a similar feeling of great imminent danger, would result in similar action by the state, whether it is this one or some other, no matter what the Constitution of that state may say.

Third, I say to them: Consider the words of section 1 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 which states:

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

I draw attention again to the words:

—subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Prescribed by what law, honourable senators? The law of Canada? The law of a province? The law of a municipality? The common law?

What, honourable senators, are “reasonable” limits? Are limits which were reasonable in the circumstances of yesterday reasonable in the circumstances of today, or will they be reasonable in the circumstances of tomorrow?

• (1440)

What is meant by “demonstrably justified?” What is required for justification? What is required to be demonstrated?

What is a free and democratic society? Is Canada? Is the United States? Is the United Kingdom? Is France, or is West Germany? If the answer to the question about these and similar countries is yes, then, under this section, is it sufficient to show that a particular action would be justified in any one of them or in some other country or society, or must it be a hypothetical society?

Honourable senators, who can answer these questions? Well, the courts can, of course, but it is going to take many a costly lawsuit to find the answers, and probably those lawsuits will not settle these questions for all time because circumstances are constantly changing. What might be more to the point is: Who is going to pay the cost of such lawsuits?

I do not raise these questions to criticize this particular section; I raise them to illustrate the type of section that this is. I raise them to show that this Charter of Rights is not a source of immediate and unlimited joy for all, and that its existence will not allow us to escape the harsh facts of life.

I suppose that coming from a province which has argued for and received equalization payments for as long as any province in Canada has, I would be expected to make a reference to the paragraph concerning equalization payments in this resolution, and I will do so. I am glad to see it there. I am also glad to see the reference to regional disparities. However, I do point out, honourable senators, that that reference has absolutely no legal significance whatsoever. It is merely a pious statement that the government believes in the principle of equalization. There is not a jot or a title or a sign anywhere in this document or anywhere else, except in the sovereign power of the people at the ballot box, which can force any Government of Canada, of whatever political stripe, to pay any equalization to any province or to make them pay it at a particular level.

It would not necessarily be so; it does not have to be that way. You only have to glance for a moment at our fellow Commonwealth countries, India and Australia, or a European country, West Germany, to see how this is handled in other places that are not afraid to make the obligation to pay equalization a legal one, one which can be compelled by reference to the courts. I see no reason why that should not be the case here.

It does strike me as being a little peculiar that the Government of Canada, which now wants to subject so many things as set out in this resolution to the determination of the courts rather than to decisions of government, stops short at making this fundamental obligation a legally enforceable one binding on the federal government of whatever stripe it may eventually be.

I now come to what to me is the decisive reason I cannot support this resolution, even though I am in favour of patriation, in favour of an amending formula and in favour of equalization.

Whatever we may say about this document, and however enthusiastic some may be about it, we cannot help noting that there is one large and unhappy gap not yet filled; that is the absence of the concurrence of Quebec.

As I have said a number of times in recent days, I cannot suggest that we should be concerned about trying to please Mr. Lévesque and his government. They are obviously determined to bring about the separation of Quebec from Canada, and nothing we can say or do is likely to turn them from their purpose. However, eighteen months ago about sixty per cent of the voters of Quebec voted to remain Canadians; they chose to continue as part of Canada. I am concerned about those people, and I would not want them to feel that they have been deserted in their time of need.

It seems to me most unfortunate, indeed, that the Parliament of Canada should now be engaged in doing something which obviously does not show sufficient regard for their hopes and aspirations, and which also places in the hands of their separatist opponents in Quebec a dangerous weapon indeed—dangerous to them, dangerous to us. That is the fundamental reason why I shall vote against this resolution.

Honourable senators, as I rise to speak on this resolution as a whole, I fervently wish I could do so with joy and pride in my heart and peace and comfort in my mind. That is how I feel it should be, as a good Canadian, proud of my country, believing it to be the best in the world; proud of the achievements of my fellow Canadians of today and my fellow Canadians of the past; confident of our future, if we can stay together. That is how any person should feel about the document which may soon be the basic law which governs our lives.

My blood should be singing its way through my veins and my voice should be vibrant and vigorous with happiness.

And so it might have been; but so it is not. The document before us fails to arouse any such greatly to be desired feelings. Instead, we have a document conceived in the the form of a battle plan, designed to avoid the collective wisdom and consent of Canadians, and to evade the Supreme Court of Canada; its preamble written by draftsmen with all the eloquence and inspiration of a corporation lawyer writing to a funeral director, and its final effect seeming much more likely to divide than to unite.

It is not as bad as it would have been had that original battle plan worked. As has so often been said, the dedicated work of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution allowed the voices of a great many Canadians to be heard, and allowed their views to help shape the document. The ingenious, the hard, and the persevering work of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, and his caucus, finally forced the government to take its draft document to the Supreme Court of Canada. The decision of that court forced the government to enter into serious consultation with the provinces. Out of that consultation came an Accord accepted by nine provinces and the federal government but, as I have pointed out, and it is, indeed, sad to say, not by the tenth province, one of the founding provinces which created our wonderful country.

I emphasize once more that I speak not of its lack of acceptance by the present government of that province. That is a government dedicated to the destruction of Canada. It would be foolish, indeed, to hope that it would accept anything which is intended to strengthen Canada. I speak, as I have already said, of those good Canadians in Quebec who want to continue to be good Canadians, and want to live in a country called Canada in which, so far, they have spent their lives.

Honourable senators, I believe that any arrangement for living together with them in the great country which we have—a country which can continue to be great—any such arrangement cannot long survive unless it is acceptable to the great majority of the people of Quebec.

From all the information I have gathered, it seems to me that the words of Claude Ryan, spoken a few days ago, are correct, that this document represents an important decision taken in Ottawa that has not the support of the people of the province of Quebec. Therefore, with great reluctance, I have to say that I cannot support it.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise to take part in this historic debate on a document which will, if accepted in its present form, mean that Canada will no longer be a colony of Great Britain but an independent state, and Canadians will be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects. No longer will we have to request the Parliament of the United Kingdom to make amendments to our Constitution. It will mean that Canada will have finally grown up and become a free nation, an independent state.

In order to reach this stage of agreement among the several political parties in the other place, along with nine of the provincial premiers and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, it has taken well over a year. Although we do not have the support of the Government of Quebec, I believe that we do have the support of most of the people of Quebec. This was shown to us by the large, strong and united support given by the members of the House of Commons from the province of Quebec to the motion now before us. Even though this document may not be perfect, it behooves me to support the package when it has so much appeal to the Canadian people, the support of the premiers of nine provinces, the support of the Prime Minister of Canada, the support of the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the support of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and the support of the House of Commons. I believe there are things that can be done to strengthen the Constitution Act. I believe I can best serve my region, my province and my people by supporting this motion so that the Constitution of Canada can be brought home and amended further here in this country as the premiers and the Government of Canada see fit, from time to time, so that it can better serve the needs and wishes of most of the people, for the most good, most of the time.

Before I go any further, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister and the Honourable Jean Chrétien, Minister of Justice, for the hard work and devotion in following this constitutional change to the point where we have an Accord, where we have a legal right and a motion before us today with such strong support among Canadians.

I should also like to congratulate Senator Harry Hays and the Honourable Serge Joyal, who, as joint chairmen of the joint committee, listened to so many briefs, petitions and individuals, and heard their views and concerns for a better Constitution for Canada.

It was interesting to note that most Canadians, most groups and most provinces supported patriation from the very beginning. The different viewpoints that were expressed were mostly on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I noticed, as I travelled in different countries in different continents of the world, that most countries were founded as a result of wars, battles, insurrections and revolutions, and the historical landmarks of their countries are based on monuments to generals, to brigadiers, to colonels and to others who laid down their lives for the formation of a new land and a new Constitution.

We, in Canada, are an exception to the rule. We were able to sit down at a table in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, in September 1864, and negotiate, compromise and come up with recommendations for a British North America Act which laid the foundation for the birth of this country. The only monument we have of that great day is a table still sitting in the Parliament Buildings in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, commemorating the foundation and the formation of a country—the birth of a nation. Men like Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and others just sat down in Charlottetown and built themselves a land. They built better than they knew.

That British North America Act, which was further debated at the Quebec Conference, later became our Constitution. It has carried us through to 1981 with a few minor amendments.

I am now pleased to be part of the Parliament of Canada when this motion, having been adopted with such strong support in the other place, now comes before us in this chamber for our sober second thought. I hope that if this motion receives the support of the Senate, we will respond as joyful and united Canadians and stand in our places and sing "O Canada, our Home and Native Land" and become united as one—Canadians all.

I should like to say a few words concerning Part I which is the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I am pleased to note that this part starts with the premise that Canada is founded upon principles which recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law. I know that the original proposal of the Prime Minister recognized the supremacy of God, and this was later changed by the committee of both houses. I am pleased that all parties now support this premise, and all parties recognize that Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God. I support Part I which guarantees fundamental freedoms and democratic rights to all, as well as mobility rights, legal rights, equality rights and language rights. I also support the rights of aboriginal peoples of Canada which are found in Part II of the proposed Constitution Act, 1981.

In Part III it guarantees equalization and the reduction of regional disparities. This part of the proposed Constitution Act is very important for the province of Prince Edward Island. As you know, Prince Edward Island, although it was the birthplace of the nation, is one of the have-not provinces, and receives equalization payments from the federal government. Up until now this equalization has been based upon the goodwill of other provinces and the goodwill of the federal government, so that we, as islanders, were able to receive some essential public services and some opportunities for economic development. But this has always been because of the goodwill and support of the other provinces and the federal government, never by right.

Under the proposed Constitution Act when it becomes law, it is stated in Part III that:

(1) Without altering the legislative authority of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures, or the rights of any of them with respect to the exercise of their legislative authority, Parliament and the legislatures, together with the government of Canada and the provincial governments, are committed to

(a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;

(b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; and

(c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

(2) Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

• (1500)

Honourable senators, this section, which is part of Canada's new Constitution, will confirm that the have-not provinces will receive equalized payments by right and not by consensus or agreement. For that reason, I believe that all have-not provinces will be pleased to note Part III of the Constitution.

Part IV also has my support, in that a constitutional conference shall be convened by the Prime Minister within one year after the act comes into effect. I am pleased to note that the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories will be able to participate in those discussions.

Part V sets out the procedure for amending the Constitution of Canada. I agree with that, with the exception of section 47, which states:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

It is my view that the Senate should have full powers in changing the Constitution and should have a full veto over any amendments to the Constitution so that we can protect the rights of Canadians and the regions of Canada as we were meant to do in the original British North America Act and as recommended by the Fathers of Confederation.

I have no objection to a suspensive veto for 180 days for ordinary legislation, if the elected representatives of the people wish to pass a second time legislation which has been vetoed by the Senate; but it is my fear that if the Constitution can be amended subject only to a suspensive veto of 180 days on the part of the Senate, at some time in the future we might well find that we will lose our Queen and our Governor General, and become a republic.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: We could also lose our bicameral parliamentary system. But despite my objection to this section, I intend to support it, because I feel that if it represents the wishes of the members of the House of Commons, and of seven of the Canadian premiers, that the Constitution should be changed, then those seven premiers could well represent the respective regions. It would not behoove me to think that I know more than they, and therefore I intend to support this part of the Constitution.

As a result, honourable senators, I intend to support the whole resolution, without the amendments, as it was sent to us from the other place, with the Accord signed by the nine premiers. The minor changes that I and others believe are needed can well be made within Canada, since we will have an amending formula and we will have our Constitution home in Canada.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to have participated in the debate. I am pleased to support the motion, and I will be pleased when Canada is a free and independent state, with its own Constitution home in our own country.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, if I am informed correctly, there was an agreement between the two leaders that Senator Flynn should commence his speech at 3.15 p.m. Senator Frith then requested ten minutes, to which I agreed. I thought that I could deliver my speech in 10 or 15 minutes, and that therefore I would conclude at 3.05 p.m. It now appears that I have to complete my speech in less than a minute, and I must confess that I cannot manage that. Therefore I will yield to Senator Frith and let him have the 10 minutes we agreed on. Perhaps, because of my decision, I will receive more applause from the other side than I might have received for my speech.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is indeed generous of Senator Tremblay to accommodate us, although I am sorry that we will not have the benefit of his intervention. We know his views on some matters, but not on all aspects of the constitutional resolution. I should explain that I do not wish to take 10 minutes. I understand that Senator Riel, who is on the list, wishes to speak. I am not sure that Senator Tremblay should have to cede his allotted time to me. I propose to speak for no more than three minutes, and perhaps Senator Riel and I, between us, can try to conclude by 3.15 or shortly thereafter.

[Senator Bonnell.]

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Riel: I shall try to be as brief as possible, honourable senators. Those unfamiliar with the Senate, had they been in the chamber over the last few days, would have been struck by the high quality and serious tone of the debates taking place therein. They would have realized the care and conscientiousness with which senators of different parties and different regions approached their consideration of the resolution now before us. I shall try to be brief.

One can never completely detach oneself from one's past, and the marks on each of us left by our education are difficult to efface. Each one of us has an ideal for our country and our countrymen, but each of us sees this ideal in the light of our past history, and our personal conditioning and upbringing lead us to take different views of a particular situation.

But despite all that, each individual aspires to happiness, to what, in a historic document, Jefferson called "The pursuit of happiness", and what the authors of our resolution call, more prosaically, "the right to well-being". As an expression this is less elevating, but no doubt they were striving to be more realistic! We are then, honourable senators, in the middle of a difficult struggle to arrive at a decision. For us, this is a historic day. Tomorrow, things will not be looked at in quite the same way as they were. But, again, since each individual sees the truth from his own point of view, it will be quite natural that for certain people the future will look very grim, while for others everything will look very rosy. In fact, things will probably be neither grim nor rosy. They will be what they have always been—our future will unfold with the same joys and sorrows, quarrels and reconciliations, nothing being perfect in this world. But I believe that the reform contained in the resolution will succeed in improving the situation. In my opinion, the resolution will make it possible to eliminate frictions in many cases, and I have developed in this regard the very accurate picture given by Senator Tremblay of the way French-speaking Protestants were treated in Montreal under the old school legislation. May I remark that all these things are relative? Those poor people were losers every time since, as Protestants, they were not represented on the school board of the majority, which was Catholic, and being francophones, they were not in good position within the Protestant board, which was by definition anglophone. This was a rather anomalous situation which dated back to the French regime, when Protestants did not have the right to immigrate into Nouvelle-France. As everyone knows, they had absolutely no civic rights in France. Because of this, there was immigration by the Huguenots into Holland, England and Germany, but not to the French colonies.

In the same vein, straying slightly from what Senator Tremblay has said, I would go on to speak of the case of those Jews who started to arrive in Montreal at the turn of the century and who found themselves in a situation rather similar to that of the French-speaking Protestants: refused by the Catholic school commissions, but accepted, after some legal hesitations on both their parts, by the Protestants, who collected their school taxes, the Jews having, over the years become important real-estate owners in Montreal. Accepted and taxed by the English-speaking Protestants, but for long not represented on the school commissions, one sometimes saw a Jewish-owned building pass into the name of a Catholic secretary acting as prête-nom, when the Catholic tax rate was more favourable. But, anyway, French-language schools were not attended by the Jews.

This situation was repeated at the beginning of the seventies, according to the testimony of Saul Hayes of the Canadian Jewish Congress before the Joint Parliamentary Commission on Immigration in 1974. At that period, 10,000 Sephardic Jews, who were French-speaking, immigrated from Morocco to Montreal, and for the same reasons, they were unable to attend French-language schools, the schools being confessionally based for Catholics.

Anomalies were seen here and there across the country, and apart from missed opportunities, there were also flagrant injustices. Senators Roblin and Molgat have both spoken of things which took place in Manitoba, and which, because of my family's distant relationship to Louis Riel, have always been of particular interest to me. My colleagues were not completely in accord with each other on facts in which they, personally, may well have played a part. I believe in their good faith; it is the deforming mirror principle which causes one to see a particular situation according to the angle from which one views it. It is certain, however, that during the ministry of Mr. Roblin, one could discern some progress in the Manitoba situation, and we must say that we appreciate his efforts.

But I believe that the resolution we have before us will render possible the elimination of such anomalous situations.

I believe that the interpretation and the implementation of the Constitution outside of any political influence will help to protect the rights of groups and minorities.

In any case, good faith is the basis of everything and this is still provided in the old civil code of Quebec, but there sometimes seem to be very sensible provisions which become outdated.

• (1510)

Unlike certain senators, I believe that to give our courts the right to interpret and to apply the Constitution is something progressive. Such a system works for our neighbours to the south, we are ourselves North Americans, our way of doing business, of behaviour and of living are North American. Even for those of us of the French language, the American system by which the courts interpret and apply the Constitution represents no shock. Besides, would you not agree with me that it will be better for the peace and unity of the country that constitutional questions be settled by our tribunals, far from the noisiness of political and electoral passions? It is a considerable change, but this system has been proved successful for over 200 years amongst our neighbours to the south, who, it may be said in passing, have had problems to contend with as divisive as our own. I do not see why it should not succeed with us.

In the past, and for the English, their system—of which I am an admirer—has been successful, but I believe that the American system is more adapted to our era and to the ways of thinking, and being, of the majority of Canadians.

Much has been said about the adherence, or lack of it, of the Government of Quebec to the current reform. Obviously I would have liked that the government of my own province give its support to the project and that the affair conclude on a note of complete harmony. I would not presume to express a judgment upon actions which only the passage of years will show whether they are just or not. Besides, I do not despair of a negotiated adherence by Quebec being arrived at at a later date, either by the present government or by its successor, but I am certain that a modus vivendi will be found. Nations, like people, are able to adapt and Quebecers have proven in the past their capacity and talent for survival. But when I look to the past, I find the same model. We have had Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on one side, and Bourassa, on the other. We have had St-Laurent and Duplessis; we have Trudeau and Lévesque. Our people have always attached themselves to one or another leader of superior calibre—before that it was Papineau and Lafontaine—and in so doing they have divided themselves into two passionately engaged groups. This continues. For many generations, Quebec has been seeking its roots, its place, the control of its destiny. Never believe that it is easy to be French-speaking in North America. Our life is North American in style, our businesses, everything which surrounds us, even the air we breathe. By its nature, life in North America is based upon the English language and way of thinking—at least, it is certainly not French. It is nobody's "fault" that we are here, happy and cheerful as we frequently are and yet also unhappy and complaining. It is not easy in these circumstances to find our right place in the North American context; we find ourselves buffeted and frustrated, but, together or apart, we must live and adjust ourselves, nevertheless. And it is essential for any people to have a material base-structure, an economic life to support and ensure its progress. This is simple rule of history. Together or apart, I said. Mr. Lévesque's present situation indicates that it is not a dilemma easy to resolve. His policy of sovereignty-association is placed in doubt by his own party. His decision is to stake his career upon this prospect of an economic association with the rest of Canada. I think one must do honour to this attitude of Mr. Lévesque and respect his sincerity and essential greatness of spirit.

His policy, to my mind, consists of the creation of a culturally inviolable entity, linked to an economic union with the rest of Canada. To balance these things and to put them into practice is not easy given the economic, social, political and other pressures, and those applied by groups, individuals, prejudices, the influence of the media, and so forth.

Pierre Trudeau, for his part, has another conception of the development and progress of Quebec; he has a global vision of Canada in which Quebec has her place, a place equal to those of the other provinces, while Lévesque sees the rest of Canada as an adjunct of Quebec, and Canada as a duality consisting of two personalities whose lives are separate except for an economic association which is still ill-defined and, in any case, hardly known.

For more than twenty years, Trudeau and Lévesque have each lived his vision and attempted to realize it. This has required, first, the putting together of the concept; the putting in place of the necessary elements, and back-breaking work, with friends and enemies, in favourable and unfavourable circumstances, to have accepted their concept of the future of our country.

I heard them discuss these problems for an entire evening at my home twenty years ago. That was still the time when each of them was looking for his own truth.

We are today, honourable senators, at a turning point, which will not, perhaps, be the final point of our constitutional history; the life of a country is one of constant evolution. Today, Mr. Lévesque is facing a revolt within his party, and I have every confidence that he will master it—in any case, I hope so. Mr. Trudeau submits to us a resolution of which the contents and the effects project a Canada where there will be a place for everyone, including the Québécois with their particularism, with equal opportunity for all and equal respect for the rights of each individual. That, in fact, is “the pursuit of happiness”.

The action taken by Pierre Trudeau is constructive and this is a positive resolution. I am optimistic as to its future results; I believe that this reform will contribute to the advancement of our country on the long and arduous road in the pursuit of happiness, at the same time as permitting Quebec to realize her destiny and her aspirations.

And I add this: In our national life, there should not be “winners” or “losers”, “victories” or “defeats”. Justice and equity alone should govern; equal justice for all, equity for all.

That, I believe, is the fundamental requirement for the success of this reform, which must be the foundation and the support of a common Canadian ideal for which all of us here are responsible. We are all dependent upon each other in the great adventure of nationhood.

“No man is an island entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main; . . .”.

Or so stated the great English poet John Donne, and to balance things up, I shall close with these words of a great French poet:

God said: The Faith I like best, is Hope.

I have faith in the future of Canada and I have faith in the future of Quebec, and in my mind, they are united. This is why I shall support this resolution.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose to take my own advice, the advice I gave to others last night, namely, to keep in mind the thoroughness and eloquence of the speeches of those of our colleagues who have spoken ahead of us. Though I believe that everything that can be said, at this stage of the process, has been said, my ego would tell me that in some cases I could have said it better. But I have learned, through experience, to distrust my ego in such circumstances.

• (1520)

Senator Sullivan: And your conscience.

Senator Frith: Yes, I have the same experience with my conscience as that described by Senator Sullivan.

Honourable senators, as has been said, this is an historic occasion. I want to make it clear that I do not intervene at length in this debate because I believe that, even though the occasion is historic, eventually we will be judged more by what we do than by what we say. I therefore close by saying that I join with those who feel that we must go forward with what we have, that it is totally impractical to make amendments at this point, and that amendments ought to be taken into account when the process of amendment can proceed after patriation, in accordance with the present resolution.

I shall refer to and adopt another definition, particularly one of Ambrose Bierce in The Devil's Dictionary. Incidentally—though I do not adopt this definition—Bierce defines history as

An account mostly false, of events mostly unimportant, which are brought about by rulers mostly knaves, and soldiers mostly fools.

I do adopt the definition of “talk”, which is:

To commit an indiscretion without temptation, from an impulse without purpose.

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, I will take just two minutes to dispose of the point of order that was raised by Senator Lang and Senator Deschatelets.

A few hours ago, Senator Lang raised a point of order dealing with the permissibility of putting the question that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada. Senator Lang feels that because section 4 of the Senate and House of Commons Act limits the exercise of the powers of the Senate insofar as the same are inconsistent with or are repugnant to the British North America Act, 1867, the resolution before us now should not be put since it is, to quote Senator Lang:

inconsistent with and is repugnant to the British North America Act, 1867, and is acknowledged to be so by the present government and has been found to be so by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Deschatelets supports the point of order of Senator Lang. He submits that the proposed resolution is unconstitutional and is inconsistent with the conventions concerning the Province of Quebec, which did not accept the accord. He said:

If our rules, in accordance with our customs and tradition, do not allow the Senate to proceed here with a measure which would be unconstitutional, I request, Mr. Speaker, that you rule out of order the proposed resolution because it will permanently curtail the powers of Quebec, without Quebec's consent.

If asked by the Senate, the Speaker may rule certain motions out of order. Erskine May, on pages 230 and 231, lists some examples of motions which for some irregularity the Speaker has not allowed to proceed.

A motion which would create a charge upon the people and is not recommended by the Crown; a motion touching the rights of the Crown, which has not received the royal consent; a motion which anticipates a matter which stands for the future consideration of the House, or which raises afresh a matter already decided during the current session—these are examples of motions upon which the Speaker refuses to propose a question.

While the Speaker can, therefore, rule that such questions are irreceivable and refuse to put them to the Senate, he cannot rule on questions of law or constitutional issues. Both Beauchesne and Bourinot clearly state that the Speaker "will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege."

It appears to me that Senator Lang and Senator Deschatelets want the Chair to become involved in an interpretation of both the Senate and House of Commons Act and the resolution standing in the name of the Honourable Senator Perrault. I can only quote Speaker Lamoureux, who was asked to make a similar ruling on January 10, 1974. At that time, he said:

It is a long-established practice that the Chair rules on questions of procedure, not on questions of law, and I do not think the Chair should be placed in the position of making the kind of ruling suggested . . .

I do not feel that it is the role of the Chair to rule whether Senator Perrault's resolution is illegal or unconstitutional. For these reasons, I cannot accept the point of order raised by Senator Lang.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before I address the main motion I want to give an explanation about the vote that I, and perhaps some others on this side, will cast on the amendment moved by Senator Walker to delete the section which provides only a suspensive veto for the Senate in constitutional matters. I believe that, on all of the other amendments, the reasons for the votes on this side will be quite apparent. On this amendment, however, I want to say that, if I support it, it is mainly for the reasons given by Senator Bonnell just a few moments ago.

I have always advocated that the Senate should have a suspensive veto on all matters to do with legislation coming in the normal way before it. With regard to amendments to the Constitution, I think the absolute veto is an important tool, one which should be used occasionally to protect the rights of dissenting provinces in cases where seven out of ten can impose a change in the Constitution. I would certainly be prepared to accept suspensive vetos, however, in matters of amendments to the Constitution dealing with the Senate. I have no problem with that, because I do not think that the Senate should have an absolute veto to maintain itself in existence. We could be accused of having a special interest in questions of this type.

Another reason for my support of the amendment of Senator Walker is that it is quite clear to me that this section was inserted at the last moment, apparently to please Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan, without considering its relation to other questions.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Flynn: Senator McIlraith, for one, has mentioned some of the defects of this section, as has Senator Walker. I think that this is really a matter which can eventually be amended, though, if the provinces do want such a provision, I do not think we would be able to resist it if it applied in matters relating to the abolition of the Senate, the changing of its powers, or anything else in this respect.

I come now to the main motion.

● (1530)

[Translation]

Honourable senators, until this morning, I had hoped that the Prime Minister, and the government, would have realized that it was of the utmost importance to bring about immediately certain changes which would have met the main objections raised by Quebec. Here again, when I say Quebec, I do not refer necessarily to the Government of Quebec; I am referring to the province of Quebec in general.

I had hoped that those amendments, especially the one relating to the financial compensation as well as the other suggested by Senator Tremblay, by which clause 23 would have been made applicable subject to the approval of the Quebec National Assembly, would have been accepted. Then I would have been able to join with the majority in this house in welcoming the passage of this resolution. Unfortunately, such is not the case. Within a few hours, the Canadian parliamentary stage of the constitutional process will be an accomplished fact.

Once the results of the final vote have been announced by His Honour the Speaker, I know full well that honourable senators on the other side of this house and certainly some on this side as well, because I do not consider myself as the spokesman for the entire official opposition since various points of views are held within our party—a large number of honourable senators will want to rise and sing O Canada. As for me, I will abstain. I will not be in the mood to sing. I believe that it would be extremely difficult for me to act otherwise. I will rise with all of you. I will not leave this house because I believe in Canada and I intend to remain in Canada, but, above all, I do not want my refusal to join with you all to be misinterpreted.

On the other hand, I fear that sooner or later your decision might result in a situation where Quebecers would no longer be Canadians. Others might express similar apprehensions. At any rate, a good number of Quebecers will watch the vote on television tonight. It has already been announced a few minutes ago that Mr. Chrétien will leave Ottawa tonight for London with the resolution where he will deliver it to the secretary of Her Majesty. Many Quebecers will watch this vote and will see Mr. Chrétien leave for the United Kingdom. Many of them will share the same feeling they experienced last Wednesday, a feeling of isolation and alienation; they will feel that this so-called new Constitution is intended mainly to thwart their aspirations and their rights.

All this is the result of a lack of understanding between the two levels of government because, according to the arguments put forward by honourable senators opposite, Mr. Lévesque is a separatist. Therefore, they did not want to give in on anything to the Quebec government, which means that no concessions were made to the people of Quebec. They did not want to give in to the federalists who believe in Canada but who follow the constitutional tradition adhered to by Gouin, Taschereau, Duplessis, Lesage, Johnson and Bourassa. To that list I would add the name of Claude Ryan who, in this regard, is their successor.

Over the weekend, I received many phone calls. People were telling me: Please, let us not fall into René Lévesque's trap and come up with this argument that the majority of the provinces will impose their will upon Quebec in the most vital areas of its jurisdiction.

I had to explain to them that unfortunately outside of Quebec things were seen differently. The majority in the Senate and in the House of Commons as well as most of the provinces, nine provincial premiers who signed the Accord feel as those people stated, that in view of the fact that the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, is a Quebecer and that the majority in the cabinet is from Quebec, since 73 honourable members—or 72 because the Speaker does not count—voted for this resolution, it would appear that they speak on behalf of Quebec. We certainly have heard this argument more than once, namely that they speak on behalf of Quebec.

As for me, I deny that those people had any mandate to make the decision they took the other day. The last federal election was fought on a platform which had nothing to do with the Constitution or its renewal. Mr. Trudeau won the election under the fallacious pretext of cheaper prices for gas than those suggested by the Conservative government. Of course, at that time, people believed him. This was another occasion when he won under false pretences. He did it also in 1974 and in 1968. Perhaps I will have an opportunity to expound on that later.

Last week, I had a discussion with one of my colleagues. I was telling him how much I dreaded the situation that could result from the decision we are called upon to take today. He explained to me then that Mr. Lévesque was hostage to his caucus. Of course, the events of the last weekend show that he may be hostage to his own caucus but he is not quite a hostage to his party nor can he govern the radical wing of his party. I told him that as far as Mr. Trudeau is concerned, he is not hostage to his party, it is rather the opposite. His party is hostage to him. In fact, Mr. Trudeau's concept of Canada which he has expressed ever since he became Prime Minister, is quite a personal concept which, in my opinion, has never been shared by the Quebec people. He managed to command respect for it simply because the Canadian people, by sheer instinct of security, supported him against all comers because he was the only French-speaking leader whereas the other party leaders were English-speaking.

[Senator Flynn.]

Looking at Mr. Lévesque and Mr. Trudeau, one does wonder how could the Quebec people elect two leaders who hold such different views about Canada, who are totally opposed to one another and who have been fighting for so many years?"

As I mentioned earlier, the real victims of that struggle between the two of them were Quebec and Quebecers. Mr. Trudeau wants to win over Mr. Lévesque who wants to win over Mr. Trudeau and never mind the people of Quebec. While Mr. Lévesque is playing "loser takes all", Mr. Trudeau is playing "taker loses all". And that is the situation we find ourselves locked in.

● (1540)

In September, as the Supreme Court gave its ruling, Mr. Trudeau and his government came to the conclusion that negotiations should resume because the Supreme Court had ruled that, constitutionally, a provincial consensus was necessary; that legally nothing could prevent Parliament from adopting the resolution and sending it to London; and that, perhaps there was no legal hindrance to Westminster adopting the resolution. However, the essential inference was that a consensus was required if not legally at least constitutionally. Several questions remained unanswered, following the court's ruling. One outstanding question was that the Supreme Court did not define the real jurisdiction of Westminster. Can Westminster adopt anything and make it applicable to Canada?

The question was not asked and we have no answer in that respect. In a few moments I will come back to a problem which relates to this statement.

The second question has to do with the consensus, at the constitutional level, which the Supreme Court ruled necessary. That was not defined either. It is misleading to say that having nine provinces out of ten necessarily creates a consensus. As far as the ruling of the Supreme Court is concerned—and I say this without any hesitation whatsoever—that was not the conclusion of the Supreme Court.

When all was said and done, the Supreme Court decided that it would not rule on that point. They said simply that it is not profitable or legal for the Parliament of Ottawa or Westminster, that is all.

Senator Frith: How about unanimity?

Senator Flynn: They did not say it was necessary. They said they would not rule on unanimity!

Senator Frith: On unanimity, they did not say it was necessary?

Senator Flynn: They did not say that unanimity was necessary. They did not say that nine provinces out of ten was enough in the case where the province which is against, for instance, is a province which represents 25 per cent of the population. I will come back to that point when examining the new resolution.

As a result of that ruling, the government of Mr. Trudeau convened the constitutional conference in early November. On November 5, nine out of the ten provinces signed an agreement, that is excepting Quebec.

When that agreement was signed, like others I thought that we would arrive at a solution. I thought that, maybe, the objections raised by Mr. Lévesque shortly after the agreement was signed could be the object of real negotiations or, if not negotiations, at least concessions on the part of the federal government. Unfortunately, there was nothing of the sort, despite the fact that the views of the National Assembly on the issue were quite clear, namely, that the Accord, as it was, did not meet the wishes of the vast majority of Quebecers and was always countered by the formal objections of the people of Quebec. The new resolution, which resulted from the November 5 agreement, changed substantially the amending formula, starting with the Victoria formula and changing to the Vancouver one, yet without financial compensation for a province that refused to transfer some powers to the federal government. The compensation formula, by the way, had been included in the agreement reached by the eight dissenting provinces in April 1981. Those eight dissenting provinces, the "gang of eight", said: Fine, you will not insist on the right to veto but in exchange for that right you will have the right to opt-out with financial compensation. We should also remember that that April agreement provided only for patriation with an amending formula, namely the one I just described. It is easy to say: We agree. Initially there was the federal government and two provinces on one side against eight dissenting provinces. Now you have nine provinces and the federal government against one province. I believe that unilateral action still exists since the dissenting province represents 25 per cent of the total population and is the home of one of the founding nations. One cannot talk about consensus without the agreement of that province. The Accord signed last November 5 by the nine premiers of the English-speaking provinces does contain quite a number of flaws which by themselves would not warrant opposition to the resolution being adopted at this time. These flaws probably could be remedied. The major one would be Quebec's opposition. I shall deal with this later on. Among other things, there was the failure to apply section 133 to Ontario. This has been discussed and I intend to leave it at that.

Let me refer to the War Measures Act, for instance, which concerns fundamental rights and, which is still in the books and could be applied again. With the experience we had in 1970, there is no significant guarantee in this respect. In any case I am referring to certain problems, to certain other flaws which have been mentioned by previous speakers. When it comes to basic issues, there are first of all Quebec's objections. The first one has to do with knowing whether the unilateral aspect which characterized the original resolution as submitted to the Supreme Court had been removed.

When I consider the government's attitude towards Quebec's opposition, I am inclined to say that nothing has been changed in the basic deficiency noted by the Supreme Court in the original resolution. With respect to the veto right, it may well be said that if the Supreme Court has ruled that there exists a convention which provides for the agreement of a given number of provinces, and if such a convention does exist then it would emerge mostly from the commitments entered into in years past and especially since 1931 concerning Quebec. Mention was made of the position taken by Mr. Bennett in 1931. In those days it was both Quebec and Ontario, but more precisely Quebec which opposed patriation lest there be guarantees. Because of Quebec's objections nothing further was done with the Constitution.

Again in 1964-65 during discussions which were held in connection with the Fulton-Favreau formula, it was acknowledged that Quebec's agreement was required and Quebec then was told that it would have a veto right. In Victoria, discussions were resumed along the same lines. If there is such a thing as a constitutional convention, it would certainly be the one expressed in relation with Quebec. I am sure that if the Supreme Court were again to hand down another constitutional ruling with reference to Quebec's objections it would again assert that the federal Parliament and the Trudeau government are proceeding contrary to the constitutional convention.

In my opinion the other decision stating that there was nothing illegal about a resolution such as this one, as passed by the federal government and assured of being confirmed by Westminster will come to the same result. Again I say that from a constitutional point of view, it seems to me that the Supreme Court ruling, if it is to be consistent and if it is to follow along the same lines as the one handed down in late September will come to the same conclusion that in this instance the process flies in the face of the constitutional convention.

Let us have a look at the specific objections of the National Assembly. I stress the words "National Assembly". In this respect, it can never be stated too often that we are not dealing with a separatist government. We are not dealing with Mr. Lévesque. We are dealing with the Government of Quebec, with the National Assembly, with the people of Quebec. Sure enough these objections as expressed by the National Assembly may not be clearly spelled out in the resolution which was passed by a vote of 111 to 9 but subsequently it was learned from statements made by Mr. Ryan and Mr. Lévesque that those objections were truly the objections of Quebec, of its National Assembly, of its people.

First, there is a minor one which I want to underscore just the same. It is the question of manpower mobility. I think it may be said that this issue, as seen from Quebec's point of view, is altogether different from what it means to the other provinces. It is a lot more difficult for a Quebecer to move to another part of Canada than it is for a Canadian from another province who has a choice of eight other provinces where he may go and which will be just about the same as his own. People from Nova Scotia who go west to find employment will certainly not be under the impression that they are settling in another country as in the case of a Quebecer. That is an objection which I would not have considered very seriously had it been the only one. Mr. Ryan had also suggested that an opting-out provision in this respect could simply have been granted to the Province of Quebec. But it matters not. Now, if you chose to ignore that minor objection then move on to the second one which has to do with education, an area which has always been of a very special concern to Quebec. Quebec has always considered this area as essential to its development and to the preservation of the French Canadian community.

Here we have provisions which are imposed upon Quebec, against its will, which could mean tampering with Bill 101. Senator Tremblay has had the opportunity to explain to what extent the implementation of section 23 would go even as far as cutting back on the rights of the English-speaking minority in Quebec instead of bettering its situation. But on this issue, the National Assembly, as I said earlier, by an overwhelming vote of 111 to 9 have stated their opposition to any lessening of their jurisdiction in this regard. The other provinces had agreed to that. Each one of them had agreed individually to that and never had made it a condition to be imposed on Quebec. That is not true and I shall deal with that later on.

Each province had accepted it for itself and, as it was pointed out, Manitoba especially took care to say section 23 was subject to approval by the Manitoba legislature.

I do not see why we could accept that from Manitoba without granting the same choice to Quebec. However, the basic flaw is the amending formula which allows one province in ten to alter and to transfer the jurisdiction from the provincial to the federal level with, no doubt, the right of opting-out if it disagrees without financial compensation unless educational or cultural matters are involved.

I think that we do not realize exactly the implication of that provision. We can try to imagine, for example what could happen. I found two examples, and I would like firstly to refer to subsection 92(14) of the British North American Act which says:

In each Province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation with . . . the Administration of Justice in the Province including the Constitution, Maintenance and Organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and of Criminal Jurisdiction, and including Procedure in Civil Matters in those Courts.

There is already a tendency in anglophone provinces, except in Ontario to entrust the federal authorities with our jurisdiction for the administration of justice in criminal matters resulting in agreements for the services of the RCMP.

It could really happen—because the problems are identical in that area for anglophone provinces—that seven provinces in ten would say one day that they would like to entrust that responsibility to the federal authorities. Let us take for example the administration of justice. We could go even further later and refer to the administration of justice in civil matters. We could say, for example, that the administration of justice in criminal matters is transferred to federal authorities. If Quebec were concerned about it, it would have the choice to turn it down and continue to pay the costs for the administration of justice in criminal matters while the other provinces would let the federal government assume that responsibility and pay no compensation in such a case.

[Senator Flynn.]

Such a situation already prevails and gives us a valid indication. The provinces who are now using the services of the RCMP are given such treatment from which they derive a substantial benefit compared to Quebec and Ontario which have their own provincial police.

If we go further, we could very well, according to them, yield to the federal government the administration of justice, that is, all law courts, etc. and ask: "Why does the federal government not take it over?" And Quebec would have to spend millions without receiving any compensation and it would be taxed like other provinces while Quebecers would be taxed like other Canadians to allow the federal government to provide such services to the eight other provinces. Let us now have a look at subsections 6 and 7 of section 92:

6. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Public and Reformatory Prisons in and for the Province.

7. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Hospitals, Asylums, Charities, and Eleemosynary Institutions in and for the Province, other than Marine Hospitals.

Under its spending power which is not at all limited under the new Constitution, the federal government already imposes priorities on provincial governments, which are not at all to their liking. With what results? The governments of seven provinces could entrust the federal government with the management of their public and reformatory prisons, hospitals, asylums, et cetera, and if Quebec wanted to continue managing these institutions, which would be of tremendous importance because of the specific nature of Quebec, that province would have to assume alone the costs of these services, which means Quebecers would pay taxes for services the federal government would be providing elsewhere. Think about it, and you will realize that this is an incredible situation. That is a key which the federal government and most English-speaking provinces have in their hands and which they might be tempted to use to handcuff Quebec.

● (1600)

That is why it is not surprising, therefore, that Mr. Ryan should agree with Mr. Lévesque when he says that this formula is bad and unfair. What is worse, in all of this, Mr. Lévesque is being blamed for giving up his veto right. It would appear quite strange that Mr. Lévesque would abandon the right of veto which the original resolution was granting to him. This right had been offered to his predecessors, from 1960 on, that is, up to the new resolution we have before us.

We find now Quebec with an amending formula which places it at the mercy of a majority of provinces. I wanted to say—and have it printed in our official report—that Quebec, represents, populationwise, a greater number of people than all of the seven less populated provinces put together, that is to say, the Atlantic and western provinces. This, of course, excludes Ontario and British Columbia.

I was wondering a while ago, when dealing with consensus, in what situation we would find ourselves today if, instead of having Quebec oppose this project, we had these seven less populated provinces opposing it.

I come back now to the amendment. It was claimed that the agreement did not permit amendments. I say that this is not the case. When the nine other premiers signed this Accord on November 5, they did not do so with the proviso that it would be imposed on Quebec. No, they did not. If they had, you could find that there had been a conspiracy of the other nine provinces against Quebec. It is either a mistake or a conspiracy; you have a choice between the two.

The worst of it is that the situation is now far worse for Quebec than if it had accepted the first resolution, or if the resolution had been imposed upon it after having been passed by the House of Commons and the Senate, and dispatched to London. Quebec would be better off financially under the old resolution than this one.

Mr. Trudeau had cause to rejoice on television the other day when he was asked about that. He said: "You know, what we got is not bad at all. We have a good working tool". A good working tool, indeed! Good enough to put Quebec in its place! In any event, that has always been what he was after. When I hear the majority tell us here: "All is fine and well; the proposal has been accepted by everyone; 73 Liberals in the House of Commons agree". Then I tell myself: "If the Prime Minister who is forcing this on Quebec were Joe Clark—"

Senator Asselin: He would be hanged.

Senator Flynn:—and the Quebec Premier had been Claude Ryan instead of René Lévesque, I can just see you, one by one. Would you have said then that you agreed? I can just see you all and hear what you would have said. Even Senator Riel, I wonder what he would have had to say. It is unbelievable that through this process you should impose on Quebec alone something it does not want. As for the other provinces, we have heard their main objections. They were granted this or that. But Quebec? No. And why not? Is it because the Quebec premier is a separatist? It is because of Mr. Trudeau that a separatist was brought to power. In 1976, Mr. Trudeau made a mockery of Mr. Bourassa. He paved the way for Mr. Lévesque's victory then. Last year, when he came back to power after promising a constitutional reform during the referendum campaign, Quebecers believed things would change. But when they saw, in the sad light of this resolution, that once again the Prime Minister of Canada wanted to put Quebec in its place, they understood that they had no other choice but to bring Mr. Lévesque back to power. Had Mr. Trudeau waited, Mr. Lévesque would no longer be the Premier of the Province of Quebec. But that suited Machiavelli just fine. He wanted things that way. He needed an opponent to prove he was right. I am a federalist. You can choose between someone like me, a federalist, a centralist or, at the other extreme, Mr. Lévesque, the separatist. Now Quebecers are being used as the sacrificial lamb in the process.

It is incredible that the amending formula with compensation should have not have been accepted. It is inconceivable that the authorization to implement section 23 only with the approval of the National Assembly is being denied. It is unthinkable that one should refuse to destroy Mr. Lévesque's arguments.

I would be so easy if we took away his own arguments from him. And anyway, this is not only his request, it is the request of the National Assembly, of both parties in the National Assembly. If we made that compromise, we would be taking away his own arguments from him. On the other hand, if we remain stubborn, what are we doing? We are putting trumps in Mr. Lévesque's hand. What happened over the weekend may have various interpretations, but it is clear that the vote cast in the House of Commons last week certainly gave further courage and determination to the radicals in Quebec. Such is the situation.

As far as refusal is concerned, I do not see why we could not do it. If this had been done, approval by the Commons could have been obtained very rapidly. But I am told not to worry, that when the Constitution is back in Canada, we will see to that. Such is their argument. The veto right, they say has gone forever for Quebec. It may be reinstated only with the unanimous consent of the provinces. However, we have heard so many speakers tell us how happy they were that finally the veto right was taken away from Quebec and Ontario. In other words, it is daydreaming or trying to mislead us to suggest that we could go backwards.

On the matter of compensation, you have exactly the same problem. Unanimity is required. And indeed, Quebec will have to eat from Mr. Trudeau's hand—or from the hand of whoever is then Prime Minister—to obtain such concessions. These people say: "We are going to negotiate with you, but from a position of strength. You did not want to negotiate, you have forgone your veto right. We are now negotiating from a position of strength. Quebec will have to beg of the federal government and the other provinces". Come now! Where is the government that will bow in such a humiliating way! How is it possible to believe that we will swallow their story when they say: "Wait for patriation, you will see, we will move on with the negotiations". Why? If you think you can do it after patriation, why do you not do it now? Give me one good reason. Such an amendment could be accepted in no time at all.

Anyway, if we look squarely at Quebec's position, it is the only province that is victimized in this process. It is being put in an extremely weak position. Senators Langlois, and McElman told us: "Quebec is disarmed". Why? The answer: Because it has a separatist government.

Senator Langlois: I never said that.

Senator Flynn: Yes. you said "disarmed", "weakened". You said it. Others said it also. You are happy that Quebec is now disarmed. Mr. Trudeau is happy now that he has finally put Quebec in its place.

Senator Langlois: You go on distorting the debate.

Senator Flynn: I am not distorting the debate. I am not telling long boring stories about the Supreme Court judgment. Your speech had nothing to do with the debate that concerns us. Even if you had quoted everything the Supreme Court expanded in their judgment, this changes absolutely nothing to this debate. What counts is the decision itself. I guess I have said most—

● (1610)

[English]

Honourable senators, I think I have said most of what I intended to say. The essence of the problems raised by this resolution can be summarized as follows. The Accord of November 5 met the objections of the nine provinces that signed it, but it failed to meet the main objections of the Government of Quebec, which objections, in substance, are shared by the great majority of Quebecers and, certainly, by the official opposition in the National Assembly.

Claude Ryan has made very clear his fundamental objection to Quebec being denied the control it considers essential, which control it must have in order to safeguard its linguistic and cultural future. Only in the province of Quebec does this resolution end up using force. Only against Quebec will coercion be exercised. Only Quebec will be frustrated and put upon in an area it has, since Confederation, considered sacred. Quebec will end up in a situation far less advantageous—in fact, much worse—than the one which would have prevailed were the resolution before us to be the one we had in 1980. That initial resolution gave Quebec a veto on any constitutional change of substance. Not only will Quebec end up being coerced, but it will also be denied something which last year was being recognized—namely, its right of veto in constitutional changes of importance. Surely, we in Quebec cannot be blamed for not rejoicing at this prospect. That veto, that right it has always claimed, that right which was never questioned, that right which was confirmed in the 1965 Fulton-Favreau formula, and again confirmed in the Victoria formula of 1971—that, honourable senators, is the right which is now to be denied.

● (1620)

Mr. Lévesque, in Vancouver and in the April agreement, agreed to relinquish this time-honoured right of veto—I will grant you that—and many of us thought the gesture foolhardy. We were amazed at his degree of faith. Some of us who are not even separatists would not have gone that far out on a limb—but he did. He did, however, on one absolute condition—that of financial compensation in the case of Quebec's opting out of any transfer of provincial jurisdiction to the federal government. He was saying: "If the other provinces want to give up some of their powers to the federal government"—and I have given examples—"we won't veto the exercise. Only don't expect us to do likewise; and if we aren't going to share, we want to be compensated." Well, the veto was relinquished and compensation provided only in very limited areas. Quebec has been handcuffed. Again, I say this has been acknowledged by both Senator Langlois and Senator McElman. We have been betrayed once more by the federal government, and possibly unknowingly, with the assistance of other provinces. Those provinces stood with Quebec when the Accord of April was signed; but when they ceased to see an advantage in the association they dumped Quebec, and the federal government is using them as a pretext for treating Quebec in the way it is treated in this resolution.

Quebec was isolated. Rightly or wrongly, that is the perception, and it is not surprising that an ever-growing number of Quebecers feel that there is no place for them in Confederation.

The irony of it all, and the pathos attached to the denouement of this drama, is that this so-called new Constitution, this fundamental document for the governing of all Canadians, will not receive the support of close to seven million of them. Worse still, this document, so offensive to so many Canadians, particularly those of French background, will be presented to the Queen's representative by Quebecers: the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, and the two Speakers. Et tu Brute!

French Canadians are being victimized as a result of the Prime Minister's wanting to show Mr. Lévesque and Mr. Ryan that he knows best what is good for French Canada—and to hell with how French Canadians feel about it all!

Recall, if you will, how the present Prime Minister acted when he was Minister of Justice. Recall, if you will, how he resisted all attempts on the part of Daniel Johnson to further the cause of Quebec. Recall, if you will, how in 1968 he strove to create for himself, elsewhere in Canada than in Quebec, the image that he was the man who would put Quebec in its place; that he knew our people and would protect English-speaking Canada from our outrageous demands; that he would handle us; that he would keep us out of your hair; that he would put us in our place; that he would "fix" this separatist element. Who poured scorn on the two-nation theory in 1968? Who ridiculed Bourassa's position on constitutional reform and helped get Lévesque elected in 1976? Who travelled the country, far and wide, in 1973 saying separatism was dead?

In 1980, as I said in French, Mr. Trudeau won the election without taking a position on the subject of protecting for Quebecers their traditional rights. But the referendum frightened him. Forty per cent of our people told him they had had enough of this federal charade. Consequently, the Prime Minister promised to respond to the desires of Quebecers for more authority in many areas. He promised to show understanding for the expressed wish of our people to have greater control over their destiny. But here is what was delivered—this resolution, this will of the majority, this document which not only fails to give anything new to Quebec in the way of rights and privileges, but, worse, serves to restrict that province in the exercise of rights it had always considered it had.

Before resuming my seat, I will simply say that this resolution contains a germ of disunity, the virulence of which we will not have to wait long to see. Yes, Pierre Trudeau has finally put Quebec and Quebecers in their place. I pray to God, since

I have given up begging this Parliament and this Senate, that Quebec having been put in its place, we will not, to our sorrow, discover that place to be outside of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Leader of the Government speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are some words in the political lexicon which have become shopworn and threadbare, and perhaps overused or misused. One of those terms—perhaps there is a danger in using it in the context of today's debate, but I think not—is the expression “nation building”—nation building from the viewpoint of discussing the process in which the Parliament of Canada has been involved for over 14 months; constitutional nation building which has occupied the attention of all Canadians of every ethnic background—those who speak either of our two official languages, as well as those who have come to our shores from every continent to build a great country. The purpose of the process in which we have been involved has been to strengthen the foundation of our country, to make this nation stronger.

I know there are many honourable senators, and many people across Canada, who will regret very much the negative terms in which the Leader of the Opposition has spoken in this chamber this afternoon. I believe—and perhaps other honourable senators may share my view—that we have had from the Honourable Senator Flynn, who always speaks with passion and conviction, an unbalanced view of the constitutional proposals which are before us, and an unbalanced view of what Canada is really all about in the year 1981.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: You will realize it later.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, for some time we have been engaged in the penultimate parliamentary act of giving Canada a new Constitution. Many years ago the task was thought to be impossible. Yet we have come through the process of working towards constitutional change and patriation of our Constitution. Over the years, there have been countless conferences held at many Canadian centres to discuss the process and the options, but until this time in history we have been unable to achieve consensus.

Should we have been surprised? The fact is that “nation building” is not a convenient process; it is tough and difficult. It was tough and difficult in 1865, 1866 and 1867—and at all the conferences and meetings, formal and informal, which preceded that time—for the original Fathers of Confederation (and there must also have been many mothers involved behind the scenes in some constructive capacity!). If the debates of those days had been televised, had they been televised and broadcasted coast to coast in Canada, there is no doubt whatever, honourable senators, that there would have been many Canadian viewers and listeners apprehensive and dissatisfied with the proposed form and shape of Confederation. Many Canadians at that time might have said, “It is impossible. It is not feasible. It is impractical. You have left this out of the proposed B.N.A. Act; you have left that out. Let us, therefore, not form this great federated union.”

And today, just as at the time of Confederation, we have had great arguments with respect to moral, philosophical and legal issues. But this is not a process which should shock or dismay; it is a process which should inspire Canadians to be thankful that there are so many of them who believe in this nation and its potential, and who feel so passionately about its future that they have engaged so vigorously in this difficult modern constitutional dialogue. Never in the history of this country have more Canadians, of every background, ethnic and religious, engaged in such a passionate dialogue with respect to the future of their country. Significantly, the longest debate ever held in Parliament has centred around the future of Canada, as well it should. It is of such fundamental importance.

After 54 years of constitutional stalemate, a Prime Minister has been willing to make a tough decision to end that stalemate. Because he has been willing to do the hard, difficult things, this day has been made possible. He deserves the commendation of Canadians for his force of spirit, his intellect and his perseverance, and not the derision which has been heaped on him this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition. This is a great Prime Minister.

Senator Buckwold said earlier today, “I may have some difficulty describing how one achieves success, but I know how one achieves failure, and that is by attempting to please everyone.”

The constitutional process has not pleased everyone. It has not pleased any single senator in this chamber, totally. It has not pleased, totally, the Prime Minister himself, or the Leader of the Conservative opposition, or the Leader of the New Democratic Party, or any one provincial government. But we have the miracle of consensus that in a nation of this great diversity, where so many cultural differences exist, it has been possible to achieve a consensus which so many senators have so eloquently described and discussed in recent debates.

Some have said that this is not the time for constitutional change or reform, because there are “other priorities.” We have been reminded of some of those “priorities”. We have been reminded of the need for Canadians to have jobs and of the need for opportunity in this nation. These are important priorities, but is there ever a good time for constitutional change and reform? Is there ever a time in the history of a nation which is the perfect, ideal time? That time for reform must be grasped by a government and a Prime Minister when clearly the best interests of the nation are to be served. That time is now. The process in which we are engaged may determine the continued survival of Canada.

We heard the Doomsday scenario that the Leader of the Opposition described this afternoon, that lugubrious recital of what may happen; but, to quote the words of the Minister of Justice from the great province of Quebec:

[Translation]

Each time that they have had to choose, the people of Quebec have always opted for Canada. We have therefore decided to listen to those who had been elected as federalists to represent Quebecers in the House of Commons, rather than the members of the P.Q. government in Quebec who uphold separatism once elected but who get elected by promising not to separate during their mandate.

[English]

Senator Asselin: What about Mr. Ryan?

Senator Perrault: He then went on to say this:—it is unfortunate that we did not obtain the agreement of the tenth province, the Province of Quebec. I feel that the Premier of Quebec had a duty here to forget his party and to act as the representative of the Province of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister too!

Senator Perrault: The Minister of Justice continued as follows:

There are only three clauses that separate us. Considerable progress has been made on two of the clauses, and if misgivings still exist, we are prepared to discuss them.

Senator Asselin: When?

Senator Perrault: The question is, honourable senators, who speaks for the provinces? Is it the exclusive preserve of the Premier of Quebec to speak on behalf of 7 million people of that province? Is it the exclusive preserve of Mr. Bennett to speak on behalf of 2 million people in the Province of British Columbia? Why are we here in this chamber? Why are they in the other place? We are here to represent the integrity of this nation in Parliament and to make certain that, while regional interests are protected, the national interest is preserved.

There are distinguished representatives in this chamber from the province of Quebec, and there are representatives from the other provinces. All have a passionate concern about the future of this country, and yet I am surprised that we have heard today the Leader of the Conservative Party in this chamber stating that we are operating against the will of the people of his province—

Senator Smith: That is the evidence.

Senator Perrault:—yet, you know, what do we hear from his leader, Mr. Clark? Mr. Clark has a greater vision of this nation, and he deserves the commendation of Canadians for the constructive role he played in bringing this Accord into being. He said:

This is not another phase in the constitutional debate. This is very much a new phase. There is now a much different atmosphere in the country. Everyone taking part in the debate bears some of the scars of compromise, and there is nothing at all dishonourable about that. Compromise is the way we make Canada work; however, to end with compromise, one must start with principle.

And he also said:

[Senator Perrault.]

the real nature of this amending formula . . . has not yet been fully understood.

The Honourable Senator Flynn obviously does not understand it.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: Let the words of his leader be absorbed.

It is a formula that combines the required features of flexibility and equal treatment of provinces.

The Right Honourable Joe Clark's scenario is not the dismal scenario of alleged discrimination which the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition spelled out in this chamber this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: You are misinterpreting Mr. Clark, because he moved compensation, and you know that. Misrepresentation!

Senator Perrault: Then Mr. Clark went on to say this—and in this case he was talking about the Premier of Ontario and his very real flexibility in agreeing to allow such a concept to be recognized by the removal of any provincial veto:

The formula allows changes to be made when it is demonstrated that such changes are needed. At the same time, it ensures that changes are not made without due consideration. Seven provinces must agree to an amendment—

And so on.

Senator Flynn: Where do you find that?

Senator Perrault: At page 13052 of Hansard of the other place.

Senator Flynn: Of what date?

Senator Perrault: The date is November 20. I know Senator Flynn has a copy of the speech in his desk.

Senator Flynn: Would you quote the same speech, when he moved for financial compensation?

Senator Perrault: I will talk about financial compensation.

Senator Smith: You'd better!

Senator Perrault: Let us talk about compensation.

Senator Flynn: At that time the compensation was there. Misrepresentation!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, senators listened with rapt attention to the Leader of the Opposition. I hope the same courtesy will be extended to the other side of this house. Let me repeat: The national government will be willing to consider full fiscal compensation for opting out in the first constitutional talks after patriation—the proposal advanced by Claude Ryan in his telex of November 9 to the Prime Minister. The concept of fiscal compensation has been established in this resolution partially as a result of the suggestions of Mr. Ryan, who is a good Quebecer. The provinces have agreed to the present section, which provides compensation in areas of culture and education.

● (1640)

Senator Flynn: Why not now?

Senator Perrault: There is a commitment by the national government to discuss the issue of compensation in the first conference after this process.

If honourable senators are suggesting that there should be further delays, that nothing be done until three or four more conferences have taken place, may I say that the government rejects that idea, but does accept the idea that the proposals before us represent but a beginning.

Senator Flynn: The beginning of the end, yes.

Senator Perrault: This is but a beginning of the kind that was spoken about by George Brown in 1865, when he said that there is no such thing as a perfect agreement.

Senator Smith: This one is certainly not!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall quote George Brown:

The whole great ends of this Confederation may not be realized in the lifetime of many who now hear me. We imagine not that such a structure can be built in a month or in a year.

He was right.

What we propose now is but to lay the foundations of the structure, to set in motion the governmental machinery that will one day, we trust, extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

We are still in the process of establishing the foundations. It is not the beginning of the end but the end of the beginning, Honourable Senator Flynn; it is not the black and devastating scenario that you have spelled out this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: It is not difficult to vote for the amendments.

Senator Perrault: The resolution of constitutional issues is necessary for the continued survival of Canada. The necessity of the constitutional project derives from the profound nature of its two basic elements: patriation; and the entrenchment of that Charter of Rights which has been discussed in the Senate today.

Patriation, with its amending formula, runs the risk of being perceived, in the eyes of many, as being only symbolic and abstract. Some people have suggested that it is almost unnecessary. "If Canada is already functionally independent", some people ask, "why is it necessary to go through the mere symbolic act of severing a tie with Britain?" Surely, a nation is more than the legal residue left by the operation of statutes and conventions. It is the function of a constitution to express a collective reality based on shared assumptions. How is unity to be achieved when the juridical limits of nationhood are not completely defined in Canada? On a more prosaic level, what has been obscured behind all of the talk of the symbolic nature of patriation are the many real and important issues, with profound economic and social implications, which will now be approached with a clear set of ground rules. I speak of issues such as resources, equalization, communications, and the very status of the Senate itself, which are dealt with in the proposals before us. They can now be dealt with in the context of a new Constitution—a Constitution which attempts to secure a strong legal and economic union while balancing the legitimate concerns of the provinces, the regions and the central government.

The second element of the project, as honourable senators are aware, is the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights. Much has been written over the past few months about the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights. Perhaps the strongest, most vocal criticism is that the government proposes to give Canadians the rights and freedoms set out in the Charter. It would, of course, be presumption itself to suggest that any government is "giving" any of these freedoms to anyone. The Charter guarantees those rights and freedoms to give the Canadian people a method by which they can resist derogation of those rights by government. This is positive and this is good. This does not presume bad faith or malign intent on the part of any level of government. It is recognition of the fact that, as society grows more complex, the forces of history might cause some government, in the name of expediency, convenience, financial necessity or even inattention, to unreasonably limit the rights and freedoms of Canadians, wherever they live. This Charter is going to provide protection against perverse processes of that kind.

It is a time of national maturity, honourable senators, and, indeed, courage that, when freedom is under assault in almost every continent of the world, we should be moving in this chamber to broaden the area of human freedoms and to establish a Charter of Rights which undeniably will help Canadians, whatever their background. We are giving the individual citizens power to protect themselves against the arbitrary action of government.

The dual legacy of the constitutional project—patriation, which will benefit the collectivity of Canada, and the entrenchment of rights, which will benefit individual Canadians—will survive in a stronger Canada when the shrill voices of recrimination, ill feeling and regional conflict have become of interest only to historians. Canada can take pride in a Constitution that has been fashioned in a truly Canadian way—by consensus. It is not the product of one individual, one group, one association, or one group of parliamentarians. It is that process on which the Canadian federation was founded. It is a participating and democratic system based on the rule of law. Not one segment of society was ignored in this process of shaping the constitutional proposals.

Substantial amendments were made to the resolution at the committee stage, at other stages and thereafter in Parliament to include those legitimate concerns which have been overlooked—

Senator Flynn: Not those of Quebec, though.

Senator Perrault: —aboriginal and treaty rights, the multicultural heritage of Canada, the applicability of rights equally to men and women, and the recognition that Canada is founded on the principles of the supremacy of God and the rule of law were only a few of the 65 amendments that were made at this stage.

The Canadian judicial system referred to by Senator Flynn today, and by other speakers in the past, also played a valuable role in the process of forging a final document. The provincial challenge of the constitutional resolution in the courts of Quebec, Newfoundland and Manitoba was eventually appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. The decision of Canada's highest court—that unilateral patriation was legal but was not in accordance with convention, with tradition—persuaded the federal government to return to the negotiating table. The result was the historic agreement of November 5. Someone, some day, might write a book entitled "Four Days in November." How many Canadians will forget that experience?

Senator Flynn: It was the beginning of the end.

Senator Perrault: How many Canadians will forget that time when meetings were held here in Ottawa to discuss the future of the country?

Senator Asselin: It is the beginning of the end, you will see.

Senator Olson: It is the beginning of new strength.

Senator Perrault: Anyone following those first four days of November will not soon forget the emotions experienced—the frustrations and the final exhilaration when an agreement was announced.

Of course, all of this was tempered by the lack of unanimity—the lack of agreement on the part of the Government of Quebec. This continues to mystify and concern many of us, honourable senators. The Leader of the Opposition in the chamber today spoke in terms of all of the people of Quebec being represented by the present provincial government, yet it is a government whose leader is now very concerned about some of the actions and policies espoused by his own followers. Again, this question must be asked: Who really speaks for the province of Quebec? Yes, and today who really speaks for the Parti Québécois? That is an even more fundamental question.

But the process of guaranteeing human rights and freedoms did not end at one issue. The removal of the recognition of aboriginal rights and of the equality of men and women and the rejection of the resolution by the Government of Quebec was not satisfactory to many parts of the country, and they made their views known. Changes and accommodations were made. The result was a reinstatement by Parliament of the first two rights and further changes to the resolution which would hopefully move the Quebec government closer to acceptance of this package. That may come in time. With goodwill it will come very shortly.

This is not a perfect document. The hopes of each individual and group in our society will not be answered by it. Nor does it fulfil every expectation. It does, however, lay down basic rights and states the principles which we, as Canadians, feel are important. Yes, and with goodwill, agreement can be reached on future changes—

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: Fifty years from now.

Senator Perrault: —as honourable senators are aware further changes can be made through an amending formula, a formula which will end 54 years of frustration which have made the constitution amending process an absolute, frustrating deadlock.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: This is not the end of it.

Senator Perrault: This consensus for a Constitution, the achievement of this fundamental document, has resulted from a participation process that can truly be said to represent what is best in Canada and what is best in all Canadians.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms is one of the most important components, if not the main component, of the Constitution Act. For the first time in Canadian history our Constitution will reflect a clear, legal and political commitment to basic liberal, democratic values.

The Charter is not a document which has been "sprung" on the public unawares. It has its roots in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights of the 1960s. I suspect that if Mr. Diefenbaker were here today he would be on the building gang and not the wrecking crew. He would be supportive of what we are doing today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: Just a moment. He would be disgusted with your Charter of Rights. You know that very well. Disgusted!

Senator Perrault: The Right Honourable John Diefenbaker looked forward to the day when a Charter of Rights, his Bill of Rights, would be entrenched in the Canadian Constitution, and he expressed deep regret that it was not possible during his time to achieve that goal because of the deadlocked mechanism to amend the Constitution.

Senator Flynn: That's right. No unilateral action? No imposition!

Senator Perrault: And so Mr. Diefenbaker should be given full credit for helping to bring us to this day. Many Canadians of all parties will agree with that view.

The idea of a constitutional Charter or an entrenched Charter was the subject of serious discussion during the 1968-71 constitutional negotiations which culminated in the Victoria Charter. If it had been adopted unanimously by the provinces, the Victoria Charter would have included entrenched political and language rights. Senator Flynn will recall those days.

Despite the lack of success at Victoria, the idea of an entrenched charter had taken root, and the discussion of this subject continued in political, legal and academic circles as well as among the general public. Proposals for entrenched charters were included in Bill C-60, the report of the Canadian Bar Association's constitutional committee, the Pepin-Robarts task force report and the "beige paper" of the Quebec Liberal Party.

It is interesting to note that, in addition to the Canadian Bill of Rights, there are also Bills of Rights in Alberta, Quebec and Saskatchewan advanced by various political parties. These are clear indications and evidence again that the desire for a Charter of Rights and the protection of fundamental freedoms is not restricted to any one political party. The New Democratic Party in Saskatchewan sponsored a measure there. The Social Credit Party did so in the province of Alberta—or perhaps it was the Conservative Party which followed.

The idea of entrenchment or “constitutionalization” of rights is not entirely foreign to Canadian constitutional practice and history. The provision of section 91.1 of the B.N.A. Act requiring us to go to Westminster to amend those parts of our Constitution dealing with institutional language rights, the division of powers, and several other matters, is an example of the entrenchment of rights. In essence, entrenchment means that something more than action of Parliament or provincial legislatures is required to alter a fundamental right.

The Charter we are about to adopt as part of the Constitution Act will be entrenched. The basic rights contained in it will be changed only by use of the amending formula. No legislative body, acting alone, will be able to remove any of the rights from the Charter. The effect of the Charter is to put a restriction, or a limit, on what governments can do. It says that we as a society recognize that there are some areas of basic values which must be immune from government or administrative interference. The Charter is unique in that it enables Parliament and the provincial legislatures to override it in specific legislative situations. When that is done, it will have to occur in explicit terms, leaving no doubt as to legislative intentions. As we should remind ourselves, honourable senators, this power would be used only in exceptional circumstances. Any government wishing to use a non obstante clause would have to use it for good reasons. The effect of the invocation of such an exceptional clause would be to provide a broad public discussion of rights and freedoms. Our society will only benefit from that type of debate.

I should like to say a word about the Province of Quebec, honourable senators, because the Honourable Senator Flynn, in his speech, spent so much time on this subject. In the wake of the constitutional Accord reached on November 5 of this year between Ottawa and nine out of the ten provinces, the Quebec government announced its opposition to the Accord and explained that that opposition centred on three features of the new resolution: the mobility rights clause; minority language education; and financial compensation for opting out of future constitutional change.

Having stated its objections to these aspects of the resolution, the Quebec government, despite repeated overtures by the Prime Minister and polls showing that a majority of the Quebec population supported such a move, has refused to renew negotiations to arrive at any consensus in respect of the contested aspects of the constitutional package. Yet, incredibly, we are told by the Leader of the Opposition today—

Senator Flynn: What did you do on your side?

Senator Perrault: We are told by the Leader of the Opposition today that this is a hard, inflexible federal government, unwilling to compromise. We have made specific offers.

Senator Asselin: You didn't do anything about it.

Senator Perrault: We have made specific offers to the Premier of Quebec and his government to negotiate and to arrive at a consensus in respect of all of the contested aspects of the constitutional package, and the Leader of the Opposition said today, “We must give more time to find out what can be achieved through negotiations.” I suggest to the honourable Conservative leader—

Senator Flynn: You could vote for the amendment before us.

Senator Perrault: I suggest to him that this government has given the Province of Quebec and all of the provinces a very fair and generous opportunity for input into the present constitutional process.

Senator Flynn: It would be very easy to do, if you were sincere.

Senator Perrault: In spite of the Quebec government's desire to avoid reaching any sort of compromise, efforts have been made to modify the constitutional resolution so as to minimize the objections first expressed on November 5. That is particularly evident in section 59 of the resolution, which, in effect, leaves it up to Quebec to decide whether it will offer minority language education on the basis of freedom of choice; and in section 40, which provides for reasonable compensation to be paid where a province chooses to dissent from a constitutional amendment which affects its legislative powers in relation to education or other cultural matters.

While these modifications to the constitutional package have been rejected as inadequate by the present government of Quebec, one must surely ask whether any amount of flexibility would have satisfied that government.

Senator Asselin: And Mr. Ryan, too.

Senator Perrault: Could the Government of Canada have done anything at all to have achieved an agreement with the present Government of Quebec?

Senator Asselin: What about Mr. Ryan?

Senator Perrault: Yes, the same Mr. Ryan who urged Mr. Lévesque to sit down and negotiate. The essence of compromise is that concessions have to be made, and one cannot achieve concessions unless one draws to the bargaining table both sides.

● (1700)

Senator Flynn: Why don't you?

Senator Asselin: Why don't you vote in favour of our amendment?

Senator Perrault: Can anyone deny that concessions have been made and more offered, and that they go a long way to reassuring Quebecers that their concerns have been taken into consideration? Further, it should not be forgotten that the constitutional resolution is only the first step in the process of constitutional renewal. The federal and all other provincial governments have already demonstrated their willingness to consider the unique position of Quebec in Canada. This attention to the needs of Quebec should continue to mark the process of constitutional revision in the years ahead, just as attention to the needs of all of the provinces deserves the same kind of concern and consideration by the Government of Canada.

The new section 59 will ensure that the Charter of Rights will not affect the language legislation of the Province of Quebec beyond surely a necessary minimum in providing all Canadian citizens—and this can apply to all of the provinces—with the right to have their children educated in the language in which they received their primary school instruction.

The constitutional resolution also embodies many of the features previously supported by the Quebec government. The amending formula, for example, is essentially that which the provinces supported at Vancouver.

The right to opt out of future constitutional amendments derogating from the legislative power, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province guarantees to all provinces that future constitutional change will not operate to a province's detriment.

In conclusion, honourable senators, we are very close to an historic moment in Canadian history, a moment which has eluded parliamentarians ever since Confederation. In a few moments we will cast our votes, and I think that most Canadians in this chamber will want to sing in the process, O Canada, and that they will sing not only with their voices but also with their hearts.

The Prime Minister made a speech in Vancouver a few days ago, and this is how he concluded it:

There's only one road to follow for those who love this vast and wonderful free country—this whole country—this one country.

That answer, that road leads towards ever closer unity among Canadians—toward shared growth and opportunity, toward a future which will build together for all of our children and not for children separated by province.

And finally, he said:

Well, that's the vision that is guiding many of us . . . in these tempestuous times, and that's the vision which will continue to inspire us, whoever wants to belong to that "us"—for as long as the sun rises on our eastern shores and sets in the beautiful west.

Honourable senators, the time has come for all of us to vote for Canada and for national unity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in accordance with the motion adopted on December 3, 1981, I must now call an end to the proceedings and put all the questions in order to dispose of the motion.

[Senator Perrault.]

I shall read only the amendments, unless honourable senators insist that I read the main motion each time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by Senator Frith, that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended by striking out Section 40 and substituting the following therefore:

"40. In the event that a province dissents from an amendment conferring legislative jurisdiction on Parliament, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of that province, taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction in the provinces which have approved the amendment."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion in amendment of Senator Roblin resolved in the negative on the following division:

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment of Senator Macquarrie defeated.

Senator Lang: I rise on a point of order and privilege.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

An Hon. Senator: During a vote?

Senator Flynn: Just say what you want to do.

Senator Lang: My point of order and privilege—

The Hon. the Speaker: I suggest that the honourable senator may rise after a vote, but during a vote I am not sure that—

Senator Lang: I am rising after a vote.

Honourable senators, what I am really trying to point out is that in the votes on the amendments so far I have voted neither one way nor the other. Now, rule 49 that a senator who declines to vote, which I have done in this chamber up to this point, shall assign his reasons. I would like to explain my reasons and say why I am not going to decline to vote on the next amendment.

The amendments so far, in my interpretation, have been ephemeral and unreal, because the government has presented us with a package backed by the consent of nine premiers and the House of Commons. I think that to attempt to amend those issues at this stage in our debate is unreal and politically impossible. I do not want to play charades, but what I want to do is to support the next amendment which I think is real and does not fall within the fallacies that have been perpetrated to date. I hope honourable senators will accept my explanation under rule 49.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I think Senator Lang is right. Senators who abstain from voting are supposed to give an explanation. Such explanations should be given if requested, but I am not going to look all over the chamber to see whether there is a senator who is not voting. However, Senator Lang was perfectly in order in referring to the rule and giving the explanation.

Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C.,

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended as follows:

(a) by deleting therefrom Parts I, II, III, IV and VI and Sections 54 and 59 of Part VII;

(b) by deleting the first line of Section 58 and replacing it with the following:

"This Act shall"; and

(c) by renumbering the remaining Parts and Sections accordingly.

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981 be amended by:

(a) adding after section 31 the following new section:

32. Nothing in this Charter precludes Parliament from legislating on the rights of unborn children; and

(b) by re-numbering the subsequent sections accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Motion in amendment of Senator Haidasz negated on the following division:

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment of Senator Haidasz defeated.

Honourable senators, we have come to the last, but not least, motion.

● (1810)

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to 10 provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

A respectful address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

CONSIDÉRANT :

que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la 10 Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications, il est proposé que soit présentée respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont 15 la teneur suit :

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,
Très Gracieuse Souveraine :

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, 20 respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth: 25

Nous, membres du Sénat du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, 20 demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu :

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Loi donnant suite à une demande du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :
5 qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes 10 du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin, 15

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

1. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1981, énoncée à l'annexe B, est édictée pour le Canada et y a force de loi. Elle entre en vigueur conformément à ses dispositions.

2. No Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

2. Les lois adoptées par le Parlement du Royaume-Uni après l'entrée en vigueur de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1981 ne font pas partie du droit du Canada.

3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.

3. La partie de la version française de la présente loi qui figure à l'annexe A a force de loi au Canada au même titre que la version anglaise correspondante.

4. This Act may be cited as the Canada Act.

4. Titre abrégé de la présente loi : Loi sur le Canada.

PARTIE V

PROCÉDURE DE MODIFICATION DE LA CONSTITUTION DU CANADA

38. (1) La Constitution du Canada peut être modifiée par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée à la fois :

Procédure normale de modification

a) par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes;

b) par des résolutions des assemblées législatives d'au moins deux tiers des provinces dont la population confondue repré-

that have, in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

Majority of members

(2) An amendment made under subsection (1) that derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a majority of the members of each of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies required under subsection (1).

Expression of dissent

(3) An amendment referred to in subsection (2) shall not have effect in a province the legislative assembly of which has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of its members prior to the issue of the proclamation to which the amendment relates unless that legislative assembly, subsequently, by resolution supported by a majority of its members, revokes its dissent and authorizes the amendment.

Revocation of dissent

(4) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of subsection (3) may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of the proclamation to which it relates.

Restriction on proclamation

39. (1) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) before the expiration of one year from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder, unless the legislative assembly of each province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

Idem

(2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

Compensation

40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers provincial legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

Amendment by unanimous consent

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters sente, selon le recensement général le plus récent à l'époque, au moins cinquante pour cent de la population de toutes les provinces.

5 Majorité simple

(2) Une modification faite conformément au paragraphe (1) mais dérogatoire à la compétence législative, aux droits de propriété ou à tous autres droits ou privilèges d'une législature ou d'un gouvernement provincial exige une résolution adoptée à la majorité des sénateurs, des députés fédéraux et des députés de chacune des assemblées législatives du nombre requis de provinces.

Désaccord

(3) La modification visée au paragraphe (2) est sans effet dans une province dont l'assemblée législative a, avant la prise de la proclamation, exprimé son désaccord par une résolution adoptée à la majorité des députés, sauf si cette assemblée, par résolution également adoptée à la majorité, revient sur son désaccord et autorise la modification.

Levée du désaccord

(4) La résolution de désaccord visée au paragraphe (3) peut être révoquée à tout moment, indépendamment de la date de la proclamation à laquelle elle se rapporte.

Restriction

39. (1) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise dans l'année suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification que si l'assemblée législative de chaque province a préalablement adopté une résolution d'agrément ou de désaccord.

Idem

(2) La proclamation visée au paragraphe 38(1) ne peut être prise que dans les trois ans suivant l'adoption de la résolution à l'origine de la procédure de modification.

Compensation

40. Le Canada fournit une juste compensation aux provinces auxquelles ne s'applique pas une modification faite conformément au paragraphe 38(1) et relative, en matière d'éducation ou dans d'autres domaines culturels, à un transfert de compétences législatives provinciales au Parlement.

Consentement unanime

41. Toute modification de la Constitution du Canada portant sur les questions suivantes

may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

- (a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;
- (b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;
- (c) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;
- (d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and
- (e) an amendment to this Part.

tes se fait par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée par des résolutions du Sénat, de la Chambre des communes et de l'assemblée législative de chaque province :

- a) la charge de Reine, celle de gouverneur général et celle de lieutenant-gouverneur;
- b) le droit d'une province d'avoir à la Chambre des communes un nombre de députés au moins égal à celui des sénateurs par lesquels elle est habilitée à être représentée lors de l'entrée en vigueur de la présente partie;
- c) sous réserve de l'article 43, l'usage du français ou de l'anglais;
- d) la composition de la Cour suprême du Canada;
- e) la modification de la présente partie.

Amendment by general
procedure

42. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

- (a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;
- (b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;
- (c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;
- (d) subject to paragraph 41(d), the Supreme Court of Canada;
- (e) the extension of existing provinces into the territories; and
- (f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces.

(2) Subsections 38(2) to (4) do not apply in respect of amendments in relation to matters referred to in subsection (1).

43. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces, including

- (a) any alteration to boundaries between provinces, and

42. (1) Toute modification de la Constitution du Canada portant sur les questions suivantes se fait conformément au paragraphe 38(1) :

- a) le principe de la représentation proportionnelle des provinces à la Chambre des communes prévu par la Constitution du Canada;
- b) les pouvoirs du Sénat et le mode de sélection des sénateurs;
- c) le nombre des sénateurs par lesquels une province est habilitée à être représentée et les conditions de résidence qu'ils doivent remplir;
- d) sous réserve de l'alinéa 41d), la Cour suprême du Canada;
- e) le rattachement aux provinces existantes de tout ou partie des territoires;
- f) par dérogation à toute autre loi ou usage, la création de provinces.

(2) Les paragraphes 38(2) à (4) ne s'appliquent pas aux questions mentionnées au paragraphe (1).

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

50. The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

"Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

- (a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;
- (b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and
- (c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

Primary Production from Non-Renewable Natural Resources and Forestry Resources

Production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières

1. For the purposes of section 92A of this Act,

1. Pour l'application de l'article 92A : 40

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood."

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction du milieu naturel,

(ii) soit le produit non manufacturé de la transformation, du raffinage ou de l'affinage d'une ressource, à l'exception du produit du raffinage du pétrole brut, du raffinage du pétrole brut lourd amélioré, du raffinage des gaz ou des liquides dérivés du charbon ou du raffinage d'un équivalent synthétique du pétrole brut;

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1982

DECEMBER 8, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982 were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, December 1, 1981, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (D) and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of December 1, 1981 to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (D) and heard evidence from the Honourable H. Gray, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and officials from his department.

Only one item is contained in Supplementary Estimates "D", 1981-82, and this is for payments in respect of loan guarantees and interim operating expenses equalling $94 million made in respect of the sale of the Crown's interests in Consolidated Computer Inc. The total Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982 are now increased to $69,149 million.

History

Consolidated Computer Inc. (CCI) is a computer software and hardware developer, specializing in data entry systems. It has a wholly-owned U.S. subsidiary and a Canadian subsidiary called La Corporation Informatique CCI Ltée. CCI also has a related leasing vehicle, Financeco, which has a wholly-owned subsidiary called Finecomp.

The federal government's involvement with Consolidated Computer Inc. began in 1971 through the Enterprise Development Program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Over the past decade, the federal and Ontario governments together have acquired approximately 65% of the outstanding common shares of the company; the remaining shares are owned by Fujitsu Limited of Japan.

Under the Enterprise Development Program, the government insured a total of $91 million in loans—$47.4 million on behalf of CCI and $43.6 million on behalf of Financeco and Finecomp. The federal government is responsible for approximately $88 million of these loans; the Ontario government for $3 million.

In June 1981, the government announced its intentions to sell the Crown-owned shares as the "most cost effective solution to the problems faced by the company". On November 27, the Minister of ITC announced that the Nabu Manufacturing Corporation had bought the government shares for approximately $7.5 million in cash and participation payments. The federal government will receive $100,000 in cash and "expects to recover $7 million to $8 million in participation payments over the next 5 years".

Under the terms of the sale, Nabu has agreed to:

- the preservation of virtually all jobs
- the operation of CCI for at least 2 years
- the provision of sufficient working capital
- the waiving of all claims for tax loss carried forward in respect of previously accrued losses by CCI.

The federal government has agreed to pay off the indebtedness of CCI to Financeco and Finecomp ($91 million), as well as to provide a $3 million contingency fund "to permit CCI to meet its interest costs and operating shortfalls" until the sale closes in early January.

The Committee questioned the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on a number of issues which arise from this estimate. Specifically, the Minister was asked to comment on the process of obtaining loan guarantees in relation to this case and in general terms. Questions were also raised regarding the potential extent of federal liabilities arising out of existing loan arrangements. The specific terms of the sale transaction were also discussed with the Minister.

The Minister informed the Committee that the government is undertaking a thorough examination of this case in order to discover the source of the failure. We recommend that the results of this examination be made available for further discussion and consideration.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

NORTHERN PIPELINE

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): With the permission of honourable senators, I would like to make a brief statement regarding the status of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline project.

I am pleased to announce that the United States House of Representatives has today approved the waiver package requested by the sponsors of the pipeline system by a vote of 233 to 173. As honourable senators will recall, President Reagan forwarded this package to Congress on October 15, 1981. In his transmittal message, the President said:

It is critical to the energy security of this country that the federal government not obstruct development of energy resources on the North Slope of Alaska. For this reason, it is important the Congress begin expeditiously to consider and adopt a waiver of those laws that impede private financing of the project.

Over the course of the past several weeks, a series of congressional hearings was conducted by committees of both the House of Representatives and the Senate to consider the legislative amendments put forward by the President. Testimony was heard from representatives of the Canadian and American pipeline sponsors, the gas producers, major lending institutions, the U.S. administration, and various interest groups. After considering the evidence, the responsible committees in both the House of Representatives and the Senate voted to recommend adoption of the waiver package. On November 19, 1981, the Senate approved the proposed waiver by a vote of 75 to 19.

Today's vote by the House of Representatives underlines the continuing commitment of the U.S. government and Congress to the successful completion of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline as provided for in the Canada-U.S. agreement of 1977.

It was back in June 1980, in Washington, that I met with the key administration officials and Congressional leaders to explain to them the assurances with respect to the expeditious completion of the entire project that the Canadian government required before it could approve first-stage construction of the southern segments of the system. At that time, the major U.S. players acknowledged that Canada's requests were just and reasonable.

Following our meeting, both houses of Congress passed a unanimous resolution which stated that the pipeline remains "an essential part of securing this nation's energy future and, as such, enjoys the highest level of Congressional support".

The next month, President Carter wrote to the Prime Minister indicating that the administration remained committed to the project and would seek from Congress, at the appropriate time, those changes to the U.S. legislation that were considered essential to the successful financing of the northern segment of the pipeline in both the United States and Canada.

These assurances were among the factors which the Canadian government took into account in approving the early construction of the southern segments of the pipeline. I am sure honourable senators will agree that considerable progress has been made since I stood in this place on July 17, 1980, to announce that decision.

● (1405)

Construction of the western leg is complete. Gas began to flow through the system to southern California on October 1, 1981. Work on the eastern leg began in both Canada and the United States in May of this year and will be completed over a two-year construction period. By the fall of 1982 gas should be moving through that leg to consumers in the U.S. mid-west.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Planning for construction of the northern sections in Canada has been proceeding, and Foothills expects to begin clearing operations in the Yukon and northern B.C. in the first quarter of 1983.

Considerable strides have also been taken with respect to the Alaskan segment. Since June 1980 the sponsor and producers have worked together to complete the final design and engineering for the Alaskan line and gas-conditioning plant. Both are now in advanced stages. On May 21, 1981, the sponsor and producers came to an agreement on an initial plan for the financing of the system. In reaching that crucial agreement they recognized that, if private financing was to be secured, certain waivers would be required in the United States enabling legislation. The legislative action taken in the United States today considerably strengthens the position of the sponsors in both countries to meet the immense challenge still remaining of raising the billions of dollars of capital required to fund the second stage of the construction of this enormous project.

We welcome the steps that President Reagan and the Congress have taken through the passage of the waiver package to move this joint Canada-U.S. project closer to fruition.

Honourable senators, in concluding I should like to recall to your memory that this pipeline represents the largest civil engineering project ever undertaken anywhere in the world.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The amount of investment, and consequently the economic activity that will be generated in Canada, is in excess of approximately $10 billion to $12 billion. It includes such things as well over one million tons of 56-inch steel pipe, compressor stations, turbine drives as well as other types of drives that will be built in Canada, in addition to the on-site construction that is involved.

Honourable senators, I think it is generally acknowledged around the world now that Canada is the best in the world in the technology involved in such things as design, fabrication and installation of large-size pipelines. That is true not only of the pipe itself, but of such things as large-size compressors and the huge turbine drives for those compressors, whether or not they use gas or some other form of energy. We can look on this project, therefore, as a major step forward, not only because of the economic activity it will generate directly in Canada but also because it will advance the technology in Canada, a technology in which we are already recognized as world leaders.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Are you applauding yourself, Senator Perrault?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to begin by acknowledging the co-operation of the Congress of the United States in this matter. It is because of the actions of the Congress that the whole of this tremendous investment project is now to be made possible. I wish to bear witness to the fact that the undertakings given to Canada, when we approached the United States on this subject, have now, so far as I am aware, been completely discharged in respect of this matter. I expect, however, that the question of financing will still remain a problem until we see what can be put in place.

It is truly difficult to grasp the magnitude of this project. If what the minister has said is fact—that this is one of the largest, or the largest project of investment in North America—then it is a stunning fact, and it will have a most important impact on the economy of North America. I say North America because, of course, the gas is to provide energy to the United States, and I am positive that most of the money will come from the same source, so it means that it is a North American project.

● (1410)

What particularly interested me in the minister's statement was his reference to the spin-off effect on Canadians. I think that he is referring there to a matter of great importance for the economy of the country. I am not thinking of the economy of the country with respect to the province of Alberta, where this project is to take place, but its spin-off effect on central Canada where, as the minister quite rightly says, the expertise of Canadian management and industry in the construction and operation of these enormous pipelines is second to none.

The point I would like the minister to comment upon has to do with the fact that the government has established a committee designed to secure maximum fallout to Canadian planners, engineers, managers, industry, et cetera, from projects of this kind. I do not know the name of the committee, but the minister knows the one to which I am referring. I believe this committee will operate in co-operation with the provinces. Would the minister tell us whether it is a federal committee alone or whether it is a co-operative committee? If it is the latter, then so much the better.

I am also interested in the policy of the government with respect to the way in which this committee will operate. What are its terms of reference, if they have been established? What will be the criteria which it lays before investors to show what they ought to take into account when placing orders in Canada or the United States? What is the interface between this operation of government and the desire that we may anticipate on the part of the citizens of the United States to have a share of the fallout of this tremendous project as well?

I am in full sympathy with the aim of the committee, which is to maximize the impact of this investment on the Canadian economy. I would like to know how the government proposes to maximize this impact, and I am particularly concerned how they intend to reconcile their position with the necessarily competing interests of the United States.

I make this last point because during debate in the Congress and elsewhere, this matter has received some attention and there has been a strong, quite understandable impetus in the United States to direct some of the business to American suppliers rather than Canadian suppliers. It is an unavoidable conflict of interest, one might say, but one that needs to be managed carefully to maximize the impact on Canada and to minimize the conflicting interests between the two countries. If the minister could give me some information on that aspect of the announcement he has made today, I would be grateful.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to respond by acknowledging that an industrial opportunities arrangement or capability has been set up in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to gather and disseminate to the right Canadian manufacturers information respecting the mega-projects that will be coming on in Canada. This group is in its initial stages, and I am not sure that we can give complete details of the entire structure and its terms of reference.

However, I certainly accept the honourable senator's question as one that deserves an answer, not only for his benefit but also for the benefit of Canadian manufacturers interested in these projects. We hope that we can be particularly beneficial in influencing the changes that will necessarily take place to respond to the massive requirements of supplies, machinery, et cetera, for, not only this mega-project but for a number of other projects as well.

● (1415)

The United States-Canada agreement does not guarantee that Canadian companies will get all the business in Canada or, indeed, that United States companies, in spite of the pressure that is building up, will get all the business in the United States. There is a provision in that agreement that requires some competitive bidding.

I can say, however, regarding what has been done in Canada, where firm orders have been placed, the Canadian content of those lines is well over 90 per cent. The rest of the Canadian section will probably come in at that level, or even higher.

I would suggest that, with the expertise in a number of different areas that we have in this country, it is possible that Canadian firms will bid on certain sections, whether that involves the actual pipe, the compressors, the turbine drives, or whatever, going into the United States section. We believe that we have a good chance of picking up some of that, too.

In conclusion, I will put the question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and try to get as complete an answer as I can shortly.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his statement. I should like him to expand a little on one of the points at issue. The question of competitive bidding is one thing, and it is necessary, I suspect, to adhere to usual commercial practices in connection with bidding, although further considerations may be mentioned in whatever criteria the government will ultimately set up with respect to how this thing is to work.

My question has to do with areas where bids are not sought in the usual commercial competitive sense. When selecting a planner—that is, a company which will organize and lay out this whole procedure—there is a great element of discretion. The selection is not made, as a rule, on a tender basis, but consultants and people of that sort are chosen on a perception-of-competence basis.

It just so happens that many of the very large companies in this business have well-established lines of communication with consultants and others whom they have used in the past and with whom they are familiar. I would suspect that there is a tendency not to look beyond those at times but to deal with people who are known and of whom you are certain, even though there may be others who are just as competent.

The argument is often made that a number of Canadian companies have the competence to do these jobs, but that they are not considered, in the full sense, because the person making the selection is, naturally, influenced by his past experience with people with whom he is familiar and comfortable.

Can we devise a method to ensure that those Canadian consulting bodies, having the expertise, as the minister has said, get full consideration where competitive factors, in the normal sense, are not involved?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that question partly as notice, and I will answer part of it at this time.

[Senator Olson.]

Under the Northern Pipeline Act, which was passed by Parliament some time ago, we moved further in ensuring, through the Northern Pipeline Agency that was set up, a higher level of Canadian content than ever before. It did not remove the competitive factor.

Senator Roblin: What has happened?

Senator Olson: One of the things that has happened is that a tender regarding the acquisition of goods and services has to be submitted to the Northern Pipeline Agency for approval prior to its becoming part of a firm contract. I will answer only that part now, and I will get a more detailed answer as to what the rules are and, indeed, what the practice has been to date.

Senator Roblin: Does the minister anticipate that, in the new project, there will be an opportunity to have an authority, of the kind that rules on the northern pipeline, to bring the same kind of consideration to bear?

Senator Olson: I am sorry; I did not understand the question.

Senator Roblin: Will the minister do the same thing with the new project as he did with the original one, by having his committee supervise the distribution of tenders?

Senator Olson: That is what I was talking about. There is no doubt that the Northern Pipeline Agency will also supervise or give approval to the calling for, and approval of, tenders on the 56-inch main line that is to be built from the Alaska-Yukon border down to the junction northwest of Calgary, which is the section that is left. Those rules would apply to that section as well.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend really think that the Americans will sit still for that?

Senator Olson: They not only sat still for that, but they knew about it.

Senator Roblin: So you will do that?

Senator Olson: We have given them an undertaking, of course, that we are not going to isolate any bidder in Canada to the point where he has a captive market. When the bids went out for the supply of pipe—and let me say that contracts have not been let yet—they went out to a number of companies, including Stelco, IPSCO, and so forth. There was an allocation of the tonnage that was there.

Canadian firms won that fair and square, and that is why I have great confidence that they will win all the rest in Canada, and even more.

Senator Roblin: I hope that my friend is right and that he will give us all the terms of reference under which these various bodies operate.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, perhaps I might add something to what the Honourable Senator Olson has mentioned about the pipeline.

Last Tuesday I had occasion to be present at a meeting with President Reagan, Vice-President Bush and a number of their officials. At that meeting we had an opportunity to discuss the pipeline. President Reagan did indicate at that time that it had the approval of his energy and commerce committee, that it had been passed by the Senate, and that he expected it to be passed by the Congress, which occurred today.

I asked him whether it was the policy of his administration to actively and aggressively support the pipeline through to completion, as was the case with the previous administration under President Carter. President Reagan was very forthright and positive about it and said that, yes, it was the policy of his administration; that this was no guarantee that all the financing would be completed, because it does involve $30 or $40 billion, but that the waiver legislation would make the financing a lot easier. He indicated that it was the policy of his administration to work actively in trying to honour the commitments that the previous administration had made to Canada based on the prebuild, and so forth. He told me that he was working aggressively, and that his people were working actively, to ensure that it would be built.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to know what the question was that Senator Lawson asked.

Senator Flynn: He is just paying us a visit.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Is the Canadian content, whether it be in engineering, legal or insurance, protected in this deal?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it has been to the extent called for in the Canada-U.S. agreement.

I gave an undertaking to Senator Roblin a few minutes ago to bring that information to you. I think you can find that information in the Northern Pipeline Act and schedules attached thereto, if you wish to look it up, but to save you from doing all that homework I shall try to bring in a statement not only as to what is required, but as to what, indeed, has been the practice to this point.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: No, this is not Question Period.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, recently we have adopted the practice—and I might say a good one—that when a statement is made by a minister, there is immediate opportunity for a response to it and for questions that flow from it. That seems reasonable, but it does get us into the habit of thinking that we are already into Question Period. We have not reached Question Period yet, so I think His Honour should return to the order of business.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 7 of the Auditor General Act, Chapter 34, Statutes of Canada, 1976-77.

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of October 1981, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

He said: The report of the Auditor General is a very constructive one, incidentally.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government explain why the Auditor General's report is being tabled in the Senate today when it was tabled in the other place yesterday and a number of questions were asked on it? Why do we get these things after they do?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe it is being tabled in the other place this afternoon. There was a press conference at which the Auditor General spoke about certain aspects of his report. However, I will take the question as notice. I do not consider this to be an inordinate delay.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, do I understand that the Auditor General held a press conference on his report before it was tabled in the other place? If that is so, it is most unusual. I understand that Parliament has the right to see any such document before it is released publicly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. There were some interviews on television—honourable senators may have seen them—involving the Auditor General but that really is all that can be reported at this time.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Auditor General's report was sent to my office yesterday, can the Leader of the Government advise me why, as Senator Marshall has said, the Auditor General would hold a press conference on his report before it is given to Parliament? In other words, what the hell kind of Auditor General do we have—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Muir: —if he is going to report to the press before he reports to Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe that at this point the questions are speculative. It is rather unfair to criticize the Auditor General when, as yet, we do not have the facts in our possession. That question will be taken as notice. I hope that honourable senators will await the arrival of information.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the Auditor General's report, will the Leader of the Government assure us that the government will seriously consider the results before cutting down on the number of photocopying machines in the government service. They have been such a boon to freedom of information.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. A number of questions arose from the minister's statement, and we are now into a series of questions on the Auditor General's report. It seems to me that Senator Marshall's question, dealing with procedure and timing, was in order. Would it not be better for Senator Smith to wait until we reach Question Period and then ask questions arising from the Auditor General's report itself?

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I have no objection to waiting until the Question Period. It merely occurred to me, after some years of experience, that once a minister makes a statement about something, he is then open to being questioned. But I have no problem about waiting.

Senator Perrault: Good things come to those who wait.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that the meeting is scheduled for 3:30 this afternoon, if the motion is agreed to.

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have to admit that I left the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee meeting a little early this morning for a reason which is well understood—to attend the caucus of my party—and I did not hear what had transpired. I would like to know why it is thought we should meet this afternoon. Are there witnesses here this afternoon that we must listen to? I would much rather be in this chamber than in the committee, to tell the truth.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that clearly is a question that is correctly addressed to the chairman of the committee, because it relates to the procedure of that committee. May I refer that question to him?

Senator Roblin: I rather expected he would be the one.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: The course of the constitutional debate interfered with the attendance of witnesses who had been given appointments to appear before the committee, and so we had to reschedule them when we could. Therefore, we confirmed with the witnesses in question, who came from Toronto, last Thursday, I think it was, that if they were available today we would hear them. At that stage we had to assume that it would be necessary to ask leave to meet while the Senate is sitting. All I could hope for was that if I told honourable senators the circumstances, the Senate would honour a commitment made by the chairman. That is the reason.

Senator Roblin: I am satisfied, honourable senators.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Phillipe Guay: Honourable senators, I have an objection. Yesterday morning, there was what is called a lock-up in the other place to consider the report of the Auditor General.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have to raise another point of order.

Senator Guay: What point of order?

Senator Frith: This motion has not yet been dealt with, and it seems to me that Senator Guay is raising a totally different matter.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We have had enough confusion up to this point, certainly.

Hon. Paul. C. Lafond: Honourable senators, in my capacity—which, as far as I know, I still retain—of co-ordinator of committees, I wish to draw the attention of all honourable senators to the situation we now find ourselves in.

Yesterday we agreed to give the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, which was in dire straits, permission to meet today while the Senate is sitting. We are now agreeing to give the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce permission to meet while the Senate is sitting. I am an assiduous member of that committee, and I do not disagree with the motion, but I am just drawing the attention of all honourable senators to the fact that later this afternoon, when the Senate rises, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is holding a meeting.

I should perhaps at this point inform all honourable senators that, as of yesterday's date, I have sent a tentative memorandum to all chairmen of committees that we now have three adequate rooms for public hearings of committees. We must all keep in mind, however, that we have to man those committees, attend those committees, and provide the required quorums. If two committees are to meet at the same time that the Senate is sitting, we are extending the use of our person power, if I may use that expression, as well as the person power of the reporting staff.

What we have today may be an exceptional circumstance, but I would urge chairmen and members of committees to bear that in mind, and to try to modify our ways as we enter the New Year.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, as chairman of one of the standing committees, with your permission I would like to make a comment or two along the line of the remarks just made by the very able senator who endeavours, with pretty good effect, to co-ordinate the activities of our committees.

I think I could say that, as a result of what I have noticed in the last three or four weeks, the resources of that honourable gentleman must have been greatly strained, and that there is a tendency to call too many meetings of committees at the same time, which committees are manned, not necessarily by the same senators but by a sort of interlocking group of senators who, somehow or other, seem to have been selected to serve—and I have no criticism of that—on such committees. The result is that the whips have serious problems in keeping enough members in the committees meeting at the same time to maintain quorums.

I know that there is a tendency to feel that senators should attend one committee rather than another, and, somehow, the committee that I happen to chair does not seem to be one of those so favoured. Consequently, the whip has to work very hard to keep a quorum at its meetings, especially when other committees have chosen to meet at the same time, or at an interlocking time, and have roughly the same members.

For instance, just last week, as my committee was proceeding with more than a quorum, the proceedings were suddenly interrupted by the necessity, or the perceived necessity, for a large number of senators in attendance to go to another meeting. It was a very important meeting, which deserved their attendance. It was just as important as mine, and perhaps, from the point of view of many of us, more important than any other, not excluding Senator Hayden's committee. I could not, or would not, object to their going, and it would not have mattered if I had.

I think, however, that somehow or other the abilities of the very admirable senator who co-ordinates the work of these committees are being stretched to breaking point. Chairmen and others should work out, in support of him, some method whereby committees can meet with a quorum for two or three hours.

Senator Frith: And the Senate too.

Senator Smith: Yes, and the Senate too.

I would be the first to acknowledge that the most significant committee we have is the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and that they ought to be afforded all the facilities, including time and membership, they need to carry out their very important duties; but somehow the rest of us have to be taken into consideration too.

For instance, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is engaged in trying to discharge the directions given it by the Senate to investigate the question of VIA Rail, and all—perhaps I should not say “all”, which would perhaps be going too far—its implications. The committee has, in any case, very wide terms of reference. If that committee is going to discharge that duty, it is going to have to have reasonable time, and its members have to have a reasonable opportunity to attend, with adequate facilities being provided.

I am not making a complaint, because I know that everybody concerned is giving the best possible attention to the problem. All I am saying is that I think the problem is pressing very hard upon Senator Lafond, and that we ought to pay a good deal of attention to his intervention today, with the object of working out a better schedule.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I wonder if, on the same matter and also as the chairman of a Senate committee, I might just make the observation that in the case of the Foreign Affairs Committee we now have ready for committee consideration the draft report of the Subcommittee on National Defence, as well as the report of the main committee on Canada-United States trade. In that connection, we are going to require as much committee time as possible if these matters are to be dealt with before the Christmas adjournment.

Since I believe there is the likelihood of our having to deal with comparatively little legislation in the immediate future, I wonder if the deputy leaders would give consideration to the possibility of having committee meetings, for the next two weeks, on Wednesday afternoons at, say, 3.30, which would allow ample time for Question Period in the Senate first. In this way we could get in some extra time. I simply ask if this could be kept in mind in arranging the business of the house. This period just before Christmas could very profitably be used by committees.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, there is just one point I want to make, as a humble member of a committee and, during the past 10 years, as a member of most of the committees of the Senate. I think we should avoid drawing any distinction between the work of one committee and that of another. As I have said, I have served on seven or eight committees and, in my view, all Senate committees are important. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, chaired by Senator van Roggen, is one on which I served for four years. I know that committee dealt with some very important matters with regard to relations between Canada and the United States. The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which the Honourable Senator Smith chairs with great efficiency, is dealing at the moment with a matter of almost crucial importance to Canada.

Honourable senators, I have to say that I resent even the slightest discrimination against any committee. This is what it amounts to if we go about saying that the work of one committee is more important than that of another. I think we are on dangerous ground in doing that, and I think it should be avoided at all costs.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I simply want to respond to the comments made by my distinguished and dear friend, Senator Smith.

I happen to be a member of the Transport and Communications Committee. It is quite true that some of the members of that committee had to leave in order to attend a meeting of the Internal Economy Committee. In fact, as I left that particular meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee, I was requested to attend a meeting of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee. It is rather difficult to attend all these committee meetings at the same time.

I can, however, appreciate Senator Smith's difficulty. He had arranged for the attendance of his witnesses. Senator Lafond is doing his best to co-ordinate the meetings of the committees. I would like to point out again that this proves there is a lot of work being done by Senate committees. This fact is not always recognized by certain individuals, including representatives of the media. Many people are involved in Senate committees and are doing good work.

I repeat that I can appreciate Senator Smith's situation as chairman. He was perturbed, and rightly so, because a number of us had to leave to attend the other meeting that was being held at the same time. I hope, however, that in the future we shall be able to schedule our meetings in such a way that this type of thing will not recur.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. First of all, I apologize to the deputy leader for rising at the wrong time. I thought the motion had been agreed to.

I believe my point is important, in view of the question posed a moment ago with regard to the report of the Auditor General. No doubt all honourable senators are aware of that report, which was presented to the House of Commons yesterday, and of the fact that the members were in a "lock-up" yesterday morning with the Auditor General.

My question is: Will the Leader of the Government consider the possibility of invitations being extended to senators to attend future lock-ups when reports are given to members of Parliament? I hope he will be able to find a means by which we can be kept informed, along with the members of the House of Commons. After all, senators are also members of Parliament.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course, Senator Guay makes a perfectly valid point.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Of course!

Senator Perrault: I am not aware of any senators who attended the lock-up. However, I was very preoccupied yesterday, as were other honourable senators. It may be that a message was communicated to my office which I have not read. Certainly the point made by Senator Guay is well taken and, in view of his experience as a privy councillor, great weight will be given to it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the same point. In the light of the complaints that have arisen about the lock-up system with respect to the recent budget, to say nothing of those made here today, will my honourable friend undertake to consider the possibility that the lock-up has outlived its usefulness? It would be far better if these matters were presented directly to Parliament, and if people took their chances from there, having obtained their information directly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I express a personal viewpoint when I say that I find myself very much in agreement with Senator Roblin on this point. I think it is a matter of concern to a number of people in Parliament and in the legislatures.

The lock-up system can now result in television commentary on certain messages which are being brought to the population by federal or provincial cabinet ministers. In that commentary, such messages are interpreted and analysed before they have actually been delivered. An example of this sort of thing occurred with the delivery of the recent budget. Before Mr. MacEachen was five minutes into his budget presentation, a complete analysis had already been given by a number of commentators on television. Indeed, opposition spokesmen were giving their contrary views before Mr. MacEachen had revealed all the contents of the budget.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Perrault: I wonder what might have happened had Mr. MacEachen, at the last moment, modified some budget proposal—

An Hon. Senator: He should have!

Senator Perrault: —and not presented certain aspects of the budget in his final presentation in the chamber. I think that other honourable senators will agree that Senator Roblin makes an excellent point. I am sure he does not wish to restrict the rights of either the representatives of the media or the members of Parliament when he makes that comment.

I will say that I rather prefer the old-fashioned method. Perhaps we have both been in politics too long.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I rise to say something which I am unfortunately not able to say every day of the week and that is that I agree with the Leader of the Government—

Senator Flynn: On a personal basis.

Senator Smith: —on a personal basis. Like him, I am expressing only a personal point of view. I am in total agreement with him. In respect of the last budget, as has been the case with other budgets, I was instructed as to what I should think about it by a group of commentators before I had a chance to know its contents.

Senator Perrault: That's right.

Senator Smith: I do not think that is the way to run a country. Even though, in this case, I happen to agree with what the commentators said, I do not think I should get my opinions from such a source. My opinions should be based on the document, and on listening to the minister who delivered it.

Therefore—and I emphasize that it is on a purely personal basis—I am glad to agree with the Leader of the Government.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I note from a report in the press that our vote yesterday on the resolution would give Ottawa the go-ahead to begin a $1 million advertising campaign in the newspapers, particularly in Quebec, extolling the virtues of the proposed new Charter of Rights. I wonder if the Leader of the Government can confirm whether this is the effect of the vote that we took yesterday.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no information on this point. The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. If the vote did give such a go-ahead, would the leader inquire as to why this campaign started last Sunday in the Quebec papers? I read full pages in the Sunday papers about this.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that inquiry will also be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: Finally, if this campaign is needed, would the Leader of the Government tell me why he said yesterday that the Charter of Rights was acclaimed everywhere in Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in yesterday's debate I made reference to the fact that in all the Canadian provinces there has been what can only be described as overwhelming support for a Charter of Rights.

● (1450)

Senator Flynn: That is what you said, yes.

Senator Perrault: However, there is a vigorous campaign by the Parti Quebecois in the province of Quebec to describe the constitutional proposals as not serving the best interests of Quebec. In the spirit of freedom of information, the Government of Canada is considering ways in which the facts can be made available to the people of that great province.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Don't tell me those facts will not be partisan.

Senator Flynn: As I understood the Leader of the Government yesterday, that Charter is welcome everywhere. There may be some reaction in Quebec about the amending formula or other parts of the resolution, but, from what I read in this document, the campaign is on the virtues of the proposed new Charter of Rights. If the Leader of the Government was right yesterday, we should not spend that money for this purpose, since everyone seems to agree, according to him, with the proposed new Charter of Rights.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we are all interested in the opinions offered by Senator Flynn. Personally, I hope at some point in time the Government of Canada will make available to every home in Canada the Charter of Rights which now protects their freedom and liberty in this country. I hope that every person in Canada will have in his home the basic rights which he enjoys under this new Constitution, including his linguistic rights and his cultural rights, which are fully protected so far as Quebec and the other provinces are concerned.

Senator Flynn: You say they are now protected. I suppose you suggest that Westminster will be another rubber stamp, as was the Senate yesterday.

AUDITOR GENERAL

REPORT TO HOUSE OF COMMONS—ALLEGED IMPROPER PAYMENT TO CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like, if I may, to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I noted his comment about other questions being speculative. Here I have something which seems pretty solid. It is entitled: "Report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons." I do not know why it was directed to the House of Commons and to no one else. It is the report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

It would be pretty hard to describe this as speculative, I think, when we find at page 448 that it says:

In 1980, the CTC—

I take it that that means the Canadian Transport Commission.

—recognized that CN—

I take it that that means the Canadian National Railways.

—was being reimbursed twice for losses incurred: first when the deficits that included these losses were reimbursed by the Department of Transport under annual appropriation acts; second when payments were made by the CTC under the Railway Act in 1978, 1979 and 1980. The CTC estimates that these double payments amounted to $53 million.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Just what they need.

Senator Smith: There is a lot more which follows. I will not weary the house by trying to read it all now. Perhaps I will entertain the house with more excerpts a little later. I ask the Leader of the Government what efforts are being made by the government to recoup that sum of $53 million which was an improper payment to Canadian National Railways, according to the Auditor General.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Smith asks a good question.

Senator Smith: My questions are always good.

Senator Perrault: May I say that this paragraph has been noted carefully by the government. Indeed, I have in my hand a copy of the paragraph read to us by Senator Smith.

I suppose, first of all, it can be said that the government has provided very substantial resources to the Auditor General and his staff in order to protect the public interest in this fashion, by bringing forward these facts. Secondly, the government will investigate the situation immediately, and I will take the question as notice and bring further information to the Senate on this point.

The reason the Auditor General is in his place with the resources available to him is just to find those areas that need the attention of the government.

Senator Smith: With all respect to the honourable senator's description of the source of those funds, I ask him if it is not a fact that those funds are provided by the House of Commons of Canada and, to the extent that this house concurs in them, by this house—that is, the Parliament of Canada. They come out of the taxpayers' money and the government has no choice about it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, so far as the office of the Auditor General is concerned, there has to be an intention on the part of the government, in the first place, to provide the Auditor General with the staff and resources to do his work. That is a decision made by the government to support him and do what they can to help him. He has produced a report which is of great importance to the government, and certainly to members of this house and of the other chamber.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his answer, and I suppose, in view of the fact that I have made no particular search as to the accuracy of his assertion with reference to the source of the funds and the people who are required to make decisions about them, I shall have to accept his answer in that respect for the time being. However, if some research does reveal some other matter for further discussion, I will likely ask the honourable gentleman to engage in that discussion with this house.

Perhaps I could turn now to another paragraph on the next page. Under the heading "Income Tax Benefits" on page 449 you will find the following:

CN's financial statements indicate that the Corporation has claimed a reduction in income taxes otherwise due for 1978, 1979 and 1980 as a result of reducing taxable income for those years by applying losses from prior years. Part or all of these losses relate to periods prior to 1 January 1978 when the Company's deficits were fully reimbursed by the Department of Transport under annual appropriation acts. It appears that CN's ability to reduce its taxable income in this manner has provided a financial benefit to the Company which was not fully analysed and disclosed to the appropriate Ministers at the time of drafting amendments to the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act.

[Senator Perrault.]

That leads me to my next question. Can the honourable gentleman inform us of what action the government is taking, if any, to recover what seems to be a perfectly and completely improper financial benefit to Canadian National Railways?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, certainly action must be taken to correct any action on the part of CN which may not be in the public interest. That is obvious. The question will be taken as notice.

I hope, however, that in his reading of the Auditor General's report Senator Smith will stumble across the paragraph which states that there has been a substantial improvement in the operation of the government and its departments—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We are all for that.

Senator Perrault: —and the commendation—

Senator Flynn: Thank God!

Senator Perrault: —and the commendation extended to the government for very much improved performance. I do hope Senator Smith's generosity of spirit will prompt him to quote those sections to us.

Senator Flynn: You should not be satisfied with that.

Senator Smith: I am sure I would be delighted to quote any commendation of the government that could be found in this damning report.

Senator Frith: We will find it for you and read it to you.

Senator Flynn: On this side we would say it is a "damned" report.

Senator Smith: I said "damning" but the other word would be equally appropriate.

However, it seems to me that that performance which has been so dismal in the past had nowhere to go but up. If the Auditor General did find a slight upward trend, he must have been hard put to discover it.

• (1500)

In any event, I have one more supplementary question. Obviously these items, the $53 million specified and the other financial benefits which, insofar as I have noted in my preliminary reading, have not been quantified, could supply a very substantial portion of the $100 million per year which the Minister of Transport hopes to save by cutting out 20 per cent of the passenger railway services of Canada.

Senator Frith: It is more than $100 million, is it not?

Senator Smith: I have not heard that it was more than $100 million. As a matter of fact, I heard that it was much less than $100 million until some time in the future; that it is really down to around $40 million.

Senator Frith: We will hear your report on that matter.

Senator Smith: That is, if you listen.

Senator Frith: I am listening.

Senator Smith: If, as indicated by the Auditor General, the government can recover $50 million a year, and goodness knows how much more, in that instance, why would it not be an appropriate source of saving a portion of the $100 million which the government will not save, either this year or next year, by cutting out 20 per cent of the railway passenger services of Canada?

Senator Perrault: Let Senator Smith remember, as he peruses the pages of the Auditor General's report with the zeal of a bloodhound, that the Scriptures tell us, "He who is without sin should cast the first stone"; that during the seven months of the last Conservative government in this country there were a number of matters in which the Auditor General would have had a great deal of interest.

Senator Flynn: All the Liberal-appointed bureaucrats were still in place.

Senator Perrault: This happens to all governments. No government is perfect.

Senator Smith: If the honourable gentleman dignifies my rather cursory examination of this report, which seems to embarrass him greatly, by calling it "persuing something with the nose of a bloodhound," I think that before he is through dealing with us on this report, he will be thinking of somebody persuing him with a very heavy foot applied to the appropriate portion of his anatomy.

Senator Frith: Block those metaphors.

Senator Flynn: Would the Leader of the Government tell us what he understood that to mean?

Senator Frith: A fine mixture of metaphors.

AVAILABILITY OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, but before I ask it there is something I would like to say. We have been accused in the past by the Minister of State for Economic Development of being bearers of gloom and doom. After having read the Auditor General's report, I feel that I must congratulate the government for having no horses on the payroll this year.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That is an improvement.

Hon. C. William Doody: How can you say that and still look across the floor?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It takes one to know one.

Senator Charbonneau: With the expenditures of this government going up by 22 or 23 per cent, who knows what it will do next?

Would the Leader of the Government explain why the government has a policy of keeping documents secret from its own Auditor General, to the extent that in his report released yesterday the Auditor General himself was provoked to say:

Curiously, in the public sector there are nice intellectual arguments supported by political science theory as to what documents and information should and should not be available to the Auditor General.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all I can say is that the report of the Auditor General is being read with avid interest by members of the government and by others in Parliament. It is too early to make any definitive judgment as to its content. The Auditor General has made a number of observations. One relates to the number of printing machines available to government departments, and the paper burden issue. There are a number of other issues, many of which will undoubtedly emerge in the next few days.

I want to give the assurance, however, that this government takes this report very seriously, and where improvements can be made, they will be made.

Senator Charbonneau: Honourable senators, it is very hard to understand, if a comprehensive and accurate audit is to be done, how anything can be kept from the Auditor General.

Senator Perrault: The fact that the Auditor General thinks there is a substantial improvement on the government's performance is heartening and encouraging, and it may inspire—

Senator Charbonneau: Answer the question.

Senator Perrault: I shall take the question as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Charbonneau: That is better.

THE SENATE

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Jack Marshall: On Sunday, during the television program Question Period, the Minister of Justice was asked a question regarding what would be involved in phase 2 of constitutional reform. The minister indicated that phase 2 would deal with parliamentary reform, and that reform of the Senate was one of the most important parts of this phase. Would the Leader of the Government make a statement in the chamber in the near future as to what form phase 2 will take, what it will entail and how the government will go about making this change?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I did not see the television program to which Senator Marshall has referred, but I shall ask the minister for a transcript of his remarks. Certainly, he has not suggested to me, either personally or at meetings which I have attended, that the Senate is a number one priority in the so-called second phase.

As to the contents of the second phase, it is certainly not for the Government of Canada to be the sole judge of what items will be considered during that phase. The provinces will be very much involved, and I hope all of the provinces, including the province of Quebec. At that time, the views of the federal government will be put on the table.

ENERGY

NORTH-EAST BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL PROJECT—AWARD OF CONTRACTS

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin concerning the north-east coal development in British Columbia. Some time ago the Government of British Columbia, as I understand it, put out tenders for the tunnelling and construction of the Anzac rail line that would connect those coal facilities to the port of Prince Rupert or, at least, to the CNR. The provincial government did not award those contracts until it was quite certain that the companies would go into production. Now that the last obstacle to that great project's going ahead has been settled by the operators of the coal port at Ridley Island, and the coal companies' agreeing on the throughput charges there, as announced by Senator Olson very recently, does the minister have any knowledge at this time as to whether or not the Province of British Columbia has proceeded to let those contracts it has already settled upon?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I thank Senator van Roggen for his question. As it happens, I was speaking to the provincial minister, the Honourable Don Phillips, this morning, who advised me that yesterday he gave the tenderers his permission to proceed under the tender contracts called and, to put it in the colloquial way, that all systems are go. I am happy to advise Senator van Roggen and the Senate that the Government of British Columbia has, indeed, taken the steps required to build the necessary additional railway facilities and that the north-east British Columbia coal project is well under way.

TRANSPORT

CN MARINE—ELIMINATION OF POSITIONS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Minister of State for Economic Development. I doubt if either senator carries the information around in his mind, but would one of them find out whether or not it is correct that CN Marine is contemplating eliminating 135 positions among the stevedoring staff at the docks at North Sydney from which goods are transported to that great province of Newfoundland, and bring back the information as soon as possible? Also, as was indicated by Senator Smith, is it the intention of Canadian National to continue cutting back on all its services and in areas such as stevedoring? Does the government intend to eliminate CN Marine or CN entirely, thereby putting many employees out of work? Considering the high unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island at the present time, we cannot afford a cutback of 135 positions among the stevedoring force at the port of North Sydney. At one time, during summer periods, as many as 1,000 workers were employed, then that figure went down to 500, and now the work force consists of no more than 250 persons.

• (1510)

Would the honourable minister kindly ascertain what plans are contemplated by CN Marine, and furnish us with a report?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and refer it to the Minister of Transport for a reply as soon as possible.

My honourable friend will realize, of course, that some changes are probably necessary because of the passenger load and tonnage involved. I know this is the subject of ongoing discussions with the Minister of Transport. I will ask him where the situation stands today.

Senator Muir: Just to clarify the situation, my question does not relate to the passenger service at all, but relates completely to freight going from the port of North Sydney to Newfoundland.

If the government would stop subsidizing private corporations which transport goods directly from Montreal to Newfoundland and from Halifax to Newfoundland, and encourage the use of the port of North Sydney, which was the situation at the time of Confederation, we would not have this unemployment situation in North Sydney.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the question may not relate to the passenger service, but the CN ferry service, which carries freight for the most part, does have accommodation for passengers.

I will take the question as notice and ask for a report as soon as possible. However, I would ask my honourable friend to realize that I may not be able to answer within a day or two.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We can wait; we are used to it.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In response to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition concerning the proposed advertising scheme, the Leader of the Government mentioned that this was being done in a spirit of freedom of information—a hallmark of this government. However, today it was reported by the press that the freedom of information bill is now unlikely to be passed before the spring, if at all.

Earlier in this session, as reported at page 550 of Debates of the Senate, the leader told us:

Certainly, this government has established access to information and freedom of information as top priorities for this Parliament.

Why has freedom of information now, apparently, gone the way of that other cornerstone of the Throne Speech, the stronger FIRA legislation?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when the freedom of information bill finally emerges, either sooner or later, it will be an excellent piece of legislative craftsmanship—and excellence takes longer, at times.

THE SENATE

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): While I have the spirit of freedom of information, may I share this information with honourable senators? Even though there is no legal obligation for the Auditor General to table his report in the Senate, the report is always tabled in this chamber on the day following its tabling in the other house. I refer to the Auditor General Act, Statutes of Canada 1976-77, section 7, which states:

(1) The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons

(a) on the work of his office; and

(b) on whether, in carrying on the work of his office, he received all the information and explanations he required.

Subsection 7(3) states:

Each annual report by the Auditor General to the House of Commons shall be submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons on or before the 31st day of December in the year to which the report relates and the Speaker of the House of Commons shall lay each such report before the House of Commons forthwith after receipt thereof by him or, if that House is not then sitting, on the first day next thereafter that the House of Commons is sitting.

Section 8 states:

(1) The Auditor General may make a special report to the House of Commons on any matter of pressing importance or urgency that, in his opinion, should not be deferred until the presentation of his annual report.

That answers, at least in part, some of the inquiries made by honourable senators on this point.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, supplementary to my earlier question to the Leader of the Government, briefly, is the freedom of information bill still a priority? If so, will it be brought before this Parliament; and, if so, when?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

THE SENATE

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do I understand from what the Leader of the Government has just quoted that the report of the Auditor General is of no concern to the Senate and should be dealt with only by the House of Commons? Is there a legal obligation to table the report in the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There is no legal obligation to table the report in the Senate. It may be that a case can be established to amend the act and impose the same requirement to have it tabled in the Senate, although the practice has been that it has been tabled in the fashion in which it has been done this year.

Hon. Jack Marshall: As a supplementary, I cannot understand why, after so many years, many of the very important documents that are tabled here are not referred to a committee. They are not tabled in the Senate until days after they have been tabled in the House of Commons. If there is any reform of Parliament, I believe consideration should be given to this matter. I could make a 10-minute speech on the weaknesses of the information which comes to honourable senators. In any parliamentary reform, consideration should be given to putting the Senate on an equal basis with the House of Commons.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Let us have an inquiry on it.

Senator Marshall: An inquiry would be the answer.

Senator Perrault: The situation has been very much improved in recent years, but perhaps further improvements could be made.

Hon. C. William Doody: Am I to understand from the Honourable Leader of the Government's answer that the Auditor General is a servant of the House of Commons and not a servant of Parliament? Would that be correct?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Auditor General certainly is a servant of Parliament. There is a statutory obligation upon him to report to the House of Commons, but I think that honourable senators would regard the Auditor General as a servant of Parliament, and that is the reason the report is also tabled in this house. It is important for honourable senators to know the views of the Auditor General.

So far as the tabling of documents is concerned, certainly, when Senator Flynn was Leader of the Government—

Senator Flynn: How can you remember? It was so short a time.

Senator Perrault: —he did his best to table documents as early as possible, and I have done likewise. Although we disagree on a number of matters, both of us have certainly exerted every effort to improve the situation so far as communication is concerned.

Senator Flynn: It is totally unfair to link me with you.

Hon. Robert Muir: As a supplementary to the question to the Leader of the Government, since he is an old House of Commons man—and I do not mean in years physically—and realizes that Parliament is comprised of the House of Commons and the Senate, I was surprised to hear him say that the Auditor General is only required to report to the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: Under the law.

Senator Muir: Therefore, I would suggest that, with his vast knowledge and background of parliamentary affairs and procedure, and with his great weight in cabinet, he should take immediate steps to remedy that situation. Surely, this chamber is second to none. We should at least be on the same footing as the House of Commons, and I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate would agree with me, as would his colleague, the Honourable Minister of State for Economic Development, who has also served with distinction in the House of Commons.

Senator Flynn: You should also add the weight of Senator Argue.

Senator Perrault: I agree with Senator Muir who, at one time, was one of the most effective members of the other house that we had had in some years. I think he makes an excellent point.

Honourable senators, quite frankly, I will review committee records to determine how this measure got on the statute books without some objection being raised by members of the Senate committee which reviewed the bill before it became law. There may be some reasons that are unknown at this time.

• (1520)

To express a personal view, I am in absolute accord with Senator Muir that the Senate should also be included in this statute, and if there is a reason why the Senate has not been included in it, I should like to know it, and, therefore, shall initiate immediate inquiries to determine the progress of this legislation through Parliament in 1976-77.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

EFFECTIVENESS AND QUALITY OF FOOD INSPECTION SYSTEM

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It was reported recently in the media that officers from the United States Department of Agriculture inspected the Canada Packers plant located in Toronto, and that as a result of their findings Canada Packers discontinued its exports to the United States, at least temporarily.

My question is: Is the government aware of this? If it is, is the government examining the effectiveness and quality of our inspection system for food establishments; and if it is not, will the government consider doing so?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice, unless our distinguished and expert colleague, the Honourable Senator Argue, has a reply.

[Senator Flynn.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He has limited expertise. Don't push him too much!

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (D) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, you have before you as an appendix to yesterday's proceedings supplementary estimates (D) in the amount of $94 million. It concerns the write-off or the payment of a debt in that amount on behalf of Consolidated Computer Inc., a computer software and hardware development firm that specialized in data entry systems and operated in the United States, Canada and, I think, elsewhere in the world. It also made sales in the United Kingdom. It had two leasing affiliates, one called Financeco and the other called Finecomp.

Up until 1980 the company made small profits of just under half a million dollars per year, and sometimes it operated at about the break-even point.

For some reason, around 1979-80, it set up an extensive world-wide sales organization and its sales fell drastically. It ended up losing $12 million in 1980. From 1971 it was supported by a program instituted under the Enterprise Development Board. That program guaranteed loans and made advances to organizations that could not obtain loans elsewhere on reasonable terms.

The federal government and the Ontario government own sixty-five per cent of Consolidated Computer Inc., and the remainder is owned by a firm called Fujitsu Limited of Japan. At the present time, the guarantees outstanding are in the amount of $47.4 million on the part of Consolidated Computer, and $43.6 million, which relates to the advances to the leasing companies, for a total of $91 million. The total cost to the government of this venture has been $119 million. That includes the $91 million that we are writing off now; the $3 million to bridge the operations of the companies from now until January, when the sale closes; $16 million in previous supplementary estimates that has already been written off; and $9 million advanced under certain research and development programs offered by the federal government. So, the total is $119 million.

The proposal is to sell Consolidated Computer Inc. to a company by the name of Nabu, which is owned by persons and firms that are already in the computer business. That company was formed on July 1, 1981. The sale price of CCI to Nabu is $100,000, with an opportunity to get percentages of the gross lease payments that start out rather low and go up year after year. It is estimated that in five years those payments to the government could amount to $7 million.

What the federal government is going to do, though, is pay off the loans that were advanced by the banks and guaranteed by the federal government in the amount of $91 million, and advance another $3 million for the bridging.

At the meeting of the committee, we were interested in looking at the loan guarantees that were offered by the Enterprise Development Board under the Enterprise Development Program. This program was inaugurated in 1977 and is a continuation of the old General Adjustment and Assistance Program. That program makes contributions and also guarantees loans that would not be made under normal commercial terms. It is interesting to note that the loan guarantees made to date—that is, from 1977, when the board was put into operation—are $451 million. The amount of money lost, including the CCI deal, is $118 million, which gives a twenty-five per cent loss factor on the guarantees.

CCI was loaned $44.9 million on EDB guarantees, but the interesting part of that is—and I am talking just of CCI and not leasing affiliates—that $24.6 million of the $44.9 million was advanced after 1980 when the firm suffered the loss of $12 million. In other words, it would appear that it was part of a bail-out operation by the Enterprise Development Board.

One wonders about the Enterprise Development Program and how well these guarantees are monitored. Why do we make a 100 per cent guarantee? Why not a partial guarantee, with the financial institutions taking part of the risk? We were told that the rates on the loans were floating rates, which would indicate that they were tied to prime, yet the financial institutions that advanced the moneys were given a full 100 per cent government guarantee. Now, you would think that that would give Consolidated Computers Inc. a rate that would be, first of all, fixed, and more related to the rate that would be found on government bonds.

One wonders whether we are not doing the same thing elsewhere. There were several extremely large advances made on behalf of Telidon. It would be interesting to know whether we are getting into the same kind of trouble in respect of Telidon as we did with CCI. It is true that right now Telidon is a highly regarded company and the publicity surrounding it is good, but there was a time, three or four years ago, when CCI was highly regarded, yet our total costs will be in the neighbourhood of $116 million.

One wonders, too, how the guarantees are accounted for. So far as we can tell, the chartered accountants who approved the guarantee documents were also the chartered accountants who audited CCI. An inquiry has been launched by the government. This inquiry is chaired by Lieutenant-General W. A. B. Anderson, former Secretary of the Board of Management of Ontario. He has recently been involved in the implementation of the Lambert Commission report.

Before I sit down, I should like to briefly deal with the sale of CCI and its leasing affiliates to Nabu. As I understand it, the government has required Nabu to make certain undertakings. They are: that it operate CCI for two years; that it provide the necessary working capital; that it preserve the jobs of the people who are presently employed by CCI; and that it not take advantage of the obvious tax loss that would exist in CCI. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated that the benefits to the government were the preservation of the productive capacity and the products of CCI, although I understand they are not very current products from the point of view of the market. Also, the benefit is, of course, that the government has no close-down costs. If it phased out the business, it would face termination costs and other costs that would be fairly extensive.

Those are the benefits to the government, but we should perhaps look at the benefits to Nabu. Once the government pays off all those debts, it will turn CCI over to Nabu with a net worth of $9 million, and this for $100,000. It is true that they calculate that the inventory is over-valued, so the net worth may be reduced by the amount of the over-valuation. But they also turn over the gross lease payments on previous sales which, over the next five years, we are told, will aggregate $28 million. An amount of $7 million of that will be paid to the government, which will leave $21 million, less servicing costs for Nabu to receive.

So it would indicate that for $100,000, Nabu, which is owned by people and firms in the computer business, will receive a company having a net worth of $9 million, less inventory over-valuation, and no debt, plus two leasing companies with $28 million of accounts receivable, and no debt, for which they will pay the government only $7 million if they receive the $28 million. Therefore, Nabu will receive $21 million, out of which they will have to pay the servicing costs. I do not know how high they will be, since those companies are already in the computer business.

In addition, they will take over the employees, but I understand that the employees that are working for CCI are in demand by the very companies that own Nabu. So it is a very interesting situation. It is obviously one that has been an unhappy investment for the government, but I would hope that when Lieutenant General Anderson examines the past history of the transaction he will also have a good look at the terms of the sale to see whether, in getting out, we made the best deal.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this subject, which is a matter of some interest. I appreciate the details given by Senator Everett in reporting on it to the Senate. Because of its size and significance, it is perhaps an example of the sort of practices which the government, inadvertently and with the best of intentions, got itself involved in. The $94 million supplementary supply estimate, that is now in the process of being passed, is going to the banks to pay off a loan which, as Senator Everett has said, has already been guaranteed by the government—a loan on which they charged prime interest plus; and certainly they will not suffer in any way.

Perhaps the major aspect of this matter is the company itself and the weird and wonderful circumstances in which it has managed to evolve into the $125 million mess which the government finds itself with. The company became insolvent in 1971, and that was the first time the government became involved. It bailed it out, gave it some money and got it started again. It again went into receivership in 1976. The government gave it more money and again bailed it out. Nevertheless, the one recurring theme, right down through the whole operation, was that management never did improve. The inventory control systems were never really put in place. A gentleman named Brown, who the government put in approximately 16 or 18 months ago, reported that management was slack, that the control systems were non-existent, and that the books were in a mess. These are taxpayers' dollars, and we have to wonder how many more companies there are like this. I compliment the department and the committee on bringing forward the facts in the brief time available.

If we say the amounts quickly—the $94 million, the $125 million and the $115 million—they do not sound very impressive, but they represent a lot of money, and if it were a private business there would be a good deal of concern about it. I know that a $94 million government guaranteed bankruptcy in a province is cause for great concern throughout the country; but a $94 million commitment of the Canadian government does not seem to arouse that much interest. I guess it is a matter of how many zeros there are in proportion to the expenditure for a particular level of government. I consider it is a matter that should be looked into.

Senator Everett mentioned Telidon, another high technology corporation that the company has been involved with, although that is a somewhat different matter. The government has been in the process of giving that particular company a number of grants to develop technology. There was something close to a $9 million grant for that company in supplementary estimates (C) which we passed a few weeks ago. We do not really know how many other grants have been given to Telidon; nor do we have any idea of what kind of supervision or monitoring there is in this particular company. I sometimes wonder if it is just a coincidence that so many new high technology computer chip companies have grown up around Ottawa. They all seem to be in this particular area. Perhaps they have found a good thing.

In any event, I would suggest that the committee, through Senator Everett, should take a look at this sort of thing, and see how much of the finances of the people of Canada are being committed to this sort of thing, and how much monitoring and control there is over it.

An Hon. Senator: A good point.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Everett speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Doody for his remarks, which expanded mine so well. I believe it is an interesting subject for the committee to consider. We are preparing the final report on a lengthy examination of regional disparities, which has involved approximately 41 hearings over a long period, and we are looking for something new to examine. We would not want to duplicate the work of Lieutenant General Anderson in this matter, but, then, we might look into the general area of how the Enterprise Development Board and the program operates and, as Senator Doody said, how it affects organizations such as Telidon.

One of the things that keeps coming home to me is the fascination we have with high technology development. The government is so anxious to get into this. This is a new field; this is where all the action and interest is. The one thing about high technology is that the profits for those who succeed are extremely high. However, we could probably say that perhaps one in every ten succeeds, and the other nine go under or disappear. It is a dangerous area and the government is committing a lot of money to it, and perhaps, as a committee, we should give consideration to an examination of the Enterprise Development Board and the general contribution that the government is making and will be making to the high technology business over the next few years.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Everett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riley, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have asked on a couple of former occasions that this stand because of the interest of another senator. I am grateful for the indulgence of the Senate on those former occasions. I am not at all sure that that senator wishes to pursue the matter any further, and, accordingly, I do not renew my request. I notice that the senator in question is not in the chamber at the moment, so I suppose it is a question of whether the Leader of the Government or his deputy wishes to let it stand just on the basis of my explanation, but I will not ask for the indulgence again.

● (1540)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Shall it stand until tomorrow, then?

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: I think the matter should be concluded in the near future because we will be receiving the appropriation bill.

Senator Frith: Yes, we expect to get the appropriation bill some day next week. Perhaps this order should stand until tomorrow, and Senator Everett and Senator Smith can consult each other.

Senator Smith: I shall be glad to give the name of the senator to the deputy leader or Senator Everett, and they can perhaps have direct contact with that senator and decide what should be done.

Order stands.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER
OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE
COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that there is an order in the other place for a vote on Bill C-48 today, and that it is a reasonably safe bet that it will pass, I wonder if—

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): My, we are eloquent today!

Senator Frith: There is a time and a place for everything!
[English]

I suggest that since we will be getting Bill C-48, which is a major part of the National Energy Program, and which, in turn, is the subject of Order No. 7, we might consider this inquiry as debated. However, I do not want that done when Senator Murray is not in the chamber, because this is his motion. This will give him a chance to think about it, and perhaps we can continue that request tomorrow. In the meantime, perhaps we should let the order stand.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADA OIL AND GAS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., with leave of the Senate, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, technically speaking, if the next sitting were tomorrow, leave would be necessary, but I understand that second reading of this bill will take place next Tuesday. Normally, the motion is that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next. I am merely correcting the Deputy Leader of the Government while I have the opportunity to do so.

● (1405)

Senator Frith: By agreeing to "next sitting", in line with the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition, I am obviously going to have to make it Monday or Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report concerning the enquiry under the Canada Business Corporations Act into certain aspects of the purchase of Petrofina Canada Inc. by Petro-Canada, issued by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 15, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps this would be the right time for the deputy leader to tell us what is in store for us next week, what the plans are for any legislation that may be coming to us—we now have Bill C-48—and especially what the plans are for the so-called Christmas adjournment. What business will the Senate have to deal with before that adjournment?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Opposition has just pointed out, we have now given first reading to Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Bill. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been pre-studying this bill, in anticipation, and thereby getting through some of the work that may arise out of a referral to that committee between second and third reading. This advance work done by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee means there is a good chance of that committee's reporting the bill back to the Senate by Thursday or Friday. It is our plan to sit on Thursday and Friday in the hope of concluding the debate for a vote on the bill on Friday. That is the plan we are working towards with the co-operation of the committee chairman, the members of the committee, the sponsor of the bill, me and the Leader of the Opposition.

There are three other bills, honourable senators, that we will likely receive. The first is an appropriation bill. The second is Bill C-46, the Meat Import Bill, which I believe is of an essentially technical nature, but I will have more to say about that on Tuesday. The third is Bill C-84, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. We may also receive a fourth, Bill C-78, the Labour Adjustment Benefit Bill.

So, honourable senators, we will meet on Tuesday evening as usual. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet Monday, if necessary, or Tuesday, to complete the work that will enable us to take advantage of their advance study if the bill receives second reading on Tuesday evening. By that time we may have received the appropriation bill, Bill C-46, Bill C-84 and perhaps Bill C-78. If those bills turn out to be mostly non-contentious, we hope to pass them and plan for royal assent by the end of the week. If so, we plan to adjourn for the Christmas recess until the last week in January. I will, however, have definite news about the adjournment on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week.

In summary, honourable senators, we hope to adopt and give royal assent to the first four bills I mentioned by the end of next week, after which we will adjourn for Christmas, returning some time around the end of January.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I understand that of the five bills mentioned, it is essential that we deal with two—Bill C-48 and the appropriation bill. If the other three are not contentious, then perhaps we could also deal with them before adjourning. I suppose the plan is that the House of Commons will also adjourn on December 18?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is correct.
Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINE

PROCEEDINGS IN UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is opposition day today.

Senator Buckwold: I am sorry, but nobody on that side stood. You fellows over there are losing your touch.

Senator Flynn: No, we were just afraid that you were losing yours, so we are giving you a chance.

Senator Buckwold: My question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday the minister was kind enough to draw to the attention of this chamber the good news of the action taken in the American House of Representatives on the Alaska Highway gas pipeline. Since then, I have heard some disquieting news concerning a further vote. I wonder if that matter might be clarified by the minister?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Why don't you ask Senator Lawson?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the vote that was taken before was recorded, after which a technicality arose. It is my understanding that the title of the resolution in the Senate was different from the title of that in the House of Representatives, and that the resolutions had different numbers. It was thus raised as a procedural matter later in the day that the two resolutions should be identical or concurrent.

● (1415)

Either the procedure committee or the rules committee—I am not sure which—in the House of Representatives met late yesterday and decided to put a motion before the House of Representatives that would change the title of the resolution so that it would be the same as the resolution passed by the Senate.

It is my information that the resolution amending the title was passed by a voice vote and that the substance of the entire resolution remained exactly the same as the resolution on which they voted yesterday. It is also my information, very unofficially at this point in time, that that vote was completed just a few minutes ago, and that the resolution was passed by a vote of 229 to 188.

Senator Flynn: Would this latter vote be the final one in the U.S. Congress, or does the matter have to go before the Senate?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is asking me another procedural question as between the two houses of Congress which I am not qualified to answer. I can say, though, that the resolution was first passed in the United States Senate by a vote of 75 to 19. Someone has made the point, I believe, that once the Senate passes a resolution, they send it to the House of Representatives for their concurrence. Or perhaps they follow a similar procedure as in our Parliament in that the matter begins in both houses simultaneously. In any event, I understand that someone has raised the technicality that once the House of Representatives has voted positively on the resolution, it then comes back to the Senate for final ratification.

If that action is required—and I emphasize “if”—to my knowledge it has not taken place.

Senator Flynn: If the minister is wondering why we were not as joyous yesterday over this announcement as he, it was because we were keeping our fingers crossed until the decision was final.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Have faith.

Senator Olson: I would like to advise my honourable friend that when the resolution was first passed by the Senate, it was by a majority of 75 to 19. I expect that when the House of Representatives passes what is now exactly the same resolution, the Senate will ratify it very rapidly.

Senator Flynn: I do not doubt that, but the Senate of the United States is not exactly the same as the Senate of Canada.

THE BUDGET

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On November 25 I asked the minister whether he could obtain for this chamber a list of the plants that closed down or had cause to lay off employees. At the time, he expressed some doubt as to the existence of such a list. May I draw to the minister's attention an article which appears in today's Ottawa Citizen which indicates that the Canadian Manufacturers Association has determined that more than 140,000 workers have lost their jobs. In this article, it is also indicated that the Ontario Labour Ministry says that 67 plants in the province, 34 of them in the Toronto area, have shut down, and that another 89 plants have curtailed operations.

If the minister is unable to obtain any information from federal sources, would he contact the Ontario Ministry of Labour for such information, and give a further report to this chamber?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I could do that for the honourable senator, but, quite seriously, I fail to see the need for me and my department to go through that exercise if he already has the information in front of him.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I was hoping that the information could be provided with regard to other provinces. I only referred to Ontario, and I am sure that both Senator Austin and Senator Perrault would be very interested in the plants that have closed in British Columbia, just as I am interested in the plants that have closed in Atlantic Canada. The Ontario Ministry of Labour will not have that information.

Senator Olson: I understand better now what the honourable senator is asking, and I would advise him that what I said the other day still stands.

Senator Phillips: In other words, you are not going to get it?

● (1420)

INCOME TAX ACT—CLOSING OF LOOPHOLES

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I notice, at the bottom of the first page of today's issue of the Globe and Mail, an article dealing with the budget. The commentary seems to imply that Revenue Canada intends to start collecting taxes on employee "perks" such as meals, free parking and travel passes. Would the Leader of the Government confirm, or otherwise, that this reflects government policy at this time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Since the presentation of the budget, honourable senators, a number of speculative stories have appeared in newspapers and reports have been broadcast on radio and television in various areas of the country to the effect that there will be a Draconian clampdown on all employee benefits, whatever those benefits may be.

I can report to honourable senators that this situation will be clarified shortly. Many of the reports appear to be quite incorrect. For example, the reports that all employee parking benefits are to be taxed, and that all company cafeteria meals will be subject to some type of taxation with rigid enforcement, are, I understand, both overstated.

[Senator Phillips.]

I feel sure that very shortly the Minister of National Revenue will specify those areas where it is intended that benefits be subjected to taxation.

The thrust of the budget is to make certain that those people who enjoy inordinate advantages, at the expense of their fellow citizens, pay their fair share of taxes in this country. The purpose of the budget is not to harass citizens who, perhaps, have some reasonable benefit associated with their employment. Indeed, the task of putting into place an absolutely comprehensive tax-collection mechanism would, in some cases, be counter productive. It is not true that a Draconian tax collection system is in preparation, as has been reported and alleged in certain publications.

The question is under active consideration by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue, and statements will be made in due time.

The article referred to by Senator Lewis has been read by a number of honourable senators. Indeed, a number of them have mentioned the article to me. I have taken up its contents with the Minister of National Revenue and have discussed it with the Minister of Finance. The article which appeared on the front page of the Globe and Mail this morning is quite misleading, and clarification will be made in due time.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO HOMEOWNERS—DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A number of concerns have been expressed in the province of Newfoundland having to do with the assistance the government is going to give to those who are suffering as a result of insulating their homes with urea formaldehyde foam.

It would appear that the government's campaign concerning this matter is not being broadcast to some parts of the country. Since this is a very serious matter, would the Leader of the Government ascertain that those responsible for broadcasting this information to isolated areas are fulfilling their obligation to those who should be informed as to what they should do to obtain redress?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the urea formaldehyde foam insulation problem, which is being experienced in many provinces, is under active consideration by the government and, hopefully, an announcement can be made shortly. Indeed, it will supplement earlier announcements made on the subject.

The fact is, honourable senators, that of all governments in the nations of the world the Canadian government has been the most forthcoming in the work it has done to this point to attempt to solve the problem. I understand that there are some countries where urea formaldehyde foam insulation is still in use and is still being installed. There are only two or three jurisdictions in which it has been actually withdrawn from the market.

There appears to be a problem for at least some Canadians who installed this substance in their homes in the mid-1970s. If one studies the literature on the subject, it is apparent that this is not merely a federal problem. The issue of ultimate responsibility does not solve the difficulties encountered by those who, in good faith, installed this material in their homes and who may be suffering from health problems as a result.

In any case, the government will meet its fair responsibility, if any, and further information will be forthcoming.

● (1425)

ENERGY

CONSERVATION PROGRAM—DELAY IN PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a further question which is related to the last one. It appears that there have been some delays in the processing of applications under the Energy Conservation Program instituted in the Atlantic provinces. When the Leader of the Government is looking into the urea formaldehyde foam insulation problem, could he also look into this seeming delay in the processing of applications under the Energy Conservation Program?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF RULE 49

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. In November 1979, on the initiative of Senator Bosa, the question of senators abstaining from voting was referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. As you may recall, that committee recommended that rule 49 be amended to read that senators did not have to have permission to abstain and that, in fact, they could make formal their abstention by standing and so indicating.

A debate took place upon that resolution, and the present Deputy Leader of the Government, although in opposition at that time, was against the report and carried the day. He was very persuasive and the matter was referred back to the committee. That is the last we heard of it.

During the voting here on Tuesday afternoon Senator Lang broke the rules twice. He should have asked for permission to abstain before the voting commenced, and he should not have explained afterwards.

Rule 50(2) reads as follows:

Without leave of the Senate a Senator shall not speak to a question after the order has been given to call in the members to vote thereon.

In the guise of explaining his abstention, he actually got up and said why he would vote for the next amendment and why he had not voted for the previous one.

Some senators took the option—to use the words of Senator Frith in a speech he made a couple of years ago—to sneak out of the chamber. I think I would have preferred their procedure in the circumstances.

There is no point in referring the matter back to that committee unless we know whether Senator Frith is willing to reconsider his position on it. Would you reconsider having the Standing Committee on Rules and Orders look into the question again, in light of what has happened since?

I might mention one more instance, when about thirty senators wanted to abstain. We stood up one after the other and indicated our reasons for abstaining.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the answer to the first part of the question is, yes; and the answer to the second part will have to await the said reconsideration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. All our rules and standing orders are permanently referred to that committee. It is up to Senator Godfrey to draw the matter to the attention of the chairman of that committee.

Senator Godfrey: There is no point in my drawing it to his attention, unless Senator Frith has softened his attitude somewhat in the past couple of years, particularly in view of what happened here the other day.

Senator Flynn: You are attaching too much importance to the influence of Senator Frith.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I think this is a question of privilege—Senator Godfrey is so keen on the rules today. I think it ought to be drawn to the attention of the Senate that we were breaching rules in other ways with regard to the voting. For instance, the doors were closed. If one did not wish to vote on a particular amendment, there was no way one could leave the chamber or return to it. One was trapped within the chamber when the various votes were taken.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators were locked in, so to speak.

● (1430)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES—MARITIME COMMAND—FLEET REQUIREMENTS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I hate to get away from this air of goodwill and to get into some gloomy economics but, among the many dreary things that one has been reading in the press during the last few months, one which has caused me a good deal of anguish is that because of attrition, and for other reasons, very bad things are happening to the proud Royal Canadian Navy. One reads that there are only two seaworthy destroyers left—or perhaps soon there will be only two.

In the light of that decline of the naval marine service, and the decline which took place long ago of the merchant marine, is the government—which must be worried about these things—giving any attention to a plan to re-establish Canada as a great naval power, which I believe is hard to do without ships?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator is aware of the substantial effort made by the government to improve the quality of materiel and equipment available to the armed forces. I have in mind, for example, purchases of the most modern tank in the world for our land forces; the purchase of a fighter aircraft—a contract award that was controversial at the time and roundly attacked by the opposition, but honourable senators are now aware that the other day the Royal Australian Air Force decided to purchase that particular model. This fighter aircraft has now come to be recognized as one of the great aircraft of modern times. There is also the government's effort to purchase additional vessels for the naval arm of the Canadian Forces.

The initiatives I have noted are all progressive steps taken by the government. I understand that there are some temporary problems with certain Canadian naval vessels in service. Necessary repairs are being made to those ships and, of course, new naval components are on the way.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether he is in possession of information to the effect that the destroyers can be repaired and put back into a seaworthy condition? I am not quarrelling with what he has said about the air arm and the military equipment in Europe. My colleagues and I in the other place nagged about that for years trying to get decent equipment for our fine young people in the armed forces. But I want the government leader's thoughts for a while to be at sea, because, after all, the naval service is the senior service.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He has been at sea for quite a while!

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if an answer will be forthcoming to question No. 59, which has been on the order paper in my name since April 1? The question concerns President Reagan's visit and the wonderful things that happened during it.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was under the impression that the question had been answered. However, I will take the question as notice and will check the record.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday some concern was expressed about the progress of Bill C-43 relating to privacy and the release of certain information. I have made inquiries and information has just come to hand.

I have been advised that the federal-provincial conference of ministers responsible for corrections, criminal justice, law enforcement, and of attorneys general, was held between December 7 and 9. During the conference, which concluded yesterday, the provinces—and I emphasize this—the provinces urged the federal government to postpone further action on Bill C-43 pending further consultations on many provincial concerns, including the inadequate protection regarding the disclosure of sensitive law enforcement and other information, and on whether the ultimate authority respecting disclosure should reside with the cabinet or the courts.

I have been informed that the specific request that this federal measure be delayed was made principally by the Conservative Attorney General of Ontario, Mr. McMurtry, and the NDP Attorney General for the Province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Romanow. Therefore, I want to make it plain to honourable senators that when they criticize the federal government for alleged delays in moving Bill C-43 through the parliamentary system, they should be aware that the provinces have asked that the measure be delayed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The selfish provinces again! I note that there was no Liberal premier or attorney general involved.

Senator Perrault: There may be shortly. You never know.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Everett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riley, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, is this not the order that Senator Smith spoke to yesterday? I believe this order was stood in order to give Senator Bell an opportunity to speak. Is that not correct?

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, yes, that is my understanding. However, under the circumstances, I suggest that it be withdrawn from the order paper.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since this order resumes the debate on a motion of the Honourable Senator Everett, I would suggest that it stand until next week in case Senator Everett wishes to speak to it. The order could stand in his name and, if he proceeds, his remarks would close the debate—or others might wish to speak to it. Is that satisfactory?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Everett, debate adjourned.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER
OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE
COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that I spoke to this order yesterday. I wanted to give Senator Murray an opportunity to agree or not to agree to considering this order as having been debated, in view of the fact that we now have Bill C-48 before us, which is the subject matter of this order. We would then avoid duplication. I am wondering whether Senator Macdonald has any advice on this matter, or whether we should stand this order until next Tuesday.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Stand until next Tuesday.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving adjournment of the Senate, I should like to thank you for your co-operation in connection with the constitution debate. I consider that we had an excellent debate in the Senate. It was orderly. It was not fierce, but, certainly, those who contributed to it from both sides were outspoken. With respect, I would particularly single out the Leader of the Opposition for his co-operation in connection with the orderly disposition of the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would not want Senator Frith's compliments to indicate that I have said my last word on that matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): There is no doubt on that point.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 15, 1981, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

JULES AND PAUL-ÉMILE LÉGER FOUNDATION

BILL TO INCORPORATE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-23, to incorporate the Jules and Paul-Émile Léger Foundation, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONCURRENCE BY COMMONS IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1981-82

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-86, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I just wish to know when copies of the bill will be distributed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as soon as possible we will have copies of the bill distributed. It ought to be in the package of bills already in honourable senators' desks, because I have received my copy of it. I am referring to the bill as passed by the other house. If we intend to proceed with the bill this evening we will make sure that honourable senators have copies.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend, but I do not think it has been distributed. Certainly, I have not received a copy. I would appreciate very much having the opportunity to read it in advance, especially if you expect us to vote for it.

Senator Frith: I will be sponsoring the bill and, if we proceed with it tonight, I will see that senators have copies. It is a fairly short bill and it is my intention to go through it with honourable senators when I present it. However, the request of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is clearly reasonable, and we will try to comply with it.

Motion agreed to.

MEAT IMPORT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-46, to regulate the importation into Canada of fresh, chilled and frozen meat and to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Canada Council, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act, Chapter C-2, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Capital Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Memorandum of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Municipality of Parkdale in the Province of Prince Edward Island, dated November 12, 1981, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970.

REGULATION OF OIL AND GAS INTERESTS

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-48

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, what I propose to do this evening is to state the conclusions reached by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred the subject matter of Bill C-48 and related matters. The "related matters" were taken by the committee to include the energy pricing agreements between the federal authority and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, respectively, and also the national energy policy, whatever the correlation might be. While we do not wish to hurry matters unduly, we have reached that time of year when we think of returning to our homes across the land—and I am as heartily in favour of that as anybody else—so I shall try to be brief.

The subject matter of this bill was rather completely dealt with by the committee. We heard officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources—particularly, I should note, Dr. Crosby, a man of great capacity and great knowledge and understanding of the subject, who devoted a very considerable amount of his time to our deliberations. We also heard representatives from the oil and gas industry, and four different groups of aboriginal peoples. The committee also heard from the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. So we had quite a cross-section of knowledgeable people appear as witnesses in order to make our study as complete as we felt was possible.

I should tell you first that the purpose of Bill C-48 is to encourage and regulate the exploration and production of oil and gas in Canada lands. "Canada lands" as defined consist of the Yukon Territory, the Northwest Territories, Sable Island and Canada's territorial waters extending to the outer edge of the Continental Shelf or to a distance of 200 nautical miles, whichever is the greater.

This bill will bring into force a new regime governing the issuance and management of oil and gas rights in the Canada lands. The new regime will govern not only future oil and gas rights, but also those already existing.

The bill reserves to the Crown a 25 per cent share of all oil and gas rights in Canada lands to be exercised through Petro-Canada or some other designated crown corporation. There will be a minimum requirement of 50 per cent Canadian ownership in order for a production licence to be issued, including the Crown's 25 per cent share of oil and gas production from the Canada lands.

● (2015)

The bill provides a basic royalty—which is one of the important features of the bill—of 10 per cent of all oil and gas produced from Canada lands, and an additional royalty of 40 per cent of the net profits of a field after deducting all taxes—this is called the progressive incremental royalty—the basic royalty, operating expenses in respect of the field in question and seismic work done outside the field and after allowing for a 25 per cent rate of return on capital invested. Neither royalty is applicable to fields in production before December 31, 1980.

There presently exist: (1) permits issued under the old régime established in 1961; (2) special renewal permits following upon those; (3) exploration agreements issued under the Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulations as amended in August 1977; and (4) oil and gas leases.

Transitional arrangements are provided for in the bill to convert all these rights into one of the two forms of rights which are contemplated in the bill, namely, exploration agreements and production licences.

That completes my general statement on the scope and purpose of the bill.

The most important feature of the bill, however, is the crown share and, therefore, I may spend a little more time on that. If I do, I will certainly compensate for it in the time that I do not spend on other parts of the bill.

One of the principal and most controversial features of the bill is the introduction of the crown share. Clause 27 of the bill reserves to the federal government a 25 per cent interest in respect of all Canada lands, including all existing and future dispositions and including the interest of Petro-Canada, which share will be exercised by a designated crown corporation or corporations. The 25 per cent interest reserved to the Crown, pursuant to clause 27, is in addition to any interest obtained by Petro-Canada and may result in the federal government obtaining an interest, in some cases, of up to 43.75 per cent when both shares are added together. The crown share is a carried interest—that is, you pay nothing in respect of the interest—until production, at which time it is converted to a working interest. This is provided for in subclauses 31(1) and 36(1). Only at that time must the Crown bear its share of expenditures.

Subclauses 29(2) and 29(3) of the bill provide that interest holders shall be paid an amount equal to 25 per cent of prior expenditures made in a discovery area. These ex gratia payments are to be made out of production revenue. This is supposed to be a form of compensation for expenditures that were made by the interest holders before the crown share was imposed under this proposed legislation. The postponement for a period of time of the obligation to pay the 25 per cent of prior expenses applies only insofar as payment is to be made out of production. Therefore, only if there is production will the carrying charges be paid.

The crown share is not applicable to oil and gas fields in production on Canada lands on or before December 31, 1980, such as Norman Wells. You will find that in clause 28.

● (2020)

We had appear before the committee representatives of a number of oil companies, such as Mobil Oil Canada, Ltd., Gulf Canada Resources Inc., and Chevron Standard Limited.

They argued strongly against the provisions in the bill respecting the crown share and have taken an important part in the exploration and development of oil and gas in the Canada lands. They regard the crown share as expropriation without adequate compensation and with retroactive effect so far as it applies to existing dispositions.

They argue that traditionally expropriation has meant fair and equitable compensation for the expropriated assets, which does not relate to historical causes, but is based on the market value of the assets.

Mobil has pointed out that the proposed compensation, in the case of the Hibernia field, would be in the range of 5 to 10 cents per barrel of oil after tax, whereas the brokerage firm of Pitfield, Mackay, Ross & Company Limited has valued the conventional reserves at $2.50 per barrel.

In the case of the Venture field, the present value of the proposed compensation would be in the range of one cent per one thousand cubic feet of gas after tax, whereas such reserves have been valued at 40 cents per thousand cubic feet of gas.

Gulf has stated that the proposed compensation would represent only 3 per cent of the value taken at the Parson's Lake field. Departmental officials were asked to agree or to disagree with the foregoing valuations and they did not respond. It would seem, therefore, that the value of proposed compensation would be inadequate when related to the value of interests taken.

Mobil, Gulf and Chevron have stated that the proposed 25 per cent back-in or crown share is particularly difficult for them to accept because in the case of Hibernia it is in addition to the 25 per cent interest already acquired by Petro-Canada. There has been, in effect, what in the trade has been called a double-dipping, which gives the Crown, in one form or another, an interest of up to 43.75 per cent.

Mobil regards the crown interest as having an insidious effect—"insidious" is their word—because it adds a significant new element of risk to the business climate of Canada. They point out that they have been subject to the Petro-Canada back-in and will lose a further interest as a result of the crown share. What assurances are there, they ask, that the Crown will not increase its share in the future?

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada (IPAC) has submitted that Petro-Canada should be treated as a commercial enterprise, as are other crown corporations such as Petrosar, Air Canada and Canadian National, which compete in the free marketplace. They point out that clause 34 of the bill gives the designated crown corporation to which a crown share is transferred—presumably, Petro-Canada—the right to participate and vote in operating decisions, even though it only has a carried interest, which is contrary to current commercial practice. Furthermore, they argue that Petro-Canada should be required to pay its fair share of accumulative exploratory costs at the point of exercising or being granted the 25 per cent crown share.

Representatives of Petro-Canada appeared before the committee in support of the 25 per cent crown share and urged that we consider that the Petro-Canada share on its back-in be regarded as a tax.

At the moment you will note that all I am stating are the proposals which were made. I have not yet come to the part where we attempt to give an answer to them.

The minister compared the 25 per cent crown share to a royalty. He argued that governments, as resource owners, can collect rent from those who exploit their resources, and royalties can be collected in the form of money or in kind. The big difference between the crown share and a royalty is that with the crown share the government must pay its share of exploration and development costs. From this point of view the crown share is said to be more attractive to the industry. The committee disagrees with this analysis. The federal government is taking away an asset in the form of a right and, in some cases, an asset of considerable value—that is to say, a portion of interest held in crown lands, whether such interest is represented by exploratory permits, special renewal permits, exploration agreements or oil and gas leases. The imposition of a tax or a royalty gives the government the right to collect revenues payable in cash or in kind. The 25 per cent crown share gives the government title to an asset and, with the asset, the government acquires certain rights, such as the right to participate in exploration, and becomes subject to certain obligations—that is to say, it has to pay its share of production expenses.

Mobil Oil and Gulf disagree with what Petro-Canada has stated, and what has been urged on behalf of the Crown. Gulf has pointed out, in a written submission, that under prior regulations, lease blocks were selected which, in general, would convey a 100 per cent interest in most discoveries. Mobil, in turn, has suggested that other features of the bill are the quid pro quo for being allowed to retain 100 per cent interest in acreage covered by exploration permits when converting to an oil and gas lease, and pointed out that, under the existing system, very large blocks of acreage in their entirety should be retained over the most prospective structures.

On January 20, 1981, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources justified the 25 per cent crown share when addressing the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Natural Resources and Public Works as follows:

As regards the 25 per cent Crown share in respect of existing oil and gas rights, oil and gas rights that have already been issued prior to passage of the new Act, there is an equally sound rationale for this. For years now the Canadian taxpayer has been in fact paying the bulk of the oil and gas exploration expenditures made in the frontier regions. Some $4.5 billion to $5 billion has been spent to date in oil and gas development activities in the frontier regions. It is fair to say, and in fact I believe it is conservative to say, that some three-quarters of that, some $3 billion, has been footed by the Canadian taxpayer. Indeed not uncommonly more than 90 per cent of every exploration dollar has been covered through the contribution of the Canadian taxpayer. How then can anybody say that the 25 per cent Crown share is "expropriation without compensation"?

I think it is important to reiterate the reasonableness of the 25 per cent Crown share in terms of the benefits that have accrued to the oil industry in the past. Tax incentives have been exceedingly generous. When the government introduced the "super-depletion allowance" the industry did not accuse us then of changing the rules of the game because of course they liked that change. We do not now propose to take back an interest equivalent to all these benefits, nor even a 50 per cent interest. We intend to take only 25 per cent. Moreover, it is important to remember that the major costs are associated with the production stage, not the exploration stage. In fact 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the total expenditure involved in exploring for and bringing a field into production is incurred after the production system has been designed and approved. Since the Crown share will be in the form of a "working interest" not later than the time at which a production system is approved, this means that the party exercising the Crown share will be paying a proportionate share of those major costs. I stress here that the 25 per cent Crown share does not apply to fields that are already in production, like Norman Wells.

Mobil has challenged the minister's statement to the effect that approximately $3 billion has been "footed by the Canadian taxpayer." In their view, only approximately $300 million has been borne by the Canadian taxpayer.

In reviewing these figures with the officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the committee was advised that the $3 billion consisted of savings resulting from, first, 100 per cent write-off of expenses; second, the 33⅓ per cent depletion allowance; and third, the 66⅔ per cent super-depletion allowance. Mobil regards the 66⅔ per cent super-depletion allowance as being the only relevant factor.

The committee notes that most expenditures incurred by Canadian taxpayers in the pursuit of earning income may be written off either immediately or over a period of time.

While the write-off provisions of the income tax system respecting resource exploration and development are generous, it is not reasonable to impute the full amount of expenses respecting oil and gas exploration in the Canada lands so written off as being expenses "footed by the Canadian taxpayers" in a manner different from other expenses "footed by the Canadian taxpayers."

The committee notes that the crown share applies to Canada lands only; it does not apply to provincial lands. Super-depletion allowances were granted in respect of Canada lands only. All other tax incentives related to both Canada and provincial lands.

The committee therefore concludes that only the super-depletion allowance could be taken into consideration in any attempt to justify the 25 per cent crown share.

Then the following question is put: Are these tax expenditures adequate justification? Mobil points out that because the super-depletion allowance and other tax incentives were introduced to encourage high-risk and high-cost exploration, the use of such incentives as an excuse for expropriating a 25 per cent interest after such expenditures had been incurred is unfair and illogical. The minister's statement cannot justify the conclusion that the use of past tax incentives to explore Canada lands now permits the Crown to take a portion of the assets created.

It has been suggested that there is precedent for the retroactive application of the 25 per cent crown share; namely, that in the case of Norway's interests in the oil and gas reserves of the North Sea, an increased amount of royalty may be exacted. However, there is an important distinction to be made. When persons have acquired an interest in the Norwegian oil and gas fields in the North Sea, they have known in advance that royalties might be increased. In Canada some companies have invested millions of dollars knowing that the royalties might be increased, but never anticipating that later the federal government would also take away from them 25 per cent of their interest without adequate compensation.

The committee is, therefore, of the view that the minister's defence, as stated above, for the imposition of the crown share in a retroactive manner is not supportable. Mobil has asked that the 25 per cent share should apply only to permits where no significant discoveries have been made prior to the passage of Bill C-48.

They also suggest that interests which were subject to the Petro-Canada back-in should not be included in lands subject to the crown share. Accordingly they recommended some amendments to accomplish that.

On the other hand, Gulf has suggested that the crown share should only apply to current, undisposed-of Canada lands to be acquired by companies in the future, and that those having interests in Canada lands should have the option of giving up 50 per cent of the acreage held by exploratory permits when converting to leases, or of accepting the 25 per cent crown share back-in with the Crown paying market value for the interest acquired.

The committee has consistently registered its disapproval of legislation which adversely and retroactively affects a third party. The committee agrees that a royalty or tax may be imposed or increased, and as such it may have retroactive effect. The crown share is not, however, a royalty or tax; it is the acquisition of someone else's rights. The committee therefore agrees that clause 28 of the bill should be amended. The major portion of the amendment is:

28. No Crown share is reserved out of . . .

(b) a former lease or former permit on which the drilling of a well was commenced prior to December 9, 1980 and such well subsequently becomes a significant discovery.

The committee, other than that, does not accept, and does not recommend, that other proposed amendments are necessary or advisable.

Honourable senators, there is an added factor that I should call your attention to on this subject. One of the groups of Indian people that appeared before us was a committee described as the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement, shortened to COPE, representing 2,500 Inuvialuit, who are the Eskimo people of the western part of the Arctic. COPE has concluded with the federal Crown an agreement settling all of their land claims by reserving to them a block of 5,000 square miles as one of the considerations. They were to step into the shoes of the Crown in respect of existing alienations, and the Crown would transfer to them everything that it had. They claimed that this agreement has been breached by the operation of the 25 per cent crown share.

I might take just a moment on that. There were two phases of the transaction and the supporting agreement. One was in settlement of the land claims of this group represented by COPE, who are the only group of aboriginal people to have made a settlement of their land claims. They made that settlement back in 1978. What they wanted to do was transfer most of the claims which they asserted in respect of what they call their land claims to the Crown for whatever compensation or consideration was agreed on. They wanted a block of 5,000 square miles of that grouping to be transferred back to them, and, in the course of time, and in the development of the areas, they may have an asset that would produce, and assure them of, more or less substantial income.

They ran into this difficulty: If the Crown transferred all entitlement—that is, title to all of the claims—to the Indians, who would then own them, under the agreement between the two groups, the Indians would get 100 per cent of the claims. However, the Crown then advised that if COPE insisted that the 5,000 square miles be dealt with differently—that is, if COPE wanted to retain those lands—the 25 per cent crown share would be deducted from the transfer of the 5,000 square miles from the Crown back to the Indian group. When the representatives from the Indian group appeared before us, this seemed to be the bone of contention—an attitude which I mentioned at a later date to the minister as being one that was difficult to understand.

Fortunately, however, the problem did not reach the stage where we had to do anything about it. The Crown and the Indian group got together. Letters were exchanged wherein the Crown agreed that, on the interpretation of the agreement between the parties, this position was not open to the Crown—that is, if they dealt in the 5,000 square miles, the 25 per cent went back to the Crown. The members of COPE wrote an acknowledging letter of thanks. The matter was settled by mutual agreement on the basis of what would appear to be a potential interpretation of the contract between the parties, and so ended the lesson. When the minister appeared before us, he filed those two letters so that we had an opportunity to review the transaction.

[Senator Hayden.]

The committee had a number of representatives of the aboriginal peoples appear before it. We heard from the Council of Yukon Indians, the Dene, the Métis and the National Indian Brotherhood. Though they raised a number of issues, there appeared to be only one which was justified, and it has to do with a provision contained in subclause 5(8) of Bill C-48, which reads:

Nothing in this Act abrogates or derogates from any aboriginal title, right or claim that pertained to the aboriginal people of Canada prior to the coming into force of this Act.

The concern arose because of another provision in subclause 5(2), which reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may, by order, for any purposes and under any conditions set out in the order, withdraw from the application of this Act such Canada lands as are specified in the order.

The Indian groups said that up to the time this bill becomes law they are exposed to losing more and more of what they may assert is part of their land claims, because the moment there is any arrangement made in connection with those claims, under subclause 5(2), the lands are withdrawn from the application of the act. Therefore, while subclause 5(8) says that nothing shall derogate from their aboriginal rights, subclause 5(2) states that there is at least a potential derogation. The members of the committee suggested that this problem might be overcome by inserting some introductory words into subclause 5(2). Those introductory words might be put in this form:

Subject to subsection (8), the Governor in Council may, by order, for any purposes and under any conditions set out in the order, withdraw from the application of this Act such Canada lands as are specified in the order.

The effect thereby given is that the subclause does not restrict any action by the Crown in relation to land, except if the result is to take away something on which the aboriginal rights have been asserted. Whether that recommendation will be accepted remains to be seen, because the report of the committee at this point deals only with the subject matter of the bill. When the committee meets to study the bill, which will be very soon now, that issue will have to be raised.

Honourable senators, I am taking much longer than I anticipated. After all, this is supposed to be a summary. I suppose I have violated a decent concept of a "summary" up to this moment.

Members of the oil and gas industry brought to the attention of the committee a significant problem. I believe it is generally acknowledged that, so far as the development of Canada lands is concerned, and so far as Bill C-48 is concerned, the emphasis is on exploration and development leading to production, the assumption being that there are substantial pools of oil in the offshore and frontier areas. I suppose it follows that, as a result of the development under Bill C-48, we may at an earlier time achieve oil self-sufficiency.

However, honourable senators, others have been sounding a word of warning. The committee heard from representatives of the service industry. These people are the drillers and contractors, and they represent the industry that serves the development and operation of wells. They indicated the movement of rigs out of the country and the lack of work in the service industry. The representatives of this industry say that this does not result from any lack of oil in the provincial lands. I suppose it becomes a question of a contest between those favouring development in provincial lands and those favouring development in Canada lands. I remind you that Bill C-48 concerns Canada lands.

When Mobil Oil appeared before us they said that in Saskatchewan last year they had to cut back the number of wells they were drilling, or the number of operations they were carrying on, because they were uneconomic. They cut down to 30 per cent. They would have been justified in cutting down even further than that, but they were concerned that if they did it would have an adverse effect upon their titles to properties, among other things.

Chevron told the same kind of story: The oil is there, but the wells would be low-volume and high-cost. That high cost has become even higher, one reason being that the federal-provincial agreements have resulted in the industry's getting a lesser share of the realization for the oil and gas. Yet, when the federal-provincial agreements were entered into, each agreement had in it a specific clause providing for dealing with that exact situation.

The agreement between Saskatchewan and the federal government, for example, contains a provision which deals specifically with low-productivity wells. That provision, referring to the Province of Saskatchewan and the federal government, states:

We are agreed that special measures are required to improve the economic viability of low productivity or marginal wells. To complement the royalty and tax adjustments the Government of Saskatchewan will make, noted above, the Government of Canada undertakes to effectively reduce the burden of IORT applicable to low productivity wells.

IORT stands for incremental oil revenue tax.

The effect of this was that there was a need for some emphasis on development of provincial lands, recognizing the difference in productivity and cost thereof and the effect of the increases in provincial royalty tax, income taxes and petroleum taxes, as well as the federal impact, and the effect was such that the costs were increased to the extent that it was no longer a viable operation.

In the Alberta agreement there is a similar provision. Nevertheless, in September Alberta's Minister of Energy, Mr. Leitch, concluded an agreement which he had negotiated with the people from the oil industry in which Alberta reduced its royalty tax from 50 per cent to 25 per cent. They established a maximum of $2 million credit on royalty tax liability, whereas up to that moment the maximum had been $1 million. And yet in the material I have it is indicated that the rates which were reduced in September were the rates that were actually developed during the period of the wrangle that was taking place in 1974.

I now refer to an article by Anthony McCallum in the Globe and Mail of Thursday, October 29. I have been doing more reading than I usually do, and I hope you will excuse me.

The article reads, in part:

Under the old rules, established after the federal-provincial wrangle in 1974, credits were limited to 25 per cent of royalties and a maximum of $1-million.

Mr. Leitch made the announcement at an industry conference—at which industrial delegates were present. According to the article, the way in which Mr. Leitch explained his position was this:

If a company is liable for royalties of $2-million, for example, it now may apply for a $1-million credit. The credit also is available to participants in drilling funds, a financing tool used mainly by smaller companies.

Then the President of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, which represents smaller companies, said that the change will help to offset the lowering cash flow, and the suggestion was that the old oil netback, to which this program applies, will be increased by approximately 30 per cent for old natural gas and by approximately 50 per cent for the new.

Mr. Leitch made reference to the provisions in the Alberta agreement with respect to getting together with the federal authority in an attempt to resolve these questions. I am sure that in this chamber we know something about this owing to the perseverance of our good Senator Roblin. He has made a number of speeches, and made them well—to me, they make sense—on the importance of secondary and tertiary recovery of oil. In other words, there may be lots of oil in the ground, but it is difficult to obtain it and, therefore, it is more costly. But if there is an abundance of oil there and if Canada is going to face a period in which the Canada lands will not be in production early enough to take care of the slack that has developed owing to the uneconomic operations that face the smaller operators in Saskatchewan and Alberta, then the place where help is needed, and where the federal government should assist, is in relation to provincial lands.

I should point out that that has nothing to do with Bill C-48 which deals only with Canada lands. Canada has joined with the provinces in these agreements, representing, at least indirectly, substantially what the ailment is that develops in relation to provincial lands, namely, the inability because of cost to get the supplies of oil out that are there in the ground.

For such time as we are waiting for the bonanza from the frontier development, I think the federal government could well be said to have taken a position under these agreements that it will meet and join with the provincial representatives. Mr. Leitch indicates in this article that he intends to get in touch with his federal counterpart, and the Government of Saskatchewan has indicated that they are pursuing the matter. Even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who appeared before us the other day, indicated that his department was negotiating with the provinces and that it recognized how important it was to have a viable situation in provincial lands, simply because the offshore and frontier developments of Canada lands are long-range prospects. This matter, with the important references, has been developed in the report.

The committee disposed of the question of the provisions for appeal because a number of the institutions that appeared before us claimed that there should be greater provision for and wider scope to the making of appeals. I indicated to the committee on a number of occasions how broad those sections are which provide the rights of appeal. If one analyzes the law as it is—what the appeal provisions in the Federal Court Act are and to what extent they might help—it is hard to visualize what exact situations might happen.

For instance, if the minister made an order to which the legislation provided no right of appeal and if the order were based on a misinterpretation of the law, in my view, there is a remedy. Whether or not there is a statutory right of appeal in Bill C-48, certainly the person who is in jeopardy as a result of that order has a right which he can assert in court to correct that situation.

The committee felt there was ample scope for appeal of any orders, declarations or determinations, such as the determination of fair market value of the gas and oil with regard to measuring the royalty payments, particularly in cases where the minister may have elected to take the royalty payment in kind instead of in dollars. Therefore, we have so recommended that the more important provisions of the bill will make for overall viability in the whole industry. For example, if one part of the industry needs to help another part of the industry in another part of Canada and this particular part is not in a position to carry a substantial load, then the parties involved should work the matter out themselves, and that is what the committee has said.

There are many other points. When one spends as long as three months on a topic such as this, it is difficult to sift out certain points and retain others. One becomes so full of it that one constantly has running through one's mind, "Oh, I didn't say anything about this," or, "I didn't mention that." There are many points one might regard as important. For instance, I have not talked about the topic of Canadian ownership rights. Undoubtedly, the sponsor of the bill will raise this topic, and I suppose I should leave something for him.

I am satisfied that the report represents the conclusions reached by the members of the committee, and certainly we heard considerable evidence, evidence that I think in every instance was substantial and sincere. On occasion a crusading spirit may have asserted itself, but it was up to the members of the committee to distinguish it and to be as objective as they possibly could, and certainly the chairman tried to do so. So I shall leave you with these somewhat disjointed thoughts, but I am just breaking into the field again.

[Senator Hayden.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—MOTION RESPECTING NON-INTERFERENCE IN INTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on Sunday morning, December 13, the world was indeed shocked upon hearing the deplorable news that a new Polish government of top generals had imposed martial law on Poland and had arrested many Polish union leaders and human rights activists. At the same time, democratic freedoms and human rights, won at great sacrifice by Solidarity under the leadership of Lech Walesa, were suspended. In doubt is the generous humanitarian assistance offered by the Canadian government and others.

I propose, honourable senators, to move a motion similar to the one passed with unanimous consent in the other place yesterday.

Whereas Canadians strongly adhere to the principles of the Helsinki Accord, with special reference to basic human rights and freedoms, and are greatly concerned about the recent developments in Poland; and whereas Canadians support the citizens of Poland in the struggle to acquire those basic freedoms to which they have a right; and whereas we agree with Pope John Paul II and other world leaders whose appeal is that the solutions to Poland's problems be achieved without violence and bloodshed, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

That the Senate urge all nations of the world to refrain from any political or military actions that may in any way interfere with the internal affairs of Poland and that this house express the wish that Poland's internal difficulties will be solved by peaceful negotiations between the Polish Government and the Polish people.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am happy to have this opportunity to indicate my support to the mover of this motion with respect to the situation in Poland. I suppose we have all been, metaphorically at least, holding our breath while we have watched the development of events in Poland. They have been truly remarkable, and on many occasions in the past I wondered what the dénouement would ultimately be.

It is worthy of note that the development of human rights over the past year and a half in Poland has been extraordinary when one considers the history of human rights among the countries of the Warsaw Pact, and, indeed, in the Soviet empire. There was always the question as to how far those rights would be pushed before prompting a reaction which would adversely affect them. We now appear to have reached that stage.

I notice the resolution is concerned about political and military action by others in the internal affairs of Poland, and

I think it is quite right that that concern should be expressed. I would add my concern that economic pressure might be brought to bear with respect to the Polish situation, and I hope that, as far as possible, the western world will be understanding of the economic needs of Poland because we can be sure that this represents a considerable hazard to Poles when they consider their relations with the other countries of the eastern bloc.

I must say that a military régime anywhere is not easily displaced, particularly one which may be acting as a proxy for the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. I believe we will have to continue to hold our breath for a while as we see how these grave events evolve.

Meanwhile, I can certainly subscribe to the statement made by my honourable friend that we should do nothing to disturb the balance and that we should urge other nations of the world to take the same point of view.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 16th December, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—FURTHER STATEMENT IN RESPONSE TO QUESTION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, on December 9, 1981, Senator Roblin asked a question relating to procurement policies and practices with respect to the Alaska Highway gas pipeline project. I now have a complete answer to his question and, since it is rather lengthy, I ask leave that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In August, 1980, I approved the procurement program development by Foothills Pipelines (Yukon) Ltd. for the Canadian section of the pipeline as required under the Northern Pipeline Act. The procurement program meets the requirements of the Act by ensuring that Canadian industries have a fair and competitive opportunity to supply the goods and services to the project in Canada and that the level of Canadian content is "maximized so far as practicable with respect to origin of products, services and their components." Foothills has a further obligation to see that maximum advantage is taken of the opportunities to broaden Canada's industrial base and to increase indigenous research and development. All bids to the project are assessed on the basis of generally competitive terms and economic benefits to Canada.

The procurement plan specifies the major components—or "designated items"—for which Foothills must obtain approval from the Designated Officer prior to procurement. These items include line pipe of 914 mm (36 in.) diameter and larger, turbo-compressors, and valves and pipe fittings of 508 mm (20 in.) and larger in diameter.

Under the procurement provisions of the Canada-U.S. Pipeline Agreement, the project is aimed at maximizing the economic benefits of each country while at the same time ensuring that the supply of goods and services is on generally competitive terms. These terms include price, reliability, servicing capacity, and delivery schedule. Reciprocal procedures governing the procurement of designated items were established through an exchange of diplomatic notes in June, 1980. The procedures provide for the exchange of information, from the specification stage through to recommendation-to-purchase, between the Northern Pipeline Agency in Canada and the Office of the Federal Inspector in the United States. These procedures were followed on an informal basis prior to the exchange of notes.

In May, 1980, Foothills awarded steel contracts worth $2 billion to STELCO and IPSCO, providing for the total manufacture of 1.5 million tons for the Canadian section of the pipeline. These contracts represent 80 per cent of the total mainline pipe required. The remaining 20 per cent is to be allocated to the two companies at a later date based on their cost and delivery performance.

In April, 1980, approval was given to Foothills to enter into a contract to purchase four turbine-compressor units, valued at approximately $20 million, from Cooper Rolls and Westinghouse for the Eastern Leg of the project. Foothills subsequently decided to substitute an electrically driven unit for one of the gas turbines. Earlier this year, the Designated Officer of the Agency gave his approval for the company to purchase one electric drive unit from Siemens Electric Limited in place of one of the gas turbine units from Cooper Rolls. It is anticipated that the additional capital cost of $2 million will be offset by a lower life-time operating cost for the unit.

Fittings contracts, valued at $2.9 million, have been awarded to date for construction of the southern segments of the line in Canada. These contracts have gone to three Canadian suppliers, Uniracor Ltd. of Becancour, Quebec, EPG Taylor Forge Division of Hamilton, Ontario, Steel-

Flo Industries of Turner Valley, Alberta, and one U.S. supplier, ITT Grinnell of Princeton, Kentucky.

Valve contracts worth $7.9 million have also been awarded to Rockwell International of Canada Ltd. of Barrie, Ontario, Borsig Hartmann Valve Ltd. of Calgary, Alberta, Cameron Iron Works of Houston, Texas, and the Grove Valve and Regulator Company of Oakland, California.

As of May 31, 1981, 90 per cent of the goods and services used in the construction of the southern segments of the system in Canada came from Canadian sources. Foothills expects that this level of Canadian content will be maintained for the remainder of the project.

CANADA OIL AND GAS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, implements part of the National Energy Program as set out in October 1980. It establishes a new régime to cover oil and gas exploration and production in the Canada lands. It is a complex piece of legislation, embodying several very significant provisions and principles.

Senator Hayden, in reporting from the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the reference made to it some months ago, explained much about the bill. However, near the end of his comments he made the remark that he wanted to leave something for me to deal with in proposing second reading. I wish he had not taken that generous attitude in the latter part of his remarks because I would very much prefer that he were explaining all the details of the bill.

Incidentally, I noticed that he was careful to distinguish those parts of the prospective report on the reference to the committee that did not refer directly to Bill C-48, but dealt with another very important part of the National Energy Program which is of great significance. I refer to production from marginal wells in the provinces. While of tremendous significance in the total energy program, it is not strictly germane to Bill C-48, and I thank him for carefully pointing that out in his remarks.

I would remind committee members that somewhere in the evidence there was a reference to discussions being under way following the Alberta and Saskatchewan agreements, with a view to making better provisions to enable these marginal wells to continue in operation. I am told they are now at an active stage.

While Bill C-48 is an important part of the National Energy Program and implements a large part of it, it is still only a part. There is another part that is of major importance that I regret is not before us at this time, and that is the prospective bill that has been spoken about from time to time, a new energy security bill, which I anticipate will be before us in the months ahead. Among other things, that bill will deal with the petroleum incentive payments or grants which have such a bearing on the whole subject. Indeed, it would have been fortunate if we had it before us now to relate properly to Bill C-48. While this bill is very extensive, it is not complete in that sense.

While I cannot tell of all that will be contained in the energy security bill, I know it will contain provision for the petroleum incentives payments.

The National Energy Program, introduced in October 1980, has three major objectives: (1) the program seeks self-sufficiency in Canada and independence from the world oil market by 1990; (2) it seeks significantly increased participation by Canadians in the oil and gas industry; and (3), it seeks fairness in sharing the revenues and benefits among the producing companies, governments, and those people directly concerned, the consumers.

Bill C-48 deals only with Canada lands which are described in clause 2 of the bill. I should remind honourable senators that they include all Canadian territory north of the 60th parallel, Sable Island, and all offshore areas not within a province. These federally-administered lands embrace an area twice as large as the total area of the ten provinces. They embrace 6.5 million square kilometres of seabed and about 3.9 million square kilometres in the Yukon and Northwest Territories; together, more than 10 million square kilometres.

This vast area appears to contain Canada's best prospects for large, new finds of conventional petroleum. It is located in rough territory, as far as exploration, development and production are concerned. To indicate the scale of what is envisaged and the magnitude of what we are dealing with, I can tell you that it has been estimated that oil and gas companies may be spending as much as $4 billion yearly during the rest of this decade on resource exploration in Canada lands. It will be seen that the bill offers hope for energy self-security for Canadians and an end to reliance on outside sources of oil. The bill should also provide an unparalleled opportunity for oil and gas related industries, especially Canadian industries.

The legislation under which we are now operating, and which Bill C-48 will replace, is 20 years old. It dates from the 1961 Oil and Gas Land Regulations, and has become inappropriate to our resource needs of today by reason of the sharply changed situation in the energy field over the past 20 years. The earlier regime served its purpose well, but it has simply become outdated. It is no longer valid and does not meet today's conditions and requirements.

Work was begun in 1970 with a view to replacing the then existing regulations. The results of that work had to be revised when the world petroleum situation changed radically in 1973 with the OPEC activities. The resultant draft legislation designed to replace the then existing outmoded legislation was to be found in Bill C-20, which was given first reading in the House of Commons on December 9, 1977. Unfortunately, that legislation died on the Order Paper, and for the past four years and more, it has been clear that the existing regime, as first set up in 1961, and subsequently amended, would be changed, but there was uncertainty as to what the new rules for exploration and development would be, and uncertainty as to the timing of the impending changes.

The bill now before us is the result of a little less than four years of work, because this bill was actually presented to the House of Commons almost exactly one year ago. It has been before the other place for the past year.

When this bill is enacted, it will remove the uncertainty. Together with the proposed energy security legislation, it will create an atmosphere of certainty and, I hope, clarity for industry and generally bring the whole situation up to date.

I was going to say a good deal more about companies continuing indefinitely in an environment in which there is so much uncertainty, and also talk about the difficulties of having investors provide the enormous sums of money required in that atmosphere of uncertainty, but perhaps I do not need to develop this argument further. Perhaps it is self-evident, and bearing in mind the time at which I am speaking I shall abbreviate my remarks somewhat. The bill is so enormous that I would really have liked to take longer, but I will try to be reasonable in that respect and hope I will succeed.

The bill provides for a transition period during which all existing exploration permits and petroleum leases in the Canada lands will be renegotiated and brought under the regime set up within the bill.

In cases where discoveries have been made based on exploration agreements, they will lead to a production licence being granted under the terms of this legislation. Some of the terms and conditions for the petroleum industry should be mentioned, and I shall attempt to be rather brief in summarizing them.

First of all, the exploration agreements under the new regime will have stiffer work requirements than those which existed under the earlier exploration permits, and through the negotiated exploration agreements, they will include, among other things, firm drilling commitments on the part of the companies.

Second, the 25 per cent share of the oil and gas rights in Canada lands will be retained by the Crown, and I will be saying more about this later.

Third, there will be a minimum requirement of 50 per cent Canadian ownership, either through the private or public sector, of all production from Canada lands.

Fourth, in the agreements Canadians will be given a full and fair opportunity to compete for new jobs and for the supply of goods and services. Henceforth, that will be dealt with in the agreements.

Fifth, the government will have the right to determine when production will start, and when the product will be delivered to the Canadian market in the quantities and at the prices specified.

Sixth, the government will have greater control with regard to the timing, direction, rate and the level of exploration, development and production.

Seven, the federal authorities will be ensured a fair return from the oil and gas resources by means of a basic royalty of 10 per cent. This provision will be found, honourable senators, in clause 40. The bill also imposes a progressive incremental royalty of 40 per cent of the net profits of a field above a 25 per cent rate of return to the company producing from that field.

The new regime would be comparatively meaningless unless it applied to existing rights. Existing exploration rights, exclusive of Hudson Bay, already cover about 1.2 million square kilometres. This seems to include the bulk of the new, known prospective exploitable acreage. If these areas under agreement are not actively explored within the time specified, or to be specified in the new agreements, there is a provision whereby they will be relinquished to the Crown.

Perhaps I need not go further in stressing the importance of the Canada lands in attaining the objective of energy self-sufficiency. Perhaps I can leave that, but I find the estimated production mind-boggling. You must remember that they are only estimates or projections, and I am always a little leery of estimates. Sometimes I think they may be tinged with crystal-gazing, and I am not one to believe in that, but they are great.

To show the magnitude of it, about $5 billion has already been spent to date on exploration and development in the Canada lands. There have been generous allowances and tax write-offs given to those doing the exploration work. That was the scheme under which those permits were granted and respective exploration companies induced to become active in the area. In future, incentives for exploration will be dealt with in a different way. This new energy security legislation, as I have indicated, hopefully will be brought forward in the next few months and will provide for incentive grants under the petroleum incentive payment system. The necessary administrative procedures for that are already being put in place.

● (2130)

To give you an idea of the scale of development we are talking about—and some of the figures that I, at least, find staggering—the Geological Survey of Canada estimates that if 325 wells were to be drilled on the Canada lands in the current decade, discovery of 5.2 billion barrels of oil would be the probable result. On the other hand, it estimates that about 70 times as many wells, that is 22,000 wells, would be needed in the western provinces to find half as much oil. While these figures bear the risk inherent in making future estimates in such a difficult area, I put them forward for the purpose of bringing into perspective the importance of the bill with which we are dealing. It is apparent that energy will demand a huge share of the country's wealth in the next few years. The government is determined to create the environment in which necessary growth can take place to achieve the objectives I cited earlier, and to create economic benefits for the whole of the country in so doing.

Perhaps I should indicate how I think this is to be accomplished. It is necessary to view Bill C-48 in proper context as a key element in the National Energy Program, which was announced in October 1980. This bill provides a regime that is attractive to investors.

To provide Canadians with encouragement to participate in the oil and gas industry, the National Energy Program includes a sliding scale of direct petroleum incentive payments which are available to companies and individuals alike, and will be provided for in the energy security bill. These payments will provide a sliding scale to cover from 25 per cent of the eligible exploration costs of all companies, whether Canadian or foreign-owned, increasing, depending on the level of Canadian ownership, up to 80 per cent of the exploration costs. It is significant to note that there will not be any up-front payments or payments made at the time the exploration rights agreements are granted under the new legislation. It is anticipated that this petroleum incentive system of grants, by raising capital for oil and gas exploration and development in the Canada lands, will have many positive effects. Drilling funds, for example, have traditionally provided an excellent source of capital for supporting industry. With the advent of these grants, they will have become an even more attractive investment vehicle and, by virtue of the sliding scale, particularly for Canadians. The very large amounts envisaged in the petroleum incentive grants will make an enormous pool of capital available to industry so that it can get on with the job of achieving energy security for all Canadians. It will also help to ensure the participation of a wider range of Canadian investors.

It is estimated that the self-generated revenue of the companies, together with these grants I have spoken of, should cover or provide 85 per cent of the industry's capital requirements for the period ending in 1986.

The Canadian Petroleum Association estimated that $104 billion in capital will be required during that period. The Government of Canada and the producing provinces have estimated that the cash flow from sales will total $76 billion net after providing for operating costs and all taxes and royalties. If you couple this with the projected estimate of a further $12 billion from the petroleum incentive grants, you can see that industry will be left to find $16 billion from other capital sources. When you bear in mind the changes I have spoken of, this would seem to be well within the capacity of the industry to obtain, given a wide range of viable projects that appear to be on the horizon.

Senator Hayden dealt at some length with the 25 per cent share reserved by the Crown and exercised through a designated crown corporation, and I shall attempt to point out other viewpoints. Reference to this provision will be found in clause 27 of the bill.

The Canadian people own 100 per cent of the Canada lands and the oil and gas resources contained therein. Private companies are permitted to explore and develop these resources in accordance with the regime set out in Bill C-48, which is believed to be wholly appropriate to circumstances. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made clear when giving evidence at the committee last week, and on other occasions, the new Canada lands regime inevitably had to result in greater government share of oil and gas revenues than would have been the case under the existing rules or those proposed in 1977. Existing rights were issued prior to the 1979 explosion in world oil prices. Most lands now held by the industry under exploration permits under the old regime even pre-date the emergence of OPEC's radical pricing policies of 1974. They are that old.

If you bear in mind that for a great part of the 20 years in which we have been operating under the existing permit system, and particularly in the early years, we were talking about oil at $2 a barrel, which is now only a fond memory. We are now talking in the new legislation, I believe, of oil at about $40 a barrel. Therefore, it becomes self-evident why some changes had to be made. These enormous windfall profits had to be provided for. That was accomplished by the progressive incremental royalty provisions and, of course, by the regular royalty provisions, and, further, by the 25 per cent crown share. I was going to develop some comparisons between the United Kingdom and the Norway system, but I will leave that out, if I may.

If you view the 25 per cent crown share in the context I have just referred to, it will be eminently reasonable, particularly when you bear in mind the new petroleum incentive payment system of grants.

Perhaps I should point out that that 25 per cent Crown interest does appear to carry with it full payment of the costs of development. In exploration of gas and oil, it is estimated that between 85 per cent and 90 per cent of the costs arise during the stage leading to the development of production and not in the original exploration process. When we bear in mind the heavy original exploration cost, the 25 per cent Crown share enters the negotiations at the point where the development system leading to a production licence is being negotiated between the company and the minister. I believe it will be seen to be eminently fair. There is a provision in the bill to the effect that the crown corporation must convert to a working interest or relinquish its interest before the granting of a production licence.

I do not believe that I should touch on matters concerning the income tax regulations and provisions. It is perhaps not germane at the moment. We have come a long way since the bill was introduced in December 1980. There have been misunderstandings and disagreements, but most of them—in fact, a great many of them—have been removed. Indeed, a giant step has been taken in the development of an energy policy with the pricing agreements reached with the Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. There are many important facets of those agreements, the most important being the removal of the points of difference between the federal and provincial authorities. They also allow Canada to get on with energy development. We can now look forward to successful agreements resulting from negotiations with the coastal provinces. Those agreements are still outstanding, but I hope they will be completed soon. However, I will not risk crystal-gazing and fixing the date. The bill, together with the supporting National Energy Program and the prospective agreements, will combine to ensure that Canadians achieve their goal of energy security.

I commend the bill to the consideration of honourable senators.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might trespass upon the good nature of the sponsor of the bill by asking him one or two questions relating particularly to the area from which I come, namely, the Atlantic area.

Senator McIlraith: I did not quite follow the honourable senator's question.

Senator Smith: I asked if the sponsor of the bill would be prepared to answer one or two questions concerning this bill, and how it might affect the Atlantic area.

Senator McIlraith: With regard to the legislation as it concerns the method of handling exploration in the coastal areas, we must remember that part is provincial land and part federal. The bill affects federal land. Sable Island is also included in the bill.

Senator Smith: Although the honourable senator has not specifically answered my question, I take it that he is indicating that he is willing to answer one or two questions. My first is: Does this bill purport to override any claim that the Atlantic provinces, particularly Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, may have—and also Sable Island, in the case of Nova Scotia?

Senator McIlraith: I would prefer to have that question answered by the minister in committee, because there is a difference between the claims of Nova Scotia and those of Newfoundland; and, indeed, I believe there is also a difference in the state of negotiations. In fact, their claims are based on a slightly different historical background. I do not believe that I should attempt to give an answer to such an important question on the general information I have.

Senator Smith: I appreciate the reluctance of the honourable senator to make any assertion about the ownership of those important parts of potential oil and gas producing areas off the Atlantic coast; but my question is fairly simple. I asked: Does this bill purport to include the offshore areas which are claimed by either Nova Scotia or Newfoundland?

Senator McIlraith: I do not know precisely what the claims of Nova Scotia or Newfoundland are and, therefore, I am avoiding answering the question. I believe the question involves much more than the simple form in which it was put; it would appear to be more complicated than that.

Senator Smith: I do not suppose that I am completely ignorant of the complexity of this matter, but I am asking a perfectly simple question, which has nothing to do with the complexity of the matter. However, if the honourable senator does not wish to answer my question—and I can understand that he may not wish to—I will not press it. All I am asking is: Regardless of the complexity, does this bill purport to have any effect upon the claims of Nova Scotia or Newfoundland to any of the potential offshore producing areas, or to Sable Island? That has nothing to do with the complexity, as simple or complex as those claims may be.

Senator McIlraith: Simple or complex, it is a dangerous question. The honourable senator suggested that I might not want to answer his question. I do wish to answer it, but I consider it is unwise of me to answer it because I simply do not have sufficient or precise information to give him an accurate answer.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable senator for his frankness, in any event.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if left to my own devices, I doubt that I would trespass upon the attention of honourable senators at this time of night, but, in view of the timetable which has been suggested to me, it seems that it is now or never. So I am on my feet and I am happy to have an opportunity to deal with the vital question in the national interest that is bound up in the discussions we have been having on Bill C-48.

The goals of Canadian energy policy in respect of hydrocarbons are, I believe, clear and generally supported in the nation. First, we want to do what we can to ensure that we have self-sufficiency in the petroleum field by 1990. We want to ensure that there is prudent management of a vast public asset, a vast public resource, in the so-called Canada lands. I believe we are all agreed that we must strive for a greater degree of Canadian ownership and control in the management of that great natural resource, and we all want to see that the revenues that accrue to the various levels of government are reasonable in the circumstances and protect the public interest in that respect.

It is with that background that I want to say something about Bill C-48, although, in view of the fact that it is only one of a number of interlocking bills, some of which we have not yet even seen, it is not practical to confine my remarks to Bill C-48 alone and I must pay some attention to other areas of concern in the oil industry; and that I propose to do.

I was struck a little while ago, on reading the 1980 report of the Economic Council of Canada, by a statement to the effect that energy investments were about the only good thing we had going for us in the developing economy of the country. If that was true in 1980, it is true, I think, and perhaps more than true, in 1981. The way in which we manage our energy development is not confined to the necessity for energy alone; it also has its impact on the whole economic development of our country, and, as the Economic Council says—and I agree—this will be the centrepiece of activity in the next few years, perhaps even in the next decade, in Canada. So we must judge Bill C-48 and the national energy policy by our domestic economic goals and by the desirability of self-sufficiency by 1990. We are perforce, I think, obliged to link it to international considerations also, because its effect on our balance of payments, its effect on the confidence level with respect to the operations of the Canadian governmental authority, and our obligations to those who trade with us, are matters which cannot be overlooked in discussing this general topic.

Much of the substance of Bill C-48 has been placed before us very clearly by the mover of this motion, Senator McIlraith. In addition, we have had the advantage of the report of the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Senator Hayden, which dealt with certain matters to which I, too, would like to make a brief reference.

One of the features that has attracted the widest interest in this bill, of course, is the allegation that in its operation there is an element of retroactivity which is not balanced by due compensation for those who are adversely affected by it. That goes to the heart of the discussion we have been having in the country about the 25 per cent crown share in what are described as the Canada lands. This feature of the bill has been very widely criticized. The justification offered by the minister, that because of the $3 billion that he says has been contributed by the Canadian public the Canadian taxpayer is entitled to some reward, and that the 25 per cent back-in is justified on those grounds, has been pretty thoroughly demolished by Senator Hayden, and I have a suspicion that when the report of the committee on Bill C-48 reaches this house in its final form, the whole of that argument will be set out in detail, and will make it clear that this argument is bogus. The argument is completely bogus because the sum involved is not $3 billion, or anything like it. If you want to take 25 per cent back, find a better reason than that, because it certainly is not one that will stand up to any intelligent examination. I suspect that the oil companies are right who say that the portion footed by the public and ascribed to the Canada lands situation is closer to $300 million than the $3 billion previously quoted. There has to be a better reason for the expropriation—and I use that word deliberately—than the one that has been given to us.

I think that Senator Hayden dealt with the other explanation pretty effectively, when he said that past tax incentives—if “tax incentives” is not an impolite expression in this country these days, after the budget we have had—cannot be used to permit the taking away of an asset that has been created or developed by those who have been exploring Canada lands.

I think the argument against that line of reasoning in respect of the 25 per cent back-in is pretty conclusive, and that we would do well to consider what reasonable measures we can take to deal with the injustice that I think has been created, which may be real or apparent—in my opinion it is both—and that the bill should be amended to eliminate those measures of retroactivity which offend what I submit is natural justice.

In respect of that we have the ex gratia compensation payments. Senator Hayden dealt with that, I think, in very decisive terms; that is, that it really represents a tip. It is a gratuity, not real compensation at all, amounting to about 3 per cent of the value of the assets taken. I would not even call it an honorarium or an indemnity. It is a tip.

[Senator Roblin.]

I do not know how anyone can think that the Government of Canada could give compensation based on the historical cost. I do not think the smallest municipality in this country could go to court for the purpose of expropriating anything on the basis of historical cost and expect to get away with it. They would have to deal with market cost. That is clear. It seems to me that if we acknowledge the principle that there should be compensation, then it should be done on the basis of market cost and we can dispose of the matter in a graceful and, I think, an appropriate manner. I would certainly recommend that as being something worthy of consideration.

I would like to place before the house, however, another factor connected with the 25 per cent crown share which has nothing to do with whether or not it is retroactive or whether it is fair; I simply want to deal with the facts of the matter.

The crown share is worth 25 per cent of some 400 million square miles of prospective land in Canada. Petro-Canada already have the rights to 18 per cent of it. If the Crown comes along and takes out another 25 per cent, and if you compensate for the Petro-Canada position, it means that the Crown ultimately winds up with a 38 per cent net interest in all the right and title to the Canada lands. We have heard that in the case of Hibernia, with double dipping, this goes to 43.75 per cent, but overall the amount is 38 per cent.

Just consider that for a minute, as a matter of policy, and as to where we are going. Thirty-eight per cent of all this enormous territory, which Senator McIlraith has told us is double the combined area of the provinces of Canada is now to be handled, as far as oil exploration and the like are concerned, by Petro-Canada, or some other crown corporation that will be set up for the purpose. If we are trying to develop the Canada lands, as we are supposed to be doing, in order to produce self-sufficiency by 1990, that is a pretty big mouthful to chew. I will not say anything about the expertise that will be required, but I would like to know where the money is to come from.

An enormous sum of money will be required if the Crown is to handle this matter. They will not take any foreign money, I suppose. That seems to be unfashionable these days. We may be able to get some in the domestic capital market, although there will be some competition there. What I think they are going to do—and when we discussed this with him, the minister, I think, almost admitted that this might be possible—is simply to tax for it. In other words, money will be raised through the country's tax system in order to finance this development.

That is one way of doing it, but one has to ask oneself whether that is the way one wants to go, or whether it would be better to keep off the backs of the taxpayer and let somebody else raise the money in a non-tax and non-governmental way. Speaking for myself, I think that the development of 38 per cent of these lands constitutes an enormous operation for a crown corporation, and will involve interventionism, if I may use that phrase, in a massive way in the nationalization of our oil industry.

That is something that must be weighed very carefully. Perhaps there is merit in it. I am not saying that it is entirely devoid of merit, but what I am saying is that it is a factor in the situation that we ought to consider when we are being asked to approve a policy of this nature.

I would like also to say a word or two about revenues. This subject is important, and I subscribe entirely to the view that it is the duty of the Crown, whether provincial or federal, to secure a reasonable maximum share of the revenues that are developed from these resources for public purposes. It must not go so far as to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs, when there is a private enterprise factor in the situation, but certainly windfall profits are not entirely the property of those who happen to be pumping oil at any given moment, in my view, and there is an obligation on the part of government to protect itself and the public revenues in such cases.

I have to say that as far as the Canada lands are concerned, that matter has been pretty adequately taken care of by means of the 10 per cent basic royalty, and the 40 per cent progressive incremental royalty which comes into effect after the operator is making 25 per cent on his capital. That, I believe, would be generally recognized as a reasonable protection against windfall profits. However, that has to do with the future.

I would like to lay before this chamber some facts about what the governments now take out of the oil business. The most convenient way to implement my limited mathematical approach is to use the price of a litre of gasoline in Toronto, which in October cost 38½ cents. Honourable senators, because it would have more meaning to me to make these calculations on the basis of a gallon, I did try to figure out that amount for one gallon of gasoline. Well, somebody else will have to do the mathematics. I will proceed to give the figures to you with relation to litres of gasoline.

I will outline for you the government take from the 38½ cents. The government of the province of Alberta—that greedy, grasping bunch out in the west who wear stetsons all the time—received 4.86 cents. The government of the province of Ontario, which has been keeping a sort of low profile in this business, receives 6.3 cents. The federal tax collector receives 12.38 cents. Therefore, out of the 38.5 cents, the total take from the three levels of government is 23.55 cents, and the feds are the big winners. That is the situation today. I do not know what the situation will be after Bill C-48 is in force and these extra revenues are received from the northern wells.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): All for the taxpayer.

Senator Roblin: That is pretty good—"All for the taxpayer." That leaves 14.95 cents for the rest. If I thought that the federal government was not putting all of this depleting wealth into the payment of interest on the national debt, along with a few other things, I might be a little more enthusiastic about the proposition. However, the federal government will spend its capital revenues for current expenses; that is clear enough.

Let me come back to this figure of 14.95 cents. That paid the filling station operator, the refiner, the man who laid the pipeline from Alberta and the fellow who dug the oil well in the first place. 14.95 cents is left for that entire group of people, and I remind honourable senators that that is the gross figure before any federal, provincial or municipal taxes have been levied. From these calculations one can get an idea of the apportionment of the value of a litre of gasoline in Toronto these days.

I think I can say without any hesitation that it appears as though the government is protecting the taxpayers' interest in a zealous way. I say that after the government gets through with the revenue it will receive from the Canada lands it will look even richer. Of course, the big question is: Will there be enough incentive left to keep the rest of the private enterprise people in the field active in what they have to do? That is the point I now wish to turn my attention to.

It is important to remember that self-sufficiency and the activities of the private enterprise sector are very closely related. One must ask oneself the fundamental question as to whether the national economic policy is an incentive or a disincentive for gas and oil exploration and productivity in Canada. That is a subject to which the members of the committee addressed themselves. In due course we will see what they have to say about it. I can tell honourable senators that there was plenty of evidence presented to show that there has been a dramatic slowdown in drilling and general activity in the western provinces, the effect of which has been felt in eastern Canada as well.

I will not give honourable senators the figures, but I will say that they cover every aspect of the economics of the matter in western Canada and were given by a number of groups whose motives are perhaps self-interested—why shouldn't they be? I think that the facts will stand up to independent analysis.

Honourable senators, the sedimentary basin in western Canada is much larger than the equivalent sedimentary basin in the United States, yet the drilling in the United States is of approximately 11 times the intensity of the drilling in Canada. That has to say something. Contained within the information that was given the committee by those who are connected with the drilling industry are the facts as they see them about the shift of activity from Canada to the United States. Honourable senators, we know all about that; we have heard about it; it is true. The question is: Will that activity return? That is a question which I, for one, am unable to answer. I can tell you, however, that, in the opinion of representatives of the industry, it is three or four times more attractive to drill for old oil in the United States than it is in Canada, and it is twice as attractive to drill for new oil in the United States as it is in Canada. All kinds of arguments can be made about those figures, but I believe that the thrust of the argument cannot be easily disputed.

Returning to the question of national self-sufficiency by 1990, we have to face the fact that it will not likely come from the Canada lands. There may be an awful lot of oil out there. We have the evidence that there is, but it will not be taken out in the time that we have specified. We will have to look to the western sedimentary basin in order to bridge the gap between now and 1990 if we expect to do something about the self-sufficiency problem in this country. It is for this reason that I have made a bore of myself to the members of the committee. I must say that I am grateful for their tolerance at my speaking as often as I have about the necessity of recovering the oil that we know is in the ground.

Honourable senators, a little while ago we heard from Senator McIlraith about the number of wells that would have to be drilled in Alberta to equal what we could accomplish in Hibernia, and perhaps that is so. However, we were informed by our own Senate committee, under Senator Hastings, that we know where there are 4 billion barrels of tertiary oil in Alberta. What is the significance of 4 billion barrels? Well, the entire primary reserve in Alberta today amounts to between 6 billion and 7 billion barrels. If we know where there are another 4 billion barrels of oil, why don't we get it up? Yes, it is difficult to get it up, but we know where it is. We have some technical idea about how to get at it, which is what I call tertiary recovery. Marginal wells are important, too. That subject has been discussed. The tertiary system, however, is an even more attractive target than is the system of marginal wells.

The minister has said to me, "Never mind. People who recover tertiary oil can get the new price for oil." That is fine, but they are not doing it. Why aren't they doing it? For much the same reason that the oil sands and the projects with respect to heavy oils and other non-conventional sources of oil have been put on the shelf for the moment, although I am positive that the government is working very hard to get them off the shelf. In spite of the new-oil price, the tax regime is getting in the way. I know that it is not only the feds in the tax system; I know that other governments are taking their share as well. The feds, however, must take the responsibility and the very important lead in this matter. It seems to me that the whole question of oil self-sufficiency has to be tackled by making the most of those assets we have in Alberta and Saskatchewan in the mega-projects, the oil sands, the heavy oil, and the tertiary recovery that I have mentioned, to say nothing of marginal wells. It is this aspect of our oil policy that distresses me the most. The plight of the smaller Canadian companies which are engaged in trying to find oil in the conventional areas is well known. We know about the cash-flow problems; we know about the efforts of the Province of Alberta to alleviate that. That provincial government has done something, and I want to make sure that it is fully recognized. The industry, however, still complains that it has a problem. It does not have the cash flow necessary to proceed to dig up the new oil that is so profitable. It does not have the cash flow necessary to dig the in-fill wells in the old territory where it can still raise quantities of oil. That is the problem.

Honourable senators, I believe that we have a very attractive set of incentives in the Canada lands petroleum incentive program, but in the provincial lands the combination of federal and provincial tax policies is making things very tough.

[Senator Roblin.]

It is wonderful what price will do. I was on the edge of the gas business at one time in my life when gas was selling at 14 cents per thousand cubic feet. We found that we didn't have enough gas; we were running out. It was a terrible situation—a crisis. By force of circumstances, the price started to rise from 14 cents per thousand cubic feet. I do not know the present price—perhaps the Minister of State for Economic Development can tell me—but it is many times that. What is the result? We have gas running out of our ears. The gas which was unprofitable to dig up before is now profitable indeed. The incentive was such that people went out and found new gas where it was said none existed. My honourable friend knows the structures in northwestern Alberta and in British Columbia about which I am speaking. Because the price was right, somebody went out and found the gas. I do not know whether the same thing can be done for oil. I do not think it will be quite as simple as that, but the fact remains that the price system is a remarkable incentive for getting things done. It seems to me we have lost sight of the importance of that to some extent. We have lost sight of the fact that we will need the western provincial oil to bridge the gap until the Canada lands come in later on.

• (2210)

Well, the troubles of the small, junior oil companies have certainly not been solved by the Alberta response which Senator Hayden mentioned, invaluable though it is. We will have to do more. When I asked the Minister of Energy in the committee what to do, he said, "Well, you are worried about the cash flow. They have always worked on their cash flow. They have always used the cash flow as a major source of financing for finding oil. Let them change their policy. Why don't they go and borrow it instead? They ought to raise money some other way." That is what he said.

I wonder if that is a realistic piece of advice to give the small oil industry at this particular time. Is there a market for equity in these small companies that is attractive to any of them these days? If there is, I don't know of it. The trouble is that their stock prices have been so low as to be shocking to anyone who might be interested in their activities.

Is it possible to borrow instead, if you cannot raise it in equity? It may be, but the cost of borrowing is horrendous.

What will we do with the man who says to these small companies, "Go and borrow the money to find oil," and whose colleague zaps them with the budget, with its strictures about what you can do with interest expense, and its strictures about what you can do with amalgamating companies and having flow-throughs and attracting capital gains tax, with the capital gains tax being recognized when these companies try to reorganize themselves? And the companies are reorganizing like mad these days, because of their capital problems and their cash flow problems. There has been a positive rash of mergers and takeovers, as everybody knows. I do not think that this advice given by the minister to change from the cash flow system to borrowing the money will get us anywhere. In fact, I would call it a sublime idiocy when it is linked with the measures in the budget.

I think the little Canadian oil companies have been shafted. They have been shafted by the energy policy and shafted by the budget as well. The big oil companies will probably get along okay, because their situation is different. They will do a Dome Canada, and God bless them. And we have Canterra in the news today, and God bless them. They are the big boys and they can look after themselves. But where and how is the small Canadian oil man going to get into that Bill C-48 country, that Canada lands country, and have his share in these mammoth oil developments, when he cannot even raise the cash flow to drill the little wells in his own part of the country?

There is a warning here for us. I do not want to beat this aspect of it to death, because I am no pessimist. I believe in the country and I believe we will find some way out of these problems. But I don't want them overlooked. I want it to be perfectly clear that, in my opinion, Bill C-48, whatever its virtues may be, will certainly not be enough to deal with the problems we face, if we are to meet those grand objectives of national policy I referred to in my opening remarks.

There is another aspect of Bill C-48 about which I will make some slight reference, and that is the structure it sets up, the machinery that it proposes to use in order to do all these great things.

Bill C-48 is dedicated entirely to ministerial discretion and bureaucratic control. It is interventionism on a scale we do not often see in this country. Ministerial discretion is enthroned in this piece of legislation. Now we are told that it is inevitable, that the facts of the matter make it hard to get away from. I have to admit, frankly, that in many pieces of modern legislation ministerial discretion, regulation and all that kind of thing are an important feature, and in some ways it is very difficult to get away from that. But I think in this bill a better system needs to be devised. And here I disagree with what Senator Hayden said when he spoke on this subject earlier tonight, because the committee was not unanimous on this point.

A better system has to be devised to bring in an element of due process, if I can import an American expression into this discussion, because we are moving more and more from the rule of law to the rule of men. In this bill we are making it possible for the bureaucrat to exercise subjectively—and possibly he cannot avoid it—a regime of grants, a regime of orders, a regime of instructions to selected recipients, and the need is there for a more open framework of public information that justice may be seen to be done, and the administration of it may be seen to be effective and efficient.

I do not think Bill C-48 provides that sort of structure at all. When you consider the problems that one little province can get into in connection with the Alberta Heritage Fund, which seems to me is far more open in its application than the provisions of this bill—and one can foresee right now the problems that will arise from that—what do you think you will have when this gets rolling? It is just going to make the Alberta Heritage Fund look like small potatoes. It will be a serious problem indeed, and we would be well advised to ask the government to devise a more open system of administration so that these enormous assets and these worldwide interests with which we are dealing here can be dealt with in a way that mitigates what may be an inevitable degree of ministerial and bureaucratic discretion by opening it up to public examination. I must frankly say that I do not like it the way it is now in the bill.

I have spoken long enough, honourable senators. You will be pleased to know that I shall not detain you much longer. I will just refer to the main points that I have found bothersome in this particular bill.

In my opinion, the retroactive features should definitely be changed. The aspect of ministerial discretion and bureaucratic administration should be opened up in some way so that it is more open to public view or the public light. I think that having the 38 per cent of the crown lands will impose a tremendous burden on somebody, if we do not spin it off somehow to other people in the industry. I think the federal budgetary impact, particularly on the small oil companies of this country, is unfortunate, and that it goes to defeat the purposes of self-sufficiency that we are working for. The decline of the industry in the western provinces is a fact which needs to be addressed. Something has to be done to bring them back. I think the problems of activating the tar sands and heavy oil, the tertiary recovery systems, and all of those other matters I have mentioned are, as far as I know, still unsolved. I suggest it is imperative that we do something to make sure they do contribute to national self-sufficiency.

The time at which those great projects will deliver recedes, like a mirage, into the future forever. Have we not in this house heard forecasts of when they were coming into force? Have we not heard that the tar sands, the heavy oil and all that sort of thing are just around the corner in 1982 or 1983? But every month that goes by pushes them back, and every month that goes by, with the inflationary impact and the impact of high interest rates, makes them more difficult to finance and makes the tax adjustments of the government more difficult. The need for action is now. Procrastination, just letting these things go, is not helpful in our situation.

I think the real test of Bill C-48—and I think it may pass it—and the real test of the national energy policy—and I do not think it will pass it—is whether in their respective applications they will put the Canadian oil business back into high gear, developing Canadian and petroleum resources on a system of economic safeguards that leads to self-sufficiency in 1990.

I beg to doubt that the arrangements we have in place for our national energy policy at the present time will support an optimistic assessment of the possibilities of achieving these goals. Consequently, I do not intend to vote for this bill.

Senator Frith: You spoke of retroactivity, ministerial discretion and the bureaucracy, and your fourth point was the budgetary impact. What was the third point in your summary at the end?

Senator Roblin: I had a whole bunch of them. I would have to check my notes.

Senator Frith: That is all right. I will read it in the debates.

● (2220)

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I hesitate to speak extemporaneously on a measure as important and as complicated as Bill C-48. In fact, I hesitate to speak at all at this late hour and having regard to the time restraints under which we are conducting this debate, but I would like to draw attention to a few thoughts on what I regard as one of the most important pieces of legislation we have been called upon to deal with in this house. Although, as has been stated again tonight, one of the declared objectives of this legislation as an integral part of the National Energy Program is that this country might attain self-sufficiency in petroleum resources by the end of this decade, we are all well aware that if self-sufficiency is to be attained, it will be due primarily to two groups that must be involved.

One group is the people in the petroleum industry who have the experience, expertise and facilities to do the actual work of exploration and development. The other group is the people who make up the investment community, from which capital must be drawn in vast quantities if we are to attain our goal. We can pass all the legislation we like, but unless there is a positive response from those two groups we are only fooling ourselves if we think that this legislation is a step towards energy self-sufficiency in this country.

It must be of deep concern to members of both houses of Parliament that the response to this legislation and, for that matter, the response in general to the National Energy Policy by the two groups to which I have referred, has been negative rather than positive. One could go through this legislation and catalogue a whole list of features which call for that negative response, from both the petroleum industry and the investment community. However, I shall not abuse the privilege of speaking here tonight by going into those details.

I would like to touch on one particular point to which both Senator Hayden and Senator Roblin have referred, and which was referred to so frequently by the various groups appearing before the Senate committee. It, more than any other feature in this legislation, is objectionable to both the investment community and the petroleum industry and, therefore, it will be the most detrimental of all the features insofar as attaining the goal we desire is concerned. I refer to the back-in provision for Petro-Canada with respect to the 25 per cent which has been referred to as the crown share. Senator Hayden pointed out in his report that when this objection was raised while the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was before the committee and, as well, while the representatives of Petro-Canada were before the committee, the response was that this 25 per cent back-in is really the same as a royalty or another form of taxation.

I suggest, honourable senators, that that is a fallacy, and that it is something which is simply not accepted and will not be accepted by either the developers or the investment community. The history of oil royalties in this country is complicated, but I draw your attention to one thing that has happened in that field. For many years in the early development of petroleum resources, royalties were simply a retention by the Crown of a portion of the production, and the Crown had the right to take the royalty either in kind or in cash. The royalty was taken in money because that was the most convenient way. However, the fact that it was understood to be a retention of a proportion of the production was very significant. It was the reason, I submit, why the federal government permitted, up until a few years ago, oil companies to deduct that royalty before they computed their income for federal taxation purposes, because the companies never had it. It was something that the Crown owned and retained as it was produced and, therefore, it was not treated the same as other income.

When the developments in the Middle East caused oil prices to skyrocket, many new and complicated features were added to the royalty programs, both provincially and federally. Then we had, not only royalties as a percentage of production, but as a percentage of the price above a certain figure, in order to recoup what amounted to an excess profit. Royalties ceased to be the simple retention of a portion of the product that was owned by the Crown, and became almost another form of taxation. Perhaps the clearest evidence of this fact was the decree by the federal government that the royalties could no longer be deducted from revenue before computing income for tax purposes.

Honourable senators will recall the hassle we went through a number of years ago when this change in federal policy was made. In fairness to the federal government, it has to be said that they were on pretty sound ground in what they did because these royalties had become a new form of taxation, but they still retained the one exclusive characteristic. It was something that was paid by the producer only after there was production and that, of course, is one of the points on which royalties are fundamentally different from this 25 per cent back-in by Petro-Canada, because that back-in takes place before the development has gone forward, before there has been any production.

This back-in feature puts an oil company in the position, after spending money on exploration and generating interest in an area which looks as though it may have some potential for production, of giving to Petro-Canada 25 per cent of the land which has become valuable because of the exploratory work which has been carried on. It is true that there is some compensation. Certainly, the argument has been advanced here, and it was advanced over and over again before the committee, that the compensation is completely unrealistic and that it is not the kind of compensation that will attract capital into that particular field.

Furthermore, this back-in by Petro-Canada differs from royalties in that royalties can be adjusted from time to time. We heard tonight, for example, how some provincial royalties were recently adjusted to stimulate further development. There is a flexibility in adjusting royalties, but once the Crown takes over 25 per cent of the territory in which oil is a potential, it is once and for all. No longer is there any room for adjustment and flexibility, as in the case of royalties or taxation.

[Senator Roblin.]

I emphasize this point, honourable senators, because, while there are many things in this legislation that are negative as far as encouraging investment, exploration and development are concerned, this is one feature that was emphasized more than any other in the committee hearings. I think it would be correct to say that the aspect of this legislation that was emphasized the most was the retroactive aspect. I think that is understandable. The Government of Canada certainly has a right to a 25 per cent share of any potential area of development because it is the owner. If the government wants that 25 per cent share, then let it take it before the company and the investors have spent money on exploration work up to the point where the back-in takes place, because at least then the company has the opportunity to say, "Well, if this proves to be a potentially productive field, we shall have to surrender 25 per cent to the Crown." In this way the company makes its decision with that knowledge, and if it decides to go ahead in any event, then that is fine. Such a situation is very different from the situation where the company, having gone ahead and spent its money on the assumption that it would have 100 per cent of the land to develop, later finds that Petro-Canada is backing in and picking up 25 per cent. This kind of thinking is behind what Senator Hayden said in reporting on the findings of the committee, and is behind what Senator Roblin said this evening. If we do not change anything else in this bill, for the sake of Canada's hope of energy self-sufficiency let us at least wipe out that retroactive feature, for it represents not only government intervention but government intervention at its worst. It is retroactive to begin with and, on top of that, it puts the government physically into the field of oil development. No matter what your philosophy may be regarding the merits of the public versus the private sector being involved in such development, no one can deny that, with respect to the impact on developers and the investment community, that type of provision is negative and will continue to be negative and will seriously jeopardize our chances of getting the amount of capital we need, if we are to have any hope of having energy self-sufficiency.

Honourable senators, I would draw your attention to one other factor. I find inconsistent the argument that the proposed back-in of 25 per cent as a crown share is justifiable, among other things in this legislation and in the National Energy Program. To say that it is justifiable because, after all, the companies did not own this land, it belonged to the Crown and all we are doing is picking up something that already belonged to us is inconsistent. In the arguments that have been advanced ever since this National Energy Program was mounted, over and over again we have heard emphasis placed on the fact that so much of Canada's petroleum industry is foreign-owned and that we should get greater Canadian ownership. I am all in favour of greater Canadian ownership, and I want that clearly understood. I disagree completely with the method that is being adopted to acquire that Canadian ownership, but I certainly believe in maximum Canadian ownership.

The inconsistency comes in because the Government of Canada cannot say, on the one hand, that our petroleum industry is owned by foreign companies and then, on the other hand, say that we have a right to back in with this 25 per cent feature, because the companies do not own anything anyway; that it belongs to us and we are simply picking up something that we already own. They say that the companies only have a lease, and that they are simply tenants on our land. Honourable senators, that last proposition is the correct one.

This is what makes a lie of the propaganda that has gone around this country for years—we certainly lived with it for years in Alberta—that foreign companies own the oil resources of this country. They do not. Foreign owners own and control the companies that develop the oil, but the policies that have been consistently followed by the federal government in Canada for many years—and ever since they had control as far as the western provinces are concerned—have always been to retain the ownership in the Crown on behalf of the people of the country or the province. All the development companies have ever had is a lease under which they are permitted to carry on development under the terms and conditions laid down by the government representing the people of the country.

I am trying to point out the fundamental difference between ownership of the companies that do the developing—that is, foreign-owned to a large extent—and ownership of the resources which, in this country, has remained with the people of the country. There has been some alienation of mineral rights but, in total, I think 85 per cent still remains in the name of the Crown. Surely, if we own the resources and retain the ownership, it puts an altogether different light on this question of so-called "foreign ownership." It is not foreign ownership of our resources; it is simply foreign ownership of the company that happens to be doing the developing, but it does the developing under the terms that we lay down in our leases, and those terms are subject to revision at any time the government feels that it is necessary, in the public interest, to make those revisions.

Honourable senators, if Canadians realized that situation, they would have an entirely different attitude towards and outlook on a National Energy Program which claims it is going to recover the ownership of Canada's oil industry for the people of Canada. They have not lost it, so let us at least be truthful in what we hold out to be the facts.

I would mention one other matter briefly, and Senator Roblin touched on this very effectively. In the forecasts that are being made concerning the oil that will, hopefully, come from the Canada lands in the north and offshore—and certainly we hope they will be more productive than we have reason to believe they will be now—it is unfortunate that little or no attention is being paid by the federal government in estimating those discoveries. A shift of capital is taking place from the already established oil fields of the country to these Canada lands. In other words, were it not for that shift, we would have precisely what Senator Roblin spoke of tonight, a substantial increase in oil production in this country from the known sources of supply on provincial lands. You would certainly have increased production from the tar sands and from the heavy oil development out in Cold Lake in western Canada. Millions of dollars of capital are being shifted from those areas to the Canada lands because there are more attractive inducements under national legislation and the National Energy Program which attract capital to those areas. If we are to have less production from the known areas of supply because we have shifted the available capital to the Canada lands, in aggregate we have not increased our total oil supply as much as otherwise would have been the case.

It is my own conviction—and nobody hopes more than I do that I am wrong—that under this program it is completely unrealistic to think that this country is going to be oil self-sufficient by the end of this decade. I think we are deceiving the Canadian people when we claim that this kind of legislation is going to bring about that result. It will help, but it is not sufficient, simply by diverting development to Canada lands, to think that that is going to produce energy self-sufficiency in 10 years.

I find it ironic, as I think Senator Roblin said tonight, when we know there are millions of barrels of oil left in the ground in the areas that are far easier to develop than these offshore and Arctic regions, that that development is dragging along or is even being retarded because drilling rigs and capital are going to the United States where the inducement is far greater than it is here. The remainder is going to the Canada lands, the Beaufort Sea, off the Atlantic coast, or into the Arctic. Surely that is not very logical.

Honourable senators, when this bill goes to committee, I hope that we can agree on a few basic amendments that would eliminate, at least, the most objectionable features, so that we will have legislation under which there is some reasonable way of approaching closer to energy self-sufficiency than is going to be possible under this kind of legislation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: A few moments ago, Senator Manning said that there had been some alienation but that he thought we still owned about 85 per cent. When he referred to "we," was he referring to the Province of Alberta or to Canada as a whole?

Senator Manning: That figure is approximately correct in relation to Alberta. However, I do not have the actual figures for Canada, but I would think it would not be very different because Canada owns all the oil offshore and in the Arctic, unless Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland own some of it.

● (2240)

The major oil resources that were alienated to private interests were those which were, in the early days, alienated to the CPR and other groups of that kind. I am not speaking critically of those deals, but there was a lot that was put into the hands of investor-owned companies at that time.

[Senator Manning.]

As far as Alberta oil is concerned, as you know, the federal government administered the natural resources of Alberta for 30 years after Alberta became a province, and during that time about 15 per cent of those resources were transferred, sold or disposed of to companies or private interests. Apart from that, they are still retained in that case by the province. As far as the Canada lands are concerned, Canada still owns all of them.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have no more desire to speak at this time of night that you have to listen to me, but the reply which the sponsor of the bill was able to give me with reference to the questions I asked as to whether there was any contemplation that this bill might affect the claims to ownership of oil and gas off the Atlantic coast, and on Sable Island, has led me to feel that I cannot sit quietly by and let this bill go to committee without saying something about it on behalf of Nova Scotia.

It seems to me that the definition of Canada lands, as it appears in the second subparagraph in the definition clause of the bill, probably means that Canada lands are those lands that are not subject to the right of some province to exploit them. I had thought that the sponsor would be able to give me such an assurance, and then I could quite safely, or at least I thought I could quite safely, let the bill pass knowing or believing that it would not affect any claims of ownership that there may be off the Atlantic coast, or any other coast, for that matter. In view of the answer given me by the sponsor of the bill, I have some doubts. I thought that perhaps my interpretation of the definition clause was a reasonable one. I had better back up and say that over again.

I thought that my feeling as to the proper interpretation of that definition clause would not affect the ownership or the claims of Nova Scotia or any other Atlantic province, but since the sponsor of the bill has not been able to give me that assurance I am left in some doubt, because I have discovered around here, as I suppose I should have discovered elsewhere, that my interpretation of a statute is not always happily concurred in by those who may have the responsibility for enforcing it. So, it seems to me that if this bill is to be contemplated in any way by those who drafted it or put it forward as affecting the ownership of offshore oil or gas, or Sable Island oil or gas, then it is a sad thing indeed, and even sadder than has been described by Senator Roblin and Senator Manning.

I am not sure whether the sponsor of the bill meant to raise that doubt in my mind, and perhaps in other senators' minds, by the answer he gave. If he did not mean to raise that doubt, perhaps he will say so when he closes the debate. If there is still some doubt about that, then I think I will find it impossible, for that reason if no other, to support the bill. Of course, there are many other reasons for my not supporting it, and they have been eloquently put by Senator Roblin and Senator Manning. Perhaps the sponsor would keep that problem in mind when he closes the debate.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McIlraith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I shall be very quick in giving Senator Smith the assurance that I did not, in any way, want to raise a doubt on that point. Rather, it was a case of the bill being 86 clauses in length, some of which are long and complicated, and knowing that on a previous occasion Senator Smith raised a very interesting legal point about the right of Nova Scotia to certain offshore resources, and knowing something of the difference in the rights claimed by different provinces, I just did not think it proper for me to give a definitive answer to his question. It certainly was not because of any desire to raise any doubt on the question in his mind. It was rather to let him obtain a more accurate and precise answer from the minister.

I should perhaps indicate that it is my intention, as honourable senators may have surmised, that if and when the bill receives second reading, to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The minister will be available tomorrow morning to answer the question. I thought it much better to have it answered by him in case I missed something. Frankly, I did not think about the point until the honourable senator asked the question.

As to the remarks of Senator Roblin and Senator Manning, I think that they quite properly raised many points for debate on the whole National Energy Program, as well as the provisions of Bill C-48, I hope that my desire, bearing in mind the late hour, not to deal with those parts that are extraneous to Bill C-48 will not be taken as an indication of any lack of appreciation of the importance of the questions they raised concerning the National Energy Program.

I am very hopeful that these agreements achieved with the governments of the western provinces in recent months, will be joined by energy agreements with the other coastal provinces. I hope that some of those agreements will be forthcoming soon. I know that they are under active negotiation. Perhaps there is no point in my saying more on that.

● (2250)

As to the other points raised, there is something that was not mentioned by either of the speakers to whom I have just referred, Senator Roblin and Senator Manning. Under many of the existing exploration permits granted under the earlier regulations, a checkerboard land system required those persons seeking an exploration permit to return certain pre-determined lands to the Crown. That has been replaced by something that I think the industry regards as a better system—certainly it would appear to be—that is, a superior method of negotiating the area of land on which the discoveries have been made to provide for the retention of the whole of them by the producing company. That is a significant factor. There are other things about the program which perhaps honourable senators would not wish me to develop this evening, but I am sure these questions can be pursued in committee when the minister is present.

Honourable senators, there is nothing more that I can usefully add.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Everett, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riley, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1982.—(Honourable Senator Everett).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Order No. 6 is the motion of Senator Everett for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (C). We have adopted the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (D), but we have not adopted the report on supplementary estimates (C).

I am authorized by Senator Everett to move the adoption of that report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Lewis and Bosa be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Barrow and Lang on this list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 16, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Royal Commission on Conditions of Foreign Service (Commissioner, Pamela A. McDougall), dated October 21, 1981.

Report on the National Testing Survey to the Board of Review by the Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation Information and Coordination Centre, dated December 14, 1981.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

TENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the tenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", 3490.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, on behalf of the co-chairman, Senator Murray, I have the honour to present the second report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "B", p. 3491.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has a report for us today, but since he does not seem to be with us at this moment I point out that it may be necessary to ask that we revert to Reports of Committees later if he does wish to present that report today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with respect to the order of the house, may I ask what happened to the permission granted yesterday with regard to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs?

It was my understanding that two committees would not meet at the same time if the house was also sitting.

Senator Frith: I thank the Honourable Senator Roblin for raising that point. When Senator van Roggen consulted with me and with Senator Roblin about sitting this afternoon while the Senate was sitting, we both pointed out to him that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce may want to sit and that we would not wish to have two committees sitting while the Senate is sitting. My understanding was that Senator van Roggen agreed that, in the event that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee did wish to sit this afternoon, he would withdraw and would not ask that his committee sit while the Senate is sitting this afternoon.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE BUDGET

MODIFICATION OF PROVISIONS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Officials of the Department of Finance have confirmed the minister's hints of last week that budget changes will be made concerning interest deductibility and capital reserves, and that possibly there will be other changes which I suppose follow upon those made with respect to MURBs and the special concessions to Dome Petroleum. I should like to ask the honourable senator whether the millions of holders of life insurance policies across Canada are to assume that they have lost out on this re-evaluation. Does the government intend to remain firm with regard to its tax changes which penalize insurance policy holders who have or would acquire equity?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since the presentation of the budget, a number of submissions have been made by various individuals and organizations to the Minister of Finance with respect to possible modification of the budget. The Minister of Finance was sincere in the statement he made. It can be expected that that promise will be kept. The promise of clarification and modification of the budget proposals will be met very shortly.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I am sincere when I say that I appreciate what has been done in other areas. It has been reported that certain government officials have indicated that people requiring life insurance could acquire it by means of term insurance, indicating that it was cheaper and that there would be no question of tax on accrued interest. I am wondering if this leaves life insurance holders out of the re-evaluation. If so, is the government then bent on this program which would force people to buy term insurance?

Senator Perrault: I can assure the honourable senator that the position of people faced with decisions of that kind has been evaluated very carefully by the Minister of Finance. Of course, it would be improper for me to announce any of the details of any of the proposed modifications or changes. I want to provide the assurance, however, that the minister will speak out very shortly, certainly before the end of the year.

Hon. Peter Bosa: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated that the Minister of Finance will make modifications in relation to this particular matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not making that statement with respect to any particular matter. I do say, because of the necessary confidentiality associated with any budget announcement or the preparation of any budget, that it is not appropriate for me to detail in any way possible changes in any direction, but I wish to indicate that the Minister of Finance is very sensitive to the submissions which have been made to him on this and other points.

● (1410)

Senator Bosa: I have one further supplementary question. While I appreciate that the leader is not in a position to make any specific references to possible changes in this area, could he impress upon the minister that the announcement that permanent life insurance will be taxed in the manner in which he outlined in his budget has thrown the industry into a great deal of confusion? Consequently, the sooner the matter is cleared up, the sooner some confidence can be restored in that particular sector of the economy.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure the Minister of Finance will read with avid interest the comments of honourable senators when they appear in Debates of the Senate.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary question along the same lines. In view of the fact that so many different organizations and individuals in Canada have expressed concern over various facets of the budget, and bearing in mind, as the Leader of the Government has indicated, that the Minister of Finance is flexible and is considering changes to, or modification of, the budget, would the government consider holding committee hearings so that various groups could describe the various problems they have with the present budget?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the suggestion will certainly be made known to the Minister of Finance. Perhaps it is worth reminding honourable senators, however, that the budget process is rarely pacific. Usually, there is a good deal of controversy attached to the presentation of any budget. I recall that during the months of the last Conservative government the Minister of Finance—as seems to be inevitable in cases of ministers of finance—was surrounded by controversy when he presented his budget proposals.

The government is open to suggestions on ways in which this budget may be improved.

Senator Doody: Since the leader has raised the subject—and I certainly would not have done so—can he say whether the government would consider the same course of action the previous Minister of Finance took and call an election?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That was not the reason.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): He did not call the general election, did he? What was the subject of the verb “call”?

Senator Perrault: As Senator Olson reminds me, the basic problem at that time was an inability to count the members in the house on that eventful evening. There was never any indication that the Minister of Finance in the previous government was avidly seeking an election.

Senator Doody: I can only say that the present Minister of Finance has no problem counting, although I do not envy him all the problems he has to count at this particular point in time.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate, when he is discussing these problems, to convey to the Minister of Finance that the cost of long-term term insurance in Canada is just about the same as the cost of regular life on whole life insurance. Term insurance costs about the same, but, at the same time, it does not attract any equity.

Will the Leader of the Government undertake to raise that point with the Minister of Finance?

Senator Perrault: Indeed, that point will be raised with the Minister of Finance at the same time as I convey to him our best Christmas wishes.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

PROBABLE DATE OF PROCLAMATION OF BILL C-60

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. When does the minister expect Bill C-60 to be proclaimed with the regulations that are being drawn up? The minister, as honourable senators may be aware, was the original architect of this bill in this house. It must be of great interest to him, as it is to many of us.

● (1415)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no doubt it will take several weeks to work out the regulations and the administrative capability. Of course, the administration of the new rules for pipeline easement acquisition will be the responsibility of the National Energy Board. I cannot say decisively, but I expect that it will take at least two or three months to put the necessary guidelines in place, and then the legislation will be proclaimed.

[Senator Perrault.]

I wonder, honourable senators, if I may take a moment to say one or two things about Bill C-60. I am sure that many honourable senators will recall that it was a committee of this chamber which initially took on the responsibility of defining the problem, designing a bill and holding hearings throughout the country. Finally, approximately three years from the beginning, the bill, with all the principal concerns which prompted it extant, has passed through all stages of the legislative process. I would like to pay particular tribute to the members of the committee who worked long hours to hold the hearings, to consider what ought to be done and then to write the bill.

As honourable senators will recall, the original bill was introduced in this house and passed through all three stages in 1979. However, as a result of objections due to the public expense involved, the Speaker of the day, Mr. Jerome, indicated that before ruling on whether or not a bill of this type originating in the Senate was acceptable, he would want to research the matter. Unfortunately, Parliament was dissolved before the ruling came down.

In the case of the present bill, it originated in the House of Commons, thereby overcoming all the problems faced previously. Nevertheless, the present bill retained much of the Senate bill in all the forms in which it was put forward. After examining the present bill, the committee suggested six amendments to improve it still further, and those amendments have now been accepted by the House of Commons. Once the bill has been proclaimed and the administrative capability is in place, I am sure the members of the committee will be able to consider that they have served Canada well.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ISRAEL—ANNEXATION OF GOLAN HEIGHTS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns the recent move by the State of Israel to annex the Golan Heights. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that Canada strongly opposes this measure which is, of course, contrary to international law and to the United Nations Security Council resolution 242.

Can the minister advise whether, in fact, the Canadian government's attitude towards this move by Israel has been conveyed to the Israeli ambassador resident in Ottawa, and can he indicate what is the attitude of the Canadian government in reference to contemplated and now discussed United Nations moves in response to this quite serious threat to peace?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, shortly before 2 o'clock this afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs sent me a message dealing with this subject. In the message he indicated that his department has already informed the Israeli ambassador of the strong Canadian views regarding Israel's decision to extend its law, jurisdiction and administration to the Golan Heights. Mr.

MacGuigan indicated that he would be communicating further with the Government of Israel in due course.

The minister indicated that since the Israeli decision was taken there has been a plenary vote in the United Nations General Assembly on a resolution condemning Israeli measures and actions taken, or to be taken, to alter the legal status of the Golan Heights, and that Canada had switched from an earlier abstention in committee to a vote in favour of the resolution because of the changed circumstances. According to the minister, the General Assembly is expected to have before it two more resolutions that will touch on the situation in the Golan Heights, and the Security Council is also expected to have a resolution on the matter before it.

ENERGY

LOCATION OF PROPOSED LIQUID NATURAL GAS TERMINAL IN EASTERN CANADA—SIGNIFICANCE OF DREE GRANT

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. In view of the grant to the city of Rivière-du-Loup for studies of the proposed Gros-Cacouna liquid natural gas project, has it been determined that that, in fact, is where the proposed terminal is to be located?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice in order to provide a more detailed answer.

However, I believe that a decision has not yet been made, and studies to assess the economic feasibility, the physical requirements, and other such things are required. This does not mean that a decision has been made that the terminal will be located there. However, I will check my information.

Senator Smith: Perhaps the minister, at the same time, would check whether a similar grant has been made to Nova Scotia, or any municipal area therein, for studies with reference to a terminal for the same purpose on the Strait of Canso.

Senator Olson: I will check into that matter also, but it may not be a question of further studies needing to be done. It may be that the technical details concerning the physical situation and feasibility have already been put together. However, I will check that that is, in fact, the case.

Senator Smith: I was going to ask some further questions, but perhaps I would be better advised to wait until I receive answers to these questions.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Would the Minister of State for Economic Development advise me whether the terminal at Gros-Cacouna, if, in fact, it is to be built, will be a federal government project, or whether there will be some involvement by the Province of Quebec? Are both governments working towards a possible development at Gros-Cacouna?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice. I believe it is slightly different from the question asked by Senator Smith, which related to the identification of some grant described in the estimates.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—IMPLICATIONS OF IMPOSITION OF MARTIAL LAW

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared this afternoon to give us an up-to-date report on the serious situation in Poland after the imposition of martial law, including the fate of the 250 or more Canadian diplomats, students, workers and visitors in Poland? Can he also tell us the results of the meeting last night between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Polish Ambassador, and the results of any representations concerning further humanitarian assistance to Poland? Are there any further developments regarding the regulations governing Polish refugees and exiles who are seeking to come to Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a number of communications have been received on this subject, the most recent being a message from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in which he reports:

I raised the question of the serious problems caused by our inability to communicate with our Embassy in Warsaw with the Polish Ambassador when I received him yesterday and requested, in the strongest possible terms, the restoration of our communications facilities. The Polish Ambassador informed me that he had referred this question to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Warsaw, as a result of the concern voiced in this House on Monday.

I have received a further report about the situation in Poland and the safety of Canadians in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs reports as follows:

We are continuing to monitor the situation in Poland carefully and have no indication that Canadians in Poland are in immediate danger. We have received recent reports from our Embassy in Warsaw informing us that Canadians and other foreigners in Poland do not appear to be encountering any serious difficulties.

Communications, both within Poland and externally, however, remain extremely difficult. In my meeting with the Polish Ambassador yesterday I expressed our concern about Canadians in Poland and the serious problems posed by our inability to get in touch with them. I requested, in the strongest possible terms, the immediate restoration of communications facilities with our Embassy in Warsaw.

• (1425)

The minister also states, with regard to refugees:

It would be premature to announce any new measures at this time. We are deeply concerned regarding the clamp-down on civil liberties in Poland by the Polish authorities and Canadian officials are monitoring developments in conjunction with the Department of External Affairs. Until the situation clarifies we will not be in a position to determine what action might be warranted. In the interim, the measures announced on October 27 and December 2, remain in force. This will allow Polish-Canadians to sponsor their relatives to resettlement in Canada. Polish nationals without relatives in Canada can receive Minister's Permits which will allow them to remain in Canada for one year.

With regard to the debt to Canadian banks from Poland, the minister states:

Some Canadian banks have made loans in recent years to Poland. As a result of the difficulties that Poland has encountered in meeting its obligations to repay, these banks are participating along with other international banks in negotiations with Poland to reschedule repayments for 1981. It is my understanding that these negotiations have not yet been completed, and at this stage it is not clear what the outcome will be.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the minister a supplementary question? Is it correct that the debt of Poland to the Canadian banks is in the order of $400 million?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. I do not have the specific information in my file on Poland at the present time.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not wish to have my next remark linked with what I have just said because it might be misconstrued, but, on an independent basis, has the government given any consideration to any change in the economic relations between this country and the Government of Poland?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, to quote the minister again:

Canada continues to be concerned about the plight of the Polish people and the hardships with which they must cope. We are watching the situation in Poland closely and will be examining our substantial economic relationship with that country in light of the current developments.

Therefore, no specific policy has yet been evolved in that area.

With regard to the decision of the United States to suspend food assistance, the minister states:

At the current time Canada does not propose to take any particular economic measures in response to developments in Poland, but we will continue to monitor the situation closely in consultation with our allies.

On October 29, Canada announced that it would provide an additional $500 million in credit guarantees in order to permit Poland to continue to import the 1.0 to 1.5 million tonnes of grain provided for in our bilateral grain agreement which expires in December, 1982. Food credits announced to date this year by the U.S.A. did not extend beyond the end of October. We are aware that they have now decided not to approve further food shipments until they have had an opportunity to assess the situation in Poland. We understand that they will continue to allow private food aid shipments and possibly deliveries under PL 480 Title II.

Canada is therefore, in the position of already having made contractual commitments and it will continue to fulfil them. Canadian grain shipments to Poland in 1981 are expected to total roughly 1.3 million tonnes. Canadian grain shipments make up some 20 per cent of Poland's food import requirements and constitute a significant contribution to the food needs of the Polish people.

Honourable senators, I have read directly from messages I have received from the Secretary of State for External Affairs today and on Monday and Tuesday of this week.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—INCREASE IN CASH ADVANCES

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee, in a press release dated October 8, 1981, has asked that the cash advances be increased from $15,000 to $50,000. Could the minister advise us as to the status of the request and whether or not it will be granted by the government? There is a lot of concern about this particular matter out west.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, it is a fact that the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee adopted the suggestion he has put forward, namely, that cash advances would be increased by a very substantial amount. I am receiving letters from producers in western Canada and some of the farm organizations. It has been some time since cash advances have been increased and, of course, since that time costs have been going up, and we are looking at the whole question of cash advances and whether or not a recommendation can be made to have them adjusted upwards. Sales, deliveries and the export of grain have been good this year, but nonetheless there has been an increased demand for cash advances. Part of that increase in demand no doubt stems from the fact that there are high interest rates and increasing costs, and with the increase in costs the demand for cash advances has obviously increased.

● (1430)

Honourable senators may be aware that to increase cash advances would require an amendment to the act. With the current monetary restraints, there may be some hesitancy in coming forward with legislation at this time to provide an increase.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The answer is "no".

Senator Argue: Nevertheless, I agree that an increase in the maximum is appropriate. We are considering the most expeditious manner of achieving an increase in cash advance legislation. I believe the legislation that we have on our books is good legislation. It is a fact that the $15,000 will not purchase as much as it would have done when it was first provided, and in my view the case that has been presented to us for an increase requires study and recommendation; and I would hope for and expect action.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I am sure that if the minister were to bring before the Senate appropriate legislation to provide this sort of money for producers, he would have no problem in having it passed within half a day. I would suggest to the minister that he should try it.

As a supplementary, could consideration be given to this problem within a reasonable time, so that we can answer those who are concerned and who are writing to us on this matter at the present time? I note that the minister said that he would try to do something as quickly as possible. It is a rather urgent matter for the producers of western Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, there is no doubt that there is some demand today for an increase in cash advances that would be effective right now; but with the large quotas that are in place, and the delivery opportunities that exist, I believe the main concern connected with the recommendations is that there should be action taken to come into force on August 1 next year. The cash advances are based on delivery opportunities, and if a farmer has already delivered a substantial portion of his grain, and there are quotas available, he is not eligible to receive cash on grain that has already been sold or on grain for which there is currently a delivery opportunity. So while the requests are coming in, the main thrust of them is to change the legislation to make it effective on August 1 next year. That gives us some time, and we do need some time.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It will be worse.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It means that the minister has done such a good job that it is not as pressing as it was.

THE BUDGET

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in his capacity as a CCF expert on agriculture.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): As what?

Senator Phillips: As a CCF expert on agriculture. I used to listen to the minister expound on that in the other place. I would like to believe that he had really forgotten that, but it really does not matter; he is at home in either party.

My question is based on a statement issued by the Director of the Ontario branch of the Farm Credit Corporation, in which he said that in the first month following the budget three farmers from across Canada had received assistance under the budget for a total of $50,000. Does the minister or the government have any kind of alternative plan to assist more than three farmers per month?

• (1435)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not know anything about that report, and I certainly know nothing about its accuracy. Obviously, the Farm Credit Corporation does not come under my department. I do know that provision has been made in the budget for $50 million to be made available to the Farm Credit Corporation for certain actions to help farmers in the category which concerns the honourable senator. I will be happy to make inquiries to find out the accuracy or otherwise of the statement that was made. If it is the wish of the honourable senator, I shall bring to the Senate any information that I am able to obtain.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, I hope the minister is not suggesting that my information is not accurate, because I would remind him that it was given by the director of the Ontario branch of the Farm Credit Corporation, which is a federal corporation. I am sure the minister is familiar with it.

The official went on to say that the difficulty exists because farmers cannot apply for the government assistance provided in the budget unless they have first been refused a small business development bond. I am sure the minister has read the budget and is familiar with the changes made in the small business development bond, and with the fact that the banks and the Minister of Finance recently held a meeting in an effort to solve the problem.

Knowing the minister's keen interest in farmers, could he tell us what has resulted from that meeting and what solutions have been arrived at to break the impasse between the Minister of Finance and the banks resulting from the budget?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, as I have already indicated, I will take the question as notice.

Senator Phillips: Is the minister telling me that he is not familiar with the fact that there has been a meeting between the Minister of Finance and the banks, and that he is not familiar with the solutions arrived at?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I am not familiar with all of the things to which the honourable senator referred. I have indicated that I will take the question as notice, and I will try to bring back a reply that is accurate. I do not believe that any other course would be helpful.

Senator Phillips: I accept the offer and I thank the minister.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT TO SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, who, I see, has left the chamber; but I would be delighted to ask either Senator Petten or the deputy leader.

Hon. William J. Petten: I would appreciate it if it were put to the deputy leader.

Senator Nurgitz: I thought if I put the question to Senator Petten I might then get an answer. However, I will direct my question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. I assume it will be taken as notice.

An article entitled "Blood Money" appeared this past week-end in Today magazine which appears in many daily newspapers. The article dealt with the question of Canada's selling, under the guise of several things, military vehicles to South Africa. I wanted the Leader of the Government to confirm that. I am sure that the deputy leader will take the question as notice.

The article went on to establish that the rules for the export of military products and components were lax. For example, tracks used on tanks are sold as tracks, yet they can be used only for tanks.

● (1440)

I would like to ask the leader several questions that arise out of this particular article. In the first place, are Canadian firms in fact permitted to export products that can be adapted to military use in armed conflict; and if so, by what criteria are the materiel and eligible countries defined?

Secondly, to what extent did Canada subsidize, in 1980-81, through the defence industry productivity program, and the program for export market development, the production and sale of military products and components to countries regularly cited by Amnesty International for human rights violations?

Thirdly, are applications under these two programs considered exclusively on an economic basis, or are they scrutinized by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Department of External Affairs to ensure consistency with established Canadian foreign policy positions?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do what Senator Nurgitz has requested.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONDITIONS OF FOREIGN SERVICE— GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO REPORT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, had the Leader of the Government in the Senate been here I would have prefaced my question to him with congratulations for being so well briefed today on important foreign policy questions. I would then have gone on to reiterate the old adage that one good turn deserves another, and would have asked one more question.

I wonder if the deputy leader would be good enough to advise the leader that I and, I am sure, other honourable senators would be glad to hear the government's response to the very important report tabled yesterday by Ambassador Pamela McDougall, who has made a most thorough and extensive survey of the External Affairs Department and who has come up with some disquieting comments. I would like to know what is to be done with this report, what is the government's reaction to it, and what we may expect in terms of any possible reorganization or alteration of priorities in this very important department of our government.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I noticed that report on my desk also. I have not had a chance to read it, but I think I can say immediately that it is a long awaited report which is going to receive immediate and serious attention by the government. If I can provide any more detailed information, I will.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

PRESS CONFERENCE—REPLIES TO QUESTIONS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government. In his absence, I shall direct it to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday, we witnessed an historic moment in Canada. During a press conference the Governor General answered questions asked by reporters. We know full well that such statements made by the Governor General are previously approved by the cabinet.

Several reporters saw in the new attitude displayed by the Governor General the indication of a change to come in his title as Head of Canada. The Queen could possibly lose this title and then the Governor General could perhaps become the president of a Canadian republic.

Was the Governor General authorized by the cabinet to make such a statement?

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: No.

Senator Asselin: You do not know that.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the simple and brief answer to the question is no. Perhaps I should not say anything more.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The minister is saying that the cabinet was not aware that the Governor General would call a press conference.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Did you ask whether the Governor General had been authorized by the Cabinet?

Senator Asselin: No, I did not. I asked whether the cabinet was aware of it.

[English]

I will repeat it in English, if you wish.

● (1445)

[Translation]

Senator Frith: No, but the first time, you used the word "autorisé". You did not say "au courant".

Senator Asselin: I will rephrase my question to meet the clarification requirements of the deputy leader: Was the cabinet aware that the Governor General yesterday would call a press conference and deal with the topics he dealt with?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will check that, with the object of discovering whether or not he was aware of it; but I think it would lead to misunderstanding if I were to take the honourable senator's interpretation, which is based on speculation by the press, and treat it as fact. It is not fact, but somebody's opinion, somebody's interpretation, and I have known for a long time that fact and opinion are not necessarily synonymous. I will have a look at this matter, but on the premise I have just stated and not on the premise that the preamble to the honourable senator's question is factual.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The minister did not answer my question. I asked him whether the cabinet was aware that the Governor General would hold a press conference yesterday and deal with such burning issues as the fact that Quebec did not sign the patriation resolution. He did not answer me.

[English]

Senator Olson: I did answer it. I said I would take the question as notice.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Usually, when His Excellency the Governor General makes public statements, those statements are cleared by cabinet beforehand. Let me give the minister an example. When the Governor General reads the Speech from the Throne, we all know that he is in fact expressing the views of the government on the pieces of legislation to be introduced or passed by Parliament during the upcoming session. Did the Governor General have the clearance or approval of cabinet to make those statements, especially those dealing with Quebec's position in regard to the patriation of the Constitution?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I said at the beginning of my last reply that I would take that part of the question as notice. At this point I do not know whether the cabinet or any committee of the cabinet was aware of the content of the press conference, and I do not think I have any more to add, in spite of the prolonged comments the honourable senator has made.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: In his capacity as a member of the cabinet, did the minister know that the Governor General was going to announce yesterday, at a press conference—which is an historical fact, no governor general having ever done anything comparable—that he was going to prepare and sponsor a series of scientific conferences with a view to stimulating scientific research in Canada? Those conferences would start in early summer. As we know, the federal and provincial government have cut their research grants to universities and the latter are complaining bitterly about it. Had the cabinet indicated to the Governor General that he was to organize that type of conferences on research and science?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can only repeat what I have said after every one of these bootlegging statements, dragging in all kinds of things—and I know the honourable senator is an expert in that kind of bootlegging—namely, that I shall take the question as notice and give the honourable senator a reply as soon as I get one.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I want to raise an objection. Naturally, the minister considers himself an expert who can manipulate the kind of questions I am asking today. But I want to remind him that every time he speaks, the Governor General does so on behalf of cabinet, as a representative of the Queen. The press conference he held yesterday was an historic one, it was unprecedented. Is it a new strategy that the government is trying out to have the Governor General hold press conferences to make up for the inadequacies of its economic or scientific policies, to have him act on the government's behalf by making official statements and to let him in the future make statements for the government? Is this the government's latest policy?

● (1450)

[English]

Senator Olson: I believe the honourable senator has just answered his own question. First of all, he said it was perfectly normal that everything the Governor General has to say ought to be cleared with cabinet—

Senator Asselin: I did not say that.

Senator Olson:—almost to the extent that the Governor General cannot even speculate about anything without first obtaining the approval of cabinet. There is no doubt, honourable senators, that the Governor General is the spokesman for the government on certain occasions; I can cite the Speech from the Throne as an example of that sort of thing. The honourable senator then says that what has happened in the last two or three days is abnormal. My reply to that is that he cannot have it both ways. I will, however, take the question as notice and try to obtain a reply to the substance of the question, which is whether or not the cabinet was aware of what the Governor General said in his press conference. That is the only piece of substance in the question; the rest is bootlegging.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, should I understand that in future, when the Governor General makes a public statement, when he holds press conferences, he will simply be speaking for the government in power? Is it the cabinet decision that in the future difficult messages will be given by the Governor General, which means that he will act as cabinet spokesman? Is that the government's intention?

[English]

Senator Olson: The answer is no.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: As a supplementary, I would like to ask the minister to obtain for tomorrow copies of the transcription of the press conference held by His Excellency the Governor General and make them available to senators in order that we may scrutinize what mandate he might have received from the government in respect of such press conferences.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can do that. However, this is the type of question often asked by members on the other side. They are really asking a minister to do their homework for them. The honourable senator can request the press release just as easily as I can. However, I will do it for him.

Senator Asselin: That is not the case at all. You have the responsibility for the government and you have to provide any documents we require so that we can study them.

Senator Olson: Not from every source.

Senator Asselin: If you refuse to do that, you refuse to do your duty.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I said that I would do this. Whoever was responsible for conducting the press conference—whether it was the CRTC, the CTV, the CBC or Global—the honourable senator can write a letter or make a phone call just as easily as I can.

Senator Asselin: I will not.

Senator Olson: However, I will do it for him if he has not the time.

SYRIA—PROPOSED DIPLOMATIC MISSION IN DAMASCUS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Leader of the Government, I wish to reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie on November 17, 1981, concerning possible plans to establish a Canadian diplomatic mission in Damascus, Syria.

Honourable senators, at the present time the opening of a diplomatic post in Damascus is not under active consideration.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Leader of the Government, I should like to reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Roblin on November 25, 1981, concerning the Garrison diversion project. All honourable senators will remember that we had news of the Burdick amendment, and then a supplementary question was asked about the appropriation of funds.

Honourable senators, it is true that some money has been appropriated by the U.S. Congress for the Garrison diversion project this year. However, that is not unusual, as money has been appropriated for the Garrison project every year for the past few years. The money appropriated amounts to $4 million and will go to cover salaries and maintenance costs, not towards new construction.

Canada gained an important victory, on the other hand, when the Burdick amendment was defeated in the U.S. Congress. This amendment would have provided funds to move the project ahead. Under the circumstances, the government feels that Canada came out well with money being appropriated to keep the project maintained as it is now.

With regard to the liaison committee referred to by Senator Roblin, plans for Garrison have not been discussed because it was felt that there was not any need to do so. The reason for this is that the government feels that excellent channels of communication exist already and have been successful in upholding Canada's interests, as evidenced by the defeat of the Burdick amendment.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE SINAI—CANADA'S NON-PARTICIPATION IN U.N. PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Leader of the Government, I reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie on December 1, 1981, concerning possible Canadian participation in the Sinai force.

It is not true, honourable senators, that Canada is acting according to the dictates of the United States in this matter. The U.S. has taken a leading role because of its obligation to do so under the terms of the Camp David Accord.

Under the terms of the Camp David Accord, the United States, along with Israel and Egypt, is obliged to organize a multinational force in the absence of a United Nations force. The U.N. force was never organized because informal soundings at the U.N. made it clear that it was not possible to establish such a force.

When the United States was organizing the multinational force, Canada was not asked to participate. We did, however, have informal discussions with a number of countries about such a force. The United States said that they did not view Canadian participation as being essential. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated recently, "The Americans said we weren't needed."

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on December 4, 1981, concerning a Canadian appointment to the International Joint Commission.

The appointment of a Canadian chairman of the International Joint Commission is presently under consideration by the government and an announcement will be forthcoming in the near future.

THE SENATE

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Leader of the Government, I wish to reply to questions asked by Senator Muir and Senator Doody on December 9, 1981, as to whether the Auditor General's report was tabled in the other place before the Auditor General held a press conference.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to report to the Senate on the circumstances surrounding the tabling of the report of the Auditor General in the other place on December 8, 1981. First of all, there was a press lock-up between 9 a.m. and 2 p.m., with the caveat that there was to be no release of the report until tabling in the other place. Secondly, there was a lock-up involving a general briefing of MPs between 9.30 a.m. and 12 noon by officials of the Auditor General's office. Thirdly, at 12 noon there was an in camera session of the Public Accounts Committee with the Auditor General.

The stories that honourable senators heard arose from the release of a Canadian Press story at 2.20 p.m., before the tabling of the report in the other place at 3 p.m. This arose out of a misunderstanding that the document was supposed to be tabled at 2 p.m., which consequently led to questions of a specific nature which were asked in the other place about the Auditor General's report before it had actually been tabled.

In response to the specific questions asked by Senator Doody and Senator Muir, I can report that the Auditor General held a press conference at 4 p.m., one hour after his report was tabled in the other place. I hope that is the information that honourable senators requested in clarification.

● (1500)

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, on that particular point may I also ask the deputy leader whether it is possible that senators will be invited to future lock-ups in connection with the Auditor General's report.

Senator Frith: I will pass that question along, honourable senators, but you will no doubt recall that under the statute the Auditor General is not required to report to Parliament, but only to the House of Commons. Senator Guay's question really raises the whole question of whether, when there is a report to Parliament and a briefing of MPs, senators should be considered members of Parliament, which is what they are. In this particular case, however, the distinction exists that the Auditor General's report, as required under the statute, is to be made to the House of Commons and not to Parliament as a whole. I will raise the question, however.

THE ECONOMY

INTENTIONS OF GOVERNMENT RE 1980 POVERTY LINE UPDATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 25, 1981, as reported at page 3052 of the Debates of the Senate, the Honourable Jack Marshall asked me the following questions:

As a follow-up to a question I asked last week, and without going into too many details, can the deputy leader say whether the government is considering the provision of relief in view of the fact that some of these single senior citizens are far below the poverty line, and not just below it? This is a situation involving many people, and I think it should be treated as an emergency. Would the deputy leader obtain information as to the government's plans in terms of changing pension plans and the like?

The honourable senator then asked Senator Olson the following question:

Perhaps I may ask a supplementary question. I understand the Prime Minister told a national pensions conference just a few months ago that the government would be acting quickly to adjust pensions in order to bring the incomes of such people as the handicapped up to a decent standard. Could an answer to that question also be given at the same time?

Honourable senators, the answer is rather long and detailed, and I would ask your indulgence to have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I have been in touch with the department concerned and I am advised that the government is very much aware of the hardships facing many of today's pensioners. The fact alone that almost 53 per cent of the current old age security population is relying on at least a partial income-tested benefit from the Guaranteed Income Supplement Program prompted the government to initiate a major review of the entire pension system to see where improvements could and should be made.

In the months following the National Pensions Conference, which the Government of Canada hosted this spring, the views and suggestions presented by the conference delegates, as well as those received from interested Canadians across the country, have been examined and assessed. Also, surveys have been conducted to determine exactly what Canadians need and expect from the retirement income system.

Further, since pensions are a shared federal and provincial responsibility, a committee of senior federal officials has been consulting with provincial counterparts on the best way to approach pension reform as a whole.

The government's next step will be to release a position paper consolidating the issues surrounding pension reform and indicating the directions in which the federal government is interested in moving. Unquestionably, the government's goal is a pension system that more adequately responds to the needs of retired persons in this country.

However, it is also recognized that there are many people in this country who are having to make ends meet on very little income other than Old Age Security program benefits. One of the most vulnerable of this group is, as Senator Marshall pointed out, those single pensioners living alone who, even with a maximum guaranteed income supplement, still receive very low incomes. It is recognized that these people require improved assistance under the Guaranteed Income Supplement program, and, as the Prime Minister noted in his opening remarks to the National Pensions Conference, the government hopes to make these improvements during its current mandate. The cost of making these improvements and of bringing the level of income guaranteed to single pensioners up to at least the Statistics Canada low-income cut-off level—which I should say is significantly below the more generous “poverty line”—set by one of our own Senate committees, is estimated to be approximately 3/4 of a billion dollars, or approximately $730-750 million. Obtaining these improvements and obtaining the necessary funds for them are important concerns.

As Senator Marshall indicated, single retired persons are not the only group in Canada who need improved assistance. Disabled and handicapped persons also require help. As honourable senators are aware, this year a special committee, made up of representatives of all parties, studied and reported on the special needs of this particular group, and several of the recommendations made in their report, “Obstacles”, dealt with improving the financial assistance afforded to disabled persons. These recommendations are being sympathetically considered with a view to implementation, and it is definitely the government’s intention to have concrete proposals to discuss with the provincial governments in the near future.

JUSTICE

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES OF MINISTERS
RESPONSIBLE FOR CORRECTIONS, CRIMINAL JUSTICE, LAW ENFORCEMENT, AND OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL—COMMUNIQUÉ PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has asked me to put before you a communiqué respecting Federal-Provincial Conferences of Ministers Responsible for Corrections, Criminal Justice, Law Enforcement, and of Attorneys General, dated December 9, 1981. The first paragraph reads:

At a meeting of federal, provincial and territorial ministers responsible for criminal justice held in Ottawa on December 7, 8 and 9, 1981, the following were the principal items discussed.

The document then goes on to detail the various matters discussed.

The Leader of the Government is aware that several honourable senators are interested in matters having to do with corrections, criminal justice, law enforcement and attorneys general, so he asked me, in his absence, to present this document to the house.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Perhaps it would be more appropriate to have it appended to today’s Hansard.

Senator Frith: That is a good suggestion, and if honourable senators agree I will ask that it be appended to today’s Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of communiqué see Appendix “C”, p. 3497.)

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Wednesday, December 16, 1981

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration recommends the following changes respecting the printing of certain information in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate effective the first sitting day of 1982:

1. That reports of Inter-parliamentary groups be printed in the Debates of the Senate only, if it is so ordered by the Senate.
2. That messages from the House of Commons concerning changes in Commons membership of Standing Joint and Special Joint Committees be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate only.
3. That all documents tabled in the Senate be listed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate only.
4. That all questions asked pursuant to Rule 20A(1) be printed on the Order Paper on the next sitting day, after they are sent to the Clerk of the Senate and only once a week, on the first sitting day of each week thereafter, until they are answered.
5. That information in the lists of Meetings of Committees printed in the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate be abbreviated so that only the time, room number, subject matter and the short titles of bills are used, and that this information be set in smaller type.

Your Committee will continue to monitor the cost of printing Senate publications and may make further recommendations to reduce these costs if necessary.

Respectfully submitted,

B. ALASDAIR GRAHAM,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1981-82

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-86, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

He said: Honourable senators, I would just point out, in answer to Senator Roblin's question of yesterday as to whether copies of Bill C-86 were available, that, having checked, it is the top bill on the stack of bills each of you will find in your desk.

Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1981-82, provides full supply for supplementary estimates (C) and (D) for 1981-82. I do not intend to read the bill, but if you will look at it closely you will see the basic provisions which I think you have become accustomed to in supply bills. Clause 1 provides the short title of the statute, and clause 2, as usual, grants the amounts referred to. Clause 3 sets out the purpose and effect of each particular item in the estimates and schedule. There then follows the usual provision with regard to commitments made for items in the estimates referred to in subclause (2) and clause 5, the appropriation charged. Then clause 6 deals with the accounts to be rendered under the provisions of the public accounts in section 55 of the Financial Administration Act. The other important part consists of the schedules. The schedules refer to the vote estimates in supplementary estimates (C) and supplementary estimates (D). Schedule A refers to supplementary estimates (C) and Schedule B refers to supplementary estimates (D). Honourable senators will notice that the larger group is under the heading of supplementary estimates (C).

Supplementary estimates (C) and (D) were tabled in the Senate on November 17 and December 1, respectively, and were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. On November 19, the committee discussed supplementary estimates (C) with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials. The report of the committee on supplementary estimates (C) was adopted yesterday.

Supplementary estimates (C) total $3,877.2 million of which approximately $905.5 million is votable. This can all be found in Schedule A. The balance of the expenditures totalling $2,971.7 million are statutory in nature. Of course, the word "votable" is distinct from the word "statutory" in the sense that we must vote the supply in the votable portion, and the authority for the rest is automatic in the sense that it is a statutory requirement.

Supplementary estimates (C) consist of the following larger items for which parliamentary authority will be requested. First, there is $107 million for increased payments to VIA Rail for rail passenger services. Incidentally, honourable senators, you will find details of each of these items in the schedules. The second votable item is in the amount of $81 million, and it is for compensation to grain producers as a result of the grain embargo. The next votable item amounts to $66 million which is allocated to the Enterprise Development Program which is primarily for the Vancouver Automated Light Rapid Transit System, and following that is the amount of approximately $65 million for the community development projects of the Department of Employment and Immigration. Then there is $60 million to supplement the Treasury Board's contingency vote to ensure that sufficient funds are available to meet possible pay list shortages in departmental budgets. Those are the major votable items.

The major changes in statutory requirements involve $2.3 billion for servicing the public debt; $0.5 billion for fiscal transfer payments; approximately $0.3 billion for increased old age security and guaranteed income supplement payments, and spouses' allowances, due to increased population and indexing; and there is an approximate $0.2 billion decrease in payments to the unemployment insurance accounts. Those are the major changes in the statutory requirements.

Another item that has been of interest in these bills is the so-called $1 vote. There are only seven $1 votes in these supplementary estimates, and none of them infringes on the ruling made by the Speaker of the other house. Four of these seven votes seek approval to transfer funds between votes, two concern the authorization of grants—they are classified as $1 votes because funds are available within the program—and the remaining vote is an amendment to a previous appropriation act, and the additional information on this vote was provided to honourable senators in the list of $1 votes that was distributed to members of the committee, which votes are mentioned in the committee report adopted yesterday.

Supplementary estimates (D) for 1981-82 is made up of just one item totalling $94 million. This item provides for payment by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to financial institutions of loans insured by the department to Consolidated Computer Inc., Financeco Ltd., and Finecomp Inc.

Those are what appear to me to be the main features of Bill C-86. If there are any questions, I shall certainly be glad to answer them.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before I begin my reply, I must say that I am impressed by the fact that throughout the course of his remarks, Senator Frith kept referring to the word "statutory". I was not impressed with the honourable senator's definition of the word "statutory", because in looking at the complete bill I can see reductions in the statutory items, to which I shall refer later. I ask the honourable senator if he is inferring that because an item is statutory no one, including the government and Parliament, has a right to interfere with it?

Senator Frith: The honourable senator may keep going, and I shall reply to his questions at the end of his remarks.

Senator Phillips: What do you mean by "keep going"? I asked you a question.

Senator Frith: I thought I would take note of your questions and reply at the end of your remarks.

Senator Phillips: I would like an answer now.

Senator Frith: To say that the statutory items are not subject to any interference is not correct because, of course, we have to vote on the amounts. I simply made the distinction between those items that are votable, in the sense that they are not provided for in a specific statute but are requested by a department and furnished for the purposes of that department, and those items that are provided for under statute.

So that it will be clear to honourable senators, the amount of $2.3 billion for servicing the public debt is provided for under the normal government legislation, and the amount of $0.5 billion for the fiscal transfer payments is provided for in the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act. The statute providing for the $0.3 billion for old age security is the Old Age Security Act, and the statute providing for the decrease in payments to the unemployment insurance account is the Unemployment Insurance Act. So we are not totally without discretion, and I was not implying that.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I appreciate the reply by the honourable senator and, in particular, his reference to the decrease in unemployment insurance payments. I had forgotten to list that item in my notes, and I thank the honourable senator for reminding me of it.

● (1520)

Yesterday, I had some doubt as to what form the debate would take today. After inquiries with negative results, I was finally directed to Senator Frith. I must say, honourable senators, that I found him to be very co-operative and helpful, and for that I thank him. However, I suspect the information he gave me was rather biased. Honourable senators, I might be prejudiced, but I would never be biased. I just want to make that distinction between Senator Frith and me. Nonetheless, I thank him for his co-operation.

Honourable senators, from my experience on Parliament Hill, I have noticed that we tend to deal with appropriation bills just before Christmas. Generally speaking, we think of the Christmas season as a time of joy and goodwill; many employees are looking forward to receiving a Christmas bonus. However, on Parliament Hill we traditionally and constantly disregard goodwill and present a tax bill to the taxpayer. I wonder why we always present a tax bill just before Christmas. We should remind the government that there is only one source of tax revenue, and that is the poor, overburdened taxpayer.

[Senator Phillips.]

We tend to think of an appropriation bill as merely authority for the government to spend so much money but, honourable senators, there is another side to the coin, and that is the tax bill.

I have noticed that instead of receiving a Christmas card from a member in the House of Commons this year I received a mailing whereby the member, according to his political affiliation, highlights an item of the last parliamentary year. I have no objection to this, but I would rather that the members would wish their constituents a merry Christmas to the tune of the federal budget which is $69 billion; and a special merry Christmas for the supplementary estimates to the tune of $3.87 billion which constituents will have to pay along with their other Christmas expenses.

I should now like to refer to public debt programs. Honourable senators, that term implies certain illogical logic about government finances; it even implies legitimacy. Can the government endlessly go on incurring debt without realizing what it is going to cost? It would be wonderful if farmers, small businessmen and people with mortgages did not have to consider interest payments but could, like the government, go out and borrow additional funds to meet their interest payments. I ask honourable senators if they know of anyone or any business that can follow the pattern the government has been setting of borrowing money to pay interest.

Perhaps it would be more logical to pay off the debt, but then, to the Department of Finance, the concept of paying off interest is almost as foreign as paying off the debt in the first place. I am sure you have all heard it said before that interest payments are now the major item in the budget.

Let us relate that to an average income tax payment. Of the average income tax payment of $5,000 per annum, $1,000-plus goes to paying the interest on the national debt.

If we add to that $1,000-plus the interest which the taxpayer has to pay on loans for appliances, cars and the mortgage on his home, then you will see, honourable senators, that interest payments are a major source of inflation.

The sponsor listed a number of items contained in this appropriation bill, and I appreciate his courtesy in so doing. However, I should now like to mention a few items which the sponsor of the bill forgot to mention. This, honourable senators, illustrates the difference between bias and prejudice.

I would draw your attention to the $8.9 million item for the Canadian Unity Information Office. That figure brings that office up to an expenditure somewhere in the vicinity of $1 million a month. Honourable senators, propaganda is becoming expensive, is it not? I cannot imagine why propaganda would amount to one fifth of the amount provided for farm relief.

I would suggest, honourable senators, that we should forget the Constitution and concentrate on several other factors. I would like to see the Canadian Unity Information Office come out with a full-page advertisement illustrating the cost of paying the interest on loans for a home, a car, or a refrigerator.

● (1530)

Let us look at this item. Under supplementary estimates (C) it cost Canadians $2.357 million for the increased interest rates. That cost was accumulated despite the fact that the government was elected on a promise to reduce interest rates. What happened? Why were Canadians taxed $2,411 million twice in government expenditures to pay for increased interest rates and, on top of that, pay increased mortgage rates and interest on loans?

May I point out to you that the Privy Council is asking for an additional $6 million under this appropriation act, according to the estimates, to pay for the conference of the Economic Council held in Ottawa last summer. The conference had hardly finished before Canada repudiated its stand at the conference and imposed additional tariffs against the emerging nations.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Shame!

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, that was a most expensive dinner party. Even Nero could not have matched the expense of that conference, and it was nothing more than a dinner party.

Senator Frith: Now that's research, if Senator Phillips has covered every dinner party since Nero's time!

Senator Macquarrie: You can count the one that took place in Hull too.

An Hon. Senator: I am not so sure he covered that one as well.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: That is Mr. MacEachen's luncheon that took place in Hull.

Senator Phillips: Perhaps if the Minister of Finance had been given freedom, he would have surpassed that.

Senator Frith: Violins played at Nero's banquets.

Senator Phillips: I have an additional question to ask Senator Frith. I notice that under vote 30C—Uranium Canada Limited—the figure is $150,000 for legal fees in relation to the uranium cartel.

Senator Nurgitz: Cheap!

Senator Phillips: It may be cheap, as Senator Nurgitz says, but I am not really disputing the work of the lawyers. What I want to ask is this basic question: Did the government not get legal advice that the cartel was legal, and receive it from certain individuals within the Department of Justice and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources? Perhaps it could even have been from the deputy minister.

What is wrong with saying that? If you were right when you gave your advice to the government, why not go into the courts and defend it? Why pay $150,000 for someone else to defend your views?

Honourable senators, I should like to turn now to page 120 in the supplementary estimates (C) and deal with the Department of National Health and Welfare vote. There we find a reduction in payment to the provinces of $294.7 million.

Naturally, this presents some concern to the provinces but, at the same time, they received the extraordinary news the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced that from now on the federal government was going to impose very strict regulations as to how the money would be spent.

When you are reducing your payment to a province, do you turn around and say: "We have lopped off 20 per cent of your payments, and, in addition, we are taking a second swipe at you. We are going to tell you how to spend it from here on in?"

Senator Macquarrie: Shocking!

Senator Phillips: I regret that Senator Robichaud is not in the chamber because when he was Premier of New Brunswick he was rather reluctant to have the Province of New Brunswick sucked in by this federal scheme, and he said that the province could not afford it. I am sure honourable senators will agree with me, in looking back, that Senator Robichaud was right.

I do not know how you would distinguish between a Liberal and an NDP, but the socialists have created the idea that health care is costing too much. Doctors and hospitals are to blame for that. We find this reduction of almost a million dollars a day for hospital and medicare.

Honourable senators, let us just take a moment and go back to the Public Accounts of Canada and consider what has happened. Hospital insurance in 1977 cost $2.30 million; in 1980, it cost $2.464 million; in 1981, it cost $2.482 million—which really does not allow for inflation, but then if you subtract the reduction in the appropriation bill, hospitalization this year has cost the federal government less than it did the previous year.

Medicare is even more interesting. In 1977, medicare cost the federal government $1.4 billion; in 1980, it cost $817 million; and in 1981, the estimate was $860 million. If you deduct the amount removed from the 1981 estimates, you will find that medicare is costing the federal government less than it did five years ago to the tune of about $200 million. The federal government stands back and says "We have nothing to do with this. It is statutory." Statutory, my eye! Senator Frith, you have just moved a reduction in the statutory items. You have moved them, and the only item that has decreased in the Public Accounts—and I challenge you to go through them and find another item that has been reduced—is medicare. You have passed the problem over to the provinces and have said, "You pay it. We introduced the program. You were suckers enough to join it; now pay for it!"

● (1540)

I am sure that Senator Macquarrie will be interested in my next item. I refer to the Education Support Program under the Secretary of State. Again it states that it is statutory. When we look at the estimates we see that the reduction is $143.7 million for post-secondary education.

Honourable senators, I watched the seatmate of Senator Frith, in his best Don Quixote manner, get up, wave his arms about and attack the imaginary windmills, and say there is no reduction in post-secondary education. Unfortunately, I do not think that Senator Perrault read supplementary estimates (C). If he had, it should have been obvious to him that the reduction in the estimates accounts for $375 per university student in Canada.

Honourable senators, I ask Senator Frith, with all his eloquence and verbosity, to attempt to explain to me that there is no reduction in university grants when the federal government is reducing its transfer payments by $375 per student. I am sure that Senator Frith will get up and say, "What about the province; what about the university?" The point is that the reduction is going to hit one person only, the student, for $375 next year.

Supplementary estimates (D) dealt with one item only, namely, Consolidated Computer Incorporated. The vote in the appropriation bill is for $94 million. Honourable senators, there appears to be some considerable doubt about the accuracy of this vote. Information given the committee in the other place, and, indeed, appearing in press reports, indicated that the federal government is responsible for $125 million, and that the government has further liabilities or obligations in the amount of $34 million, for which there is no provision in this bill.

Senator Everett, in presenting the committee's report, expressed the committee's concern on this item. Personally, I am rather unhappy that the investigation into a loss of $125 million is being conducted by one individual, a bureaucrat. Honourable senators, I have nothing personally against that individual, but I rather suspect that he is going into that investigation having in mind a number of friends that he has to protect; and I rather suspect that he would be more interested in protecting his friends than in determining the facts.

Senator Everett said that he did not believe there should be two investigations going on at the same time; that it would muddy the waters. I had a good friend who saw service in World War I. He used to tell me how much time he spent as a private whitewashing the barracks. He would say, "Don't forget, you can't whitewash with muddy water." I wish Senator Everett and his committee would remember that.

I also noticed, from Senator Everett's remarks, that the company, which has taken Canadian taxpayers for a ride for $125 million, operated not only in Canada but also in the United States, and no one was really sure what other country it operated in. Would it be wrong if I were to ask what was the loss in Canada, or in the United States, or in the other countries in which the company operated?

The management throughout this expensive episode has been unfortunate. Let us, for a moment, look at another corporation, because I am sure Senator Frith will get up and say, "That happened because of the economic conditions existing throughout the world. Idi Amin, living in exile, is still responsible for the difficulties of the Liberal Government." I am sure he will say it was the fault of someone else.

Senator Frith: Was that in the estimates?

[Senator Phillips.]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, let me draw your attention to vote 63C, which is the Export Development Corporation. There it will be found that they have reduced their anticipated loss from $34 million to $29 million. If the Export Development Corporation can reduce its loss through good management, then surely the same type of management must have been available to Consolidated Computer Incorporated.

It is interesting to note that the loss on Consolidated Computer, and one or two other items, would equal exactly the budget assistance for farmers and mortgaged homeowners—a mere $50 million for farmers, and they cannot get it without making three or four applications. I am sure, however, Senator Frith, that the computer company, with all its government guarantees, had it much easier than the farmers. The homeowner with a mortgage has even greater difficulty, but what does he get? Certainly less than the computer company.

Honourable senators, there are a million householders with mortgages out there who are having difficulty. Should they not receive the same consideration as Consolidated Computer? I hope that you agree with me on that.

Honourable senators, before leaving supplementary estimates (D), I want to point out one fact—and I assure you I am not picking on Senator Frith. Here in this chamber we are accustomed to criticism from the other place. When I started studying the estimates I turned to Hansard of the House of Commons. If anyone reading the House of Commons Hansard thought he was going to get any information on this bill, he must have been very sadly disappointed. I understand there has been a change in the rules since I left that place, to the effect that these things are now studied in committee, brought back into the House of Commons and voted on. When I read the House of Commons Hansard I was reminded of the old story about the recruit who was being trained to drill a squad. As the squad marched to the left of the parade square the recruit became confused and did not know how to call them back. The sergeant-major or warrant officer looked at him and said, "Well, say something, even if it's only 'Good-bye'". Honourable senators, I don't think the House of Commons even said good-bye to $100 million. Apparently, at the Christmas season this is not important to them.

I now come to the last item on my list. I am referring to the item of $150,000 for a study on the proposed Gros-Cacouna liquid natural gas terminal project in Quebec. Recently the federal government announced that the Q and M pipeline had finally received cabinet approval to go as far as Halifax. There was, however, a section in Nova Scotia that was interested in having it come to the Canso Strait. I find it very strange that the Minister of Finance, who, in the final analysis, is responsible for the appropriation bill, would give this money to a rather biased cabinet minister from Quebec to make sure that this project ends up in Quebec, while he gives nothing to the Province of Nova Scotia for a study on the Canso Strait.

Honourable senators, there are many other items I would like to mention, such as VIA Rail, but I am sure that when the VIA Rail item comes back from the committee there will be further discussion on it. I am sure that the Honourable Senator Doody, who I understand is to follow me, will also have some choice items for you, and I do not want to use them all up. I will give Senator Doody a chance.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, there is very little I have to say on this matter. I have spoken briefly on it before, and I thank Senator Phillips for the opportunity to speak today.

There is one question I would like to ask, and then I will sit down. My question deals with supplementary estimates (D), and in particular the $94 million computer item. My understanding is that $91 million of that is to satisfy an obligation to the banks—I think primarily the Toronto-Dominion Bank, though it does not matter. The other $3 million, I gather, is for bridge financing. That $91 million was a government guarantee for a prime-plus; in other words, the bank risked nothing, but got a guarantee plus its interest.

I wonder if anybody else took a bath on the failure of that company. The government obviously is in, the taxpayers are in, for at least $94 million, and it could be as much as $125 million, depending on which numbers you read.

I wonder if any other people lost money on that. Did any of the shareholders or owners of the company have any hard money in, or is this strictly a government loss? This is the only question I have at this time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the question raised by Senator Doody was also touched on by Senator Phillips. I understand that an investigation is under way with regard to this whole transaction. Rather than try to answer the question spontaneously, I will try to get some further information, though I suspect that we may have to wait until that investigation is completed. I will, however, make it known that this is something that the honourable senator is interested in.

Let me now deal with the points raised by Senator Phillips. I would like to begin by thanking him for his contribution to the debate, and also for the rather intriguing semantic side trip he made with regard to the difference between “prejudiced” and “biased”. I suppose “bias” is something that can arise from prejudice, but it can also arise from other sources. If Senator Phillips finds it more satisfactory to be described as prejudiced, though that prejudice may lead to bias, I am prepared to say that whenever the question comes up, Senator Phillips is prejudiced. Honourable senators will then have to decide for themselves whether he is also biased. As to whether I am biased, if the honourable senator is using the word to mean “biased in favour of the government,” then I plead guilty to that.

Senator Phillips: You are guilty.

Senator Frith: Senator Phillips felt, as I understand it, that the holiday greetings that are sent out with the so-called “householders” should perhaps be a little more arithmetic. I suppose we can assume that the members of the House of Commons read our debates as religiously as Senator Phillips reads their “householders”, and that they will consider having their 1982 “householders” include more budgetary figures.

With regard to the public debt, I think, whether the honourable senator likes it or not—and I doubt very much that he will like it—I am bound to say that we agree with Senator Phillips that the interest on the public debt is undesirably high. That is why the Minister of Finance has introduced features into his budget that have as their object an attempt to reduce the amount of public or national debt.

I admit, of course, to having, in my presentation speech, chosen certain items from the estimates rather than reading them all. Senator Phillips chose to say that I forgot them, but then, of course, he did announce that he was prejudiced. I am grateful to him, however, for raising some of the other points in the estimates that I did not raise. It is important for us to know what it is we are passing, even though these estimates have already been studied by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

As always happens, there are a number of important political dimensions to what otherwise appears as a dry description of numbers. Senator Phillips has drawn our attention to some of the political dimensions of these estimates. On the legal advice question, I cannot give the honourable senator any answers as to why that was not handled in a different way. The amount does seem quite high.

Since he told a story, I will tell one too. I am reminded of the gentleman who asked his lawyer for an opinion. The lawyer provided him with the opinion, and sent him a bill for $500. The next time the client saw the lawyer on the street, he said to him, “Nice day; but I’m telling you, not asking you.” If the honourable senator wishes to have more information on the amount to which he has drawn our attention, I will try to provide it.

On the general and important political question as regards the transfer payments, I cannot add anything to what I have already said about the particular estimates that are before us. But another political dimension of that whole subject is taking place today in Toronto, where the Minister of Finance is meeting with his counterparts on the question of transfer payments.

Senator Phillips: Did he not finish yesterday?

Senator Frith: He finished yesterday?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

Senator Frith: In any event, it is taking place this week. In a chronological sense I was wrong, but in a political sense I was right.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It’s nice to be right.

Senator Frith: Yes, it's nice to be right about something.

I think that that event will not affect these particular estimates, but it will affect the larger political dimension that was raised by Senator Phillips.

On the question of "statutory, my eye!" I found it encouraging that Senator Phillips pointed out the important reductions in the statutory items. While he did not offer those comments in a complimentary tone, I chose to take them in that way as compared to his earlier comments about the public debt being too high. He was, therefore, giving a backhanded compliment by saying that in some ways we are voting today for some reductions.

Senator Phillips: Why did you choose those particular items?

Senator Frith: I left them for you, Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: Why did you choose those particular items for reducing the public debt?

Senator Frith: You chose them, Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: You did, in the estimates.

Senator Frith: The reason I chose them is because I thought they were substantial items. I only touched on them, but Senator Phillips has spent some time pointing out that there are substantial reductions which make up part of the estimates that we are dealing with.

On supplementary estimates (D), I would like to state for the record that I can understand that any investigations may not be as successful in terms of disclosure as they might be. However, I do not want to be associated in any way with the comments made about an investigation that is about to take place. Such comments prejudice the investigation by assuming that the investigator is trying to "protect his friends" or "whitewash" them. It is very easy to criticize public servants here. It is difficult for a public servant to find a champion in Parliament. While I am not trying to take a "dock brief" for any particular person, I think we should be careful in our criticisms of people who cannot defend themselves here. In particular, I think we should avoid prejudging an investigation by accusing the investigator of motives which are quite improper, without any evidence that such is the case. Even if we think we have such evidence, it is an unfair practice.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I did not accuse the investigator of that. I said that there is a basic danger that he would tend to protect his fellow bureaucrats. Even Senator Frith should understand that there is a difference between saying that a danger exists and making an accusation. If he would like to pursue this matter further, I am prepared to do so.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there may be a distinction between those two remarks but, as I see it, there is not much difference in their effect. If Senator Phillips is saying that he is not accusing the investigator of either attempting a "whitewash" or trying to protect his friends, I am glad that we have set the record straight. Anyone who reads his earlier comments and comes to an improper inference as to their meaning will read on and will be corrected accordingly, and Senator Phillips can rest assured that people will not misunderstand what he was saying.

Honourable senators, further with regard to supplementary estimates (D), we have already heard a comment that related to the points raised both by Senator Phillips and by Senator Doody.

With respect to the LNG and the Quebec and Maritimes Pipeline items, I have nothing to add except the description that is in the schedule.

I have moved the second reading of this bill, and I recommend it to a favourable response by honourable senators.

Senator Phillips: May I ask the honourable senator a question before the motion is put? I notice, from the remarks of Senator Everett, that Consolidated Computer had been bought by "persons."

Senator Frith: I am sorry, could you repeat that word? They were bought by whom?

Senator Phillips: Senator Everett described them as "persons." I presume that the federal government, as a partner in the sale and in the enormous loss, must be aware of who those persons are. Could the honourable senator tell us who those persons are? In all fairness, I must say that I do not expect him to have the names of those individuals at the tip of his tongue. He usually has most things at the tip of his tongue, but very little from there on up, so I do not expect him to have those names ready. I would ask him to give a commitment to provide this chamber with those names.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will try to provide any information beyond what is already contained in the report of the committee, found in Debates of the Senate of December 8, at page 3429.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it has not been our practice in the past to refer appropriation bills to committee because the estimates on which they are based have already been studied in committee. It has been our practice, on occasion, to give third reading to the bill immediately after second reading. Accordingly, I ask leave to move third reading of this bill now. If honourable senators would rather have third reading tomorrow, they can simply refuse leave. I cannot give any overpowering reason why we should have third reading now, except to get it done.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Senator Phillips: Let's do it tomorrow.

● (1610)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt that motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

TENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, December 16, 1981

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Tenth Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 15)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, C. 38 your Committee wishes to draw to the attention of the Houses sections 6(2)(b), 8(a) and 16(2)(b) of the Claims Regulations, C.R.C., c. 683. Despite extensive explanations offered by the Secretary to the Honourable the Treasury Board, your Committee concluded that these provisions were objectionable and so advised the President of the Board. In his reply the President merely advised your Committee's Chairman that further discussions of the provisions would serve no useful purpose. He further stated that the Committee's views would be taken into consideration when the Claims Regulations are reviewed. This does not amount to an undertaking that the objectionable features of the Regulations will be removed now or in the future. Moreover, there is no indication of when the Claims Regulations will be reviewed.

2. Section 6(2)(b) of the Claims Regulations relates to a situation in which a Department becomes aware that an incident has occurred that may give rise to a claim against the Crown for damages and to the Department's investigation of the incident. The Department is obliged by section 6(2)(a) to obtain a full statement of the duties of every officer or servant of the Crown involved in the incident and, where a Crown motor vehicle is involved, detailed information relating to its use and the authority for such use. Section 16(2)(b) applies in the context of damage to public property or the death or injury of a Crown employee in circumstances in which the Crown may have a claim for damages. Both sections 6(2)(b) and 16(2)(b) require of an employee involved in an incident that he state, not facts, but a legal conclusion, namely whether he was or was not acting within the scope of his duties or employment at the time the incident occurred. Your Committee considers this to be unfair and wrong in principle. The Secretary to the Honourable the Treasury Board stated to your Committee that "what is sought is the employee's statement, based on his knowledge of what he was doing when an event occurred, and on his knowledge of why he was doing it". These are factual matters which can be made the subject of factual questions. Your Committee is of the view that sections 6(2)(b) and 16(2)(b) should be amended to reflect the factual questions it is evidently desired should be asked of an employee.

3. Section 8(a) of the Regulations refers to the Deputy Attorney-General being requested to give an opinion on the position the Crown should adopt respecting liability arising out of an incident to which section 6 of the Regulations applies. Paragraph (a) of section 8 appears in the company of paragraphs (b) and (c), to which your Committee takes no objection. The entire section reads as follows:

8. As soon as possible after the investigation has been completed, the department concerned shall send a report of the investigation, together with any other relevant material obtained, to the Deputy Attorney General with a request for

- (a) his opinion on the position that the Crown should adopt respecting liability;
- (b) his opinion as to whether or not
 - (i) the incident was occasioned by the negligence of an officer or servant of the Crown, and
 - (ii) the officer or servant of the Crown involved was acting within the scope of his duties or employment at the time the incident occurred; and
- (c) his advice as to what steps, if any, should be taken with a view to effecting a settlement.

Your Committee considers the request embodied in paragraph (a) of section 8 to be improper. Your Committee is strongly of the opinion that the Crown should govern itself by the highest possible standard of conduct in litigation. What section 8 should require of the Deputy Attorney General is his opinion as to whether or not the Crown is liable and his advice as to the steps which should be taken with a view to the Crown as litigant, particularly in relation to citizens with limited means. It seems to your Committee right and proper that the Crown should readily admit its liability when it has a legal opinion to that effect. If a satisfactory settlement cannot be reached, any litigation should be confined to the quantum of damages. The implication that flows naturally from section 8(a), that the Crown might deny liability, even where it has a legal opinion of the Deputy Attorney General that it is liable, or an opinion under section 8(b) leading to that conclusion, is in your Committee's judgment highly objectionable. That the Crown should deny liability in such circumstances, and the Deputy Attorney General advise on such conduct, constitutes an abuse of the relationship of Crown and subject.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

December 16, 1981

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages has the honour to present its Second Report as follows:

In accordance with its Orders of Reference from the Senate dated Tuesday, May 27, 1980, and Thursday, April 23, 1981, and its Orders of Reference from the House of Commons dated Friday, May 23, 1980, and Thursday, April 23, 1981, your Committee considered the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1978, the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1979, and the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1980.

The First Report

The first report of the Committee was tabled in the Senate and House of Commons on July 9, 1981, following hearings which had begun in October 1980. This report dealt exclusively with issues relating to the provision of federal services in both official languages to members of the public.

Its six recommendations may be summarized as follows: that the Senate and the House of Commons should formulate official languages guidelines and appropriate time-frames for their implementation; that all references to federal bilingual districts should be removed from the Official Languages Act; that the Act should include the concepts of "where numbers warrant" and the "active offer of service"; that regulations should be passed under the Official Languages Act with regard to locations "where numbers warrant" and locations "where there is significant demand"; that each department and agency should, by March 31, 1982, examine the identification of all positions providing services to the public; and that a Parliamentary Resolution should confirm the December 31, 1983 deadline as being the date beyond which there should no longer be conditional appointments to bilingual positions.

Autumn 1981 Hearings

At its in-camera meeting of October 29, 1981, the Committee decided to examine issues relating to language of work within federal departments, agencies and Crown corporations. It also invited the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada to appear before it to give their reactions to the first report and their views on language of work. The Committee also decided to hold a second hearing with representatives from the departments of Fisheries and Oceans, Energy, Mines and Resources and the Environment on issues relating to service to the public, the purpose being to evaluate the progress they had made since their previous appearance. At that time, these three departments had been judged to be extremely weak in terms of providing service to the public in both official languages. However, time did not permit us to call the unions of the Post Office, Air Canada, Canadian National and Via Rail to testify about the effect their collective agreements had on the provision of services to the public.

Our meetings began on November 3, with the appearance of the Commissioner of Official Languages. The President of the Treasury Board appeared on November 10, at which time he made public certain changes to the official languages program in the Federal Public Service. We then heard, in order, the following federal departments, agencies and unions:

- Employment and Immigration
- National Defence
- Environment Canada
- External Affairs
- The Office of the Auditor General
- Energy, Mines and Resources
- Fisheries and Oceans
- Supply and Services—Supply Administration
- Public Works
- The Public Service Alliance of Canada, and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada
- The Public Service Commission
- The Bank of Canada and
- The Canadian International Development Agency.

We quickly realized the scope and complexity of the language of work issue, especially since applications of its principle is nowhere set out in the Official Languages Act. The witnesses heard by our Committee provided us with a number of preliminary findings, which included the following:

- the lack of equitable participation in senior echelons, its effect on language of work, and the need to bilingualize the Public Service from the top and not from the bottom;
- the poor identification of the language requirements of positions; this often results in a situation where an employee entitled to work in his language (because he is in a unilingual position) has, in fact, to work in both languages, while an employee in a bilingual position is often unable to use his second language;
- the low bilingual capability of supervisory positions;

—the very limited use of French by those who have taken training in French as a second language; and —Francophone representation, which is so low in some departments that they would not even be able to form units working in French.

The Committee is not in a position to make recommendations on language of work issues at this point. We believe that we must continue to hear other witnesses on the subject. Upon the return appearance of certain departments we were able to analyse more closely issues relating to service to the travelling public, the recruitment of Francophone scientists and professionals, scientific publications, concessionaires, contracts with third parties, service contracts and the bilingualism bonus. We expect to continue our study of these questions in order to formulate specific recommendations.

Future Work

In addition to wishing to return to the issues of language of work and language of service, the Committee intends to deal with the third major thrust of the 1973 Parliamentary Resolution—equitable representation. The Committee would also like to analyse federal government official languages activities outside the Public Service. These include the various linguistic and cultural programs of the Department of the Secretary of State, changes to the Official Languages Act proposed by the Commissioner, the study of draft bills initiated by Parliament that have been referred to the Committee, and certain other issues relating to official languages.

The Committee would like to continue its work during the next session, given the scope of what remains to be done and the interest in the Committee's work shown by a number of departments and agencies.

Recommendation 1

Your Committee asks to be reconstituted in the new session of Parliament.

Need for the Committee to Travel

The Committee believes that, given the importance and terms of its mandate, it is essential that it go to regions of Canada to help make members of the public aware of their language rights. In addition, as suggested by the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Committee should seriously consider travelling to countries which have official languages policies in order to discuss their legislation with the authorities responsible for their implementation.

Recommendation 2

Your Committee recommends that it be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada and abroad, accompanied by the necessary staff, and provided that the estimated expenses for such travel and the locations to be visited are defined in advance.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES OF MINISTERS RESPONSIBLE FOR CORRECTIONS, CRIMINAL JUSTICE, LAW ENFORCEMENT, AND OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL

COMMUNIQUÉ

December 9, 1981

At a meeting of federal, provincial and territorial ministers responsible for criminal justice held in Ottawa on December 7, 8 and 9, 1981, the following were the principal items discussed.

CONFERENCE OF MINISTERS RESPONSIBLE FOR CORRECTIONSAccommodation for Female Offenders*

Agreements make it possible to transfer most federal female offenders to their province of origin, so that they do not have to be held in the Prison for Women in Kingston, the only federal facility for women. Recognizing that such transfers will not be possible or desirable in all cases, provincial ministers supported the Solicitor General of Canada's proposal that the Federal Government continue to maintain a capacity for the incarceration of female offenders.

Exchange of Services Agreements

These agreements, which permit the transfer of inmates between federal and provincial jurisdictions, already exist with all but two provinces.

Ministers endorsed the goal that new agreements be negotiated with all provinces and territories. Although most transfers are made to provide inmates with greater program opportunities or better access to their families, they will also now be possible for other reasons such as overcrowding and/or security.

Section 16(1) of the Penitentiary Act

Some dissatisfaction was expressed by the provinces over fiscal responsibility for federal offenders kept in provincial institutions during their appeal submission period. The Solicitor General of Canada agreed to consider an amendment to transfer offenders as soon as they decide not to appeal or on exercise of their right of appeal provided they are informed of the consequences of making an early decision.

CONFERENCE OF MINISTERS RESPONSIBLE FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICECanadian Centre for Justice Statistics*

The Centre was established as a partnership between the two levels of government in recognition of their respective responsibilities in the administration of Justice in Canada. It is expected to facilitate the collection and dissemination of information on law enforcement, correctional services, criminal and civil courts, administrative tribunals, juvenile services and legal aid.

The Centre will provide information to governments and the public on crime rates, regional and national crime trends, governments' initiatives to deal with crime, and overall operations of the justice system.

Victims of Crime

The Ministers recognized the needs of victims of crime, whether these needs result directly from the criminal act itself, or from the victims' encounter with the criminal justice system. In recognition of the very real problems victims experience, Ministers agreed to intensify their present efforts by taking immediate steps to stimulate and improve information and support services. One of the proposals discussed was that the concept of a financial penalty as part of the sentencing process be imposed to be paid by a convicted person to create a fund earmarked for victim compensation programs be considered. The Ministers requested their officials to come forward within one year with specific proposals for further action which both levels of government can take to more effectively assist victims of crime.

Legislation on Sexual Offences (C-53)

Provincial Ministers expressed their support for the general thrust of the Bill tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Justice which removes the stigma attached to the offence of rape. Provinces put forward a number of constructive and positive suggestions particularly in regard to the definition of offences and terms, the general lowering of maximum penalties for sexual offences as compared to penalties for other Criminal Code offences and with certain evidentiary and procedural provisions. The Federal Government agreed to give serious consideration to provincial suggestions and bring them to the attention of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee when it studies the Bill.

Provincial concerns were expressed regarding the implications of the recent Supreme Court decision in the Galjot case on the question of what constitutes soliciting for the purpose of prostitution and the associated problems of law enforcement. It was agreed that Minister of Justice re-examine possible amendments to the Criminal Code, and that Provincial Ministers re-examine in the light of recent court decisions the use of provincial legislation.

Legislation on Access to Information Act, the Privacy Act (C-43)

The Honourable Francis Fox was invited to join the Ministers for this item. Many representations have been made by the Provinces since the introduction of the Bill in the House of Commons.

During this meeting, the Provinces urged the federal government to postpone further action on Bill C-43 pending further consultations on many provincial concerns including the inadequate protection regarding the disclosure of sensitive law enforcement and other information, and on whether the ultimate authority respecting disclosure should reside with Cabinet or the Courts.

Proposed Young Offenders Legislation (C-61)

Ministers reviewed the status of Bill C-61, which has been referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Three major points attracted the attention of Ministers in relation to the proposed legislation, namely the issue of a uniform maximum age, the minimum age for young offenders across Canada and the financial implications of the new legislation.

The Solicitor General of Canada indicated that the federal government was studying the implications of the Charter of Rights with respect to the provisions in the Bill allowing provinces the option to have designated a maximum age of under 16 or 17.

Provincial ministers urged the federal government to expedite the study of the financial implications of the new legislation so that the issue of cost-sharing could be resolved at the earliest possible date.

Cannabis

The Attorney General of Canada indicated that cannabis legislation is still a priority of the federal government. In stating the federal position, the Minister of Justice reconfirmed that it has never been the intention of the Government to legalize possession of marijuana but to reduce the current harsh penalties for simple possession to a more realistic level. Further, he reconfirmed that the offences of trafficking, and importations of illicit drugs will continue to be serious criminal offences and will be vigorously prosecuted.

Provincial ministers and the federal government share the same basic concerns and both levels emphasized the need for an information campaign to make Canadians aware of the dangers to health from cannabis use and of the serious consequences of a criminal conviction.

The federal initiatives include:

- a continued commitment to discouraging the use of cannabis and other drugs;
- an accelerated information program focussing on the adverse effects of drug use;
- adjusting the penalties and penal consequences for the offence of simple possession of cannabis to reduce the adverse effects and disproportionality of the current law while maintaining serious penalties for serious offences;

- increased efforts by the federal government with the help of the provinces in the general area of law enforcement particularly in the areas of importing and trafficking hard drugs.

Provinces expressed concern with the need to reform the legislation dealing with criminal records. Concerns were expressed that a reduction in penalties would lead to a perception that cannabis use is not harmful, and result in increased consumption. It was agreed that further discussion with provinces would be desirable to identify the implications of any proposed changes to the legislation and to work closely in the implementation of appropriate information program.

Bodily Substance Tests in Impaired Driving Cases

Ministers expressed their continuing concern over the loss of life and the millions of dollars of property damage caused by drinking drivers. Two shortcomings in the present breathalyzer legislation were noted; first, that the breathalyzer test does not have application with respect to drugs other than alcohol; and second that the breathalyzer test is not available where a driver is unconscious or otherwise medically unable to be tested. It was agreed by the Ministers that the interprovincial committee established at the Provincial Attorneys General Conference at St. John's in October to review the need for improved legislation should work with the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its Criminal Code Review project which is studying the criminal law aspects of the problem.

The Ministers have asked that the civil liberties aspects of any proposed legislation be considered in examining the desirability of improved traffic safety laws.

CONFERENCE OF ATTORNEYS GENERAL

Enforcement of Maintenance and Custody Orders

Ministers considered the federal-provincial Committee Report on Enforcement of Maintenance and Custody Orders which examined problems flowing from marriage breakdown particularly where separated couples moved from one province to another. The increased case of mobility creates problems for dependents seeking to locate family members in order to initiate enforcement proceedings.

Federal-Provincial Ministers requested their officials to develop recommendations to improve the enforcement of maintenance and custody orders within a province and between provinces.

Child Abduction

Canada signed the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction on October 25, 1981. Ministers recognized that the abduction of children by a parent is a growing social and legal problem in Canada, and that the convention provides an effective mechanism to enhance the civil remedies available in international abduction cases.

The proposed Bill C-53 creates a new criminal offence directed at the wrongful conduct of a parent or other persons who abduct a child. Ministers asked that the consent of the Provincial Attorney General would be required for prosecution in such cases thus obviating any concern that criminal recourse might be abused in family disputes.

CONFERENCE ON LAW ENFORCEMENT

McDonald Commission's Recommendations

Ministers discussed the recommendations of the McDonald Commission dealing with national security issues. Views were exchanged on the federal government's decision to establish a new civilian security intelligence agency, separate from the RCMP, based on federal responsibility for national security. It was agreed that provincial views on the establishment of the new agency would be considered by the Federal Government.

It was agreed that the federal Deputy Solicitor General, the Director General Designate of the new Canadian security-intelligence agency and other federal officials would meet with senior provincial officials in the near future to exchange views on issues relating to the establishment of the new security agency.

Ministers also examined the interpretation of the law concerning conduct by police officers discussed in the McDonald Report. Ministers jointly agreed that unless police conduct was prohibited either at common law or by legislation it was not unlawful, and in proper circumstances such conduct not specifically authorized by law may be necessary and appropriate.

Ministers further agreed to refer to the Continuing Committee of Deputy Ministers important issues relating to police powers and police accountability that were addressed in the McDonald Report.

Bill C-69 Amendments to the R.C.M.P. Act

Ministers discussed the federal government's Bill C-69, An Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, which was introduced for first reading on June 22, 1981. In particular, Ministers examined the provisions relating to the establishment of an independent Public Complaints Commission which will be empowered to initiate and review public complaints of misconduct against RCMP members. Also considered were such important issues as the representation by provincial contracting provinces on the Commission, the appointment of members, and the procedural conduct of the hearings.

The Solicitor General of Canada acknowledged the helpful and important comments made by the Provincial Ministers and agreed to consider their suggestions for amendments to the Bill at Committee stage.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 17, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

[Translation]

THE HONOURABLE ALLISTER GROSART, P.C.
THE HONOURABLE KEITH LAIRD

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, later we shall have a few words to say about Senator Laird, but meanwhile, I shall, if I may, speak to you about Senator Grosart, who last Sunday ceased to be a member of this house when he reached retirement age. He is the second senator to retire within a relatively short time since Senator Connolly left us.

[English]

Honourable senators, never in all my years in this place has there been another senator from either side of the chamber who has been more conscientious about his or her senatorial responsibilities than Allister Grosart.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: His contribution to the work of the Senate is one of which he and his loved ones can be justifiably proud. He put in more hours and expended more energy in trying to improve defective Liberal legislation than anyone short of a masochist would care to do. I must explain that when I speak of Liberal legislation, it is because Senator Grosart came here late in 1962 and, consequently, did not have much time to deal with Conservative legislation. When the Thirty-first Parliament opened in 1979, Allister had been appointed Speaker, and thus had no chance to deal with the few pieces of legislation that were involved, so it was only normal that he should try to improve defective Liberal legislation.

● (1405)

Senator Frith: He was still dealing with defective Liberals.

Senator Flynn: That is another matter. It would require a longer speech to enumerate all of them.

Senator Grosart was equally active in committees. It was he who blew the whistle on the fakery being practised by the government in its use of $1 items in the estimates. There was a lot of gnashing of teeth over that. It was Allister who started a crusade in the early 1970s against the abuses he found in some regulations pertaining to legislation. He found that many of the regulations did not at all reflect the spirit of the laws that gave birth to them. He complained that we were being governed by bureaucrats who were arrogating to themselves powers they should never have.

Well, he stirred up such a fuss that Eugene Forsey developed an interest in the matter. Together these retiring young fellows went to work and their efforts gave birth to a joint committee of Parliament which has been instrumental, if not in eradicating the problem then, at least, in warning people of its existence and its dangers.

And though men of letters and men of laws are not usually much interested in science, here again Allister's ever-active mind makes him the exception. Who will ever forget the yeoman's job he did on the Science Policy Committee? The work he did on that committee's report was unbelievable. You could actually understand what the scientists were saying. It has often been suggested that the only men with anything to say are men of science, but they can't say it. Well, Allister and Senator Maurice Lamontagne helped the scientists out, and we all stand to benefit from their effort.

The work he has done in foreign affairs is well known to us all. His leadership made the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association one of the most active and respected arms of that organization. The keen interest he took in the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee demonstrated also his interest in what went on elsewhere in the world. Allister never missed a meeting of that committee if there was any possibility at all of his being present. His work was appreciated by everyone because he was so thorough in everything he did. No mound of documents ever discouraged him; he waded through everything.

He also had an abiding interest in the functioning of the Senate. His orderly mind led him, at times, to be critical of the haphazard way in which we did things in this place. He believed in rules, and wanted them followed strictly. That is why he so frequently became embroiled in procedural wrangles.

But we all loved him, anyway. He was our conscience. He wanted things done properly. When the time came to choose a Speaker during the happy days when this country was directed by a competent federal government—and there have been very few of them—Allister was the automatic choice. He loved the job and did it well. My only regret is that we were not able to keep him in that position right up to his retirement. He more than deserved to end his days in the Senate performing that function.

For many years, Allister was my deputy, and he was just as reliable in that position as he was in any other he ever accepted. I could always count on him for wise counsel and a helpful and enlightening speech. He did his homework well. He paid more attention to detail than I ever did, and, so, we ended up complementing one another's efforts. I could usually speak on the principle of a bill and wax philosophical—"philosophical" is the word in my text and it may not be quite appropriate—and Allister would then take the legislation apart piece by piece at committee stage or at third reading.

For his selfless dedication, for his unstinting efforts, for his vision and courage, we shall long be indebted to Allister Grosart. For his friendship and his faithful support, I am personally indebted to this uncommon man.

To him and his wife, Thelma, I wish a long, happy and healthy retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with a very great deal of pleasure, I rise to commend Senator Flynn for a most eloquent tribute to a very deserving former senator, Allister Grosart.

There is little left to say, but, I think, Senator Flynn neglected to mention the significant role that Senator Grosart played in the political party process in this country. He is a former director of the Progressive Conservative Party. Liberals recall vividly and I think the Liberals will long remember the campaign of 1958 which he headed. It is an experience seared on the minds of Liberals who recall those days wherever they may be in this country.

Senator Flynn: Also the campaign of 1957.

Senator Perrault: My remarks apply also to the campaign of 1957, as Senator Flynn reminds me. People like Senator Grosart and their worth to the parliamentary and political systems cannot be over-estimated, and those in all parties respect them for the contributions that they make.

One cannot imagine a worse situation in Canada than to have a one-party state. The idea of a tough, resilient and vigorous multi-party system, and an effective opposition whether Conservative, Liberal or anything else, is a good one. Those like Senator Grosart, who help to keep our parliamentary system viable and alive are to be commended.

Allister Grosart has always had a very great respect for the parliamentary system, and for the rules and traditions of Parliament. At times he has driven us to distraction with his interpretation of the rules, but he has always done so in the spirit of improving the parliamentary system, and he has done an effective and excellent job in that capacity. In addition to his many other talents and achievements, he has been a very useful gadfly on the body politic.

Another honourable senator, Senator Laird, will retire on January 12 next. Both he and Senator Grosart are great people and great Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Senator Grosart retired last Sunday, December 13, and Senator Laird will be retiring on January 12. They have both had long and distinguished careers in the Senate and also long and distinguished service to their parties and to this nation.

I remember years ago the Honourable James Sinclair, a great parliamentarian in this country at one time, who was defeated in 1958 in that Allister Grosart-engineered campaign, used to say that the most valuable service anyone in public life can perform is to afflict the comfortable and to comfort the afflicted. Both Senator Laird and Senator Grosart—one serving in the Liberal Party and one in the Conservative Party—have "comforted" many people in this country in attempting to solve some of the problems which have afflicted them; and they have advanced those measures which have afflicted and made "less comfortable" those who were not carrying their fair burden in society.

• (1410)

Senator Grosart, who is internationally known as a parliamentarian, served here, as all of us know and as Senator Flynn has stated, in a number of capacities. He served as Deputy Leader of the Government, Deputy Leader of the Opposition, as Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and, of course, as Speaker. He distinguished himself in all of those roles. His contributions to our debates were frequent, and his parliamentary expertise will be missed.

His training at the University of Toronto in political science and law has given him a great foundation for his work on behalf of Canada, both domestically and internationally.

It should be noted that Senator Grosart's political gifts have been passed down to his daughter, Geraldene, and, speaking as a senator from British Columbia, I am pleased to note that members of the Grosart family are now active in politics in my home province. I do not know what that event portends for the future of my party there, but his daughter, Geraldene, deserves congratulations for being elected recently as an alderwoman in Kimberley, British Columbia. Apparently, she was elected with a satisfactory majority, so some of us suspect that there were consultations with her father during the course of her successful campaign.

Senator Flynn: There are very enlightened people in British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: Yes, in many parties. That is a good choice of words. Perhaps we will see her in this chamber or in the other place some day carrying on the Grosart tradition.

Senator Laird has also served the Senate in invaluable ways. Both senators we are honouring today have distinguished war records, in addition to their service in Parliament and to their communities. Senator Laird rendered special service as an outstanding Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. During the course of his parliamentary career, Senator Laird shared with us his expertise as an attorney and businessman, particularly in matters regarding taxation. As honourable senators are aware, he has written a number of works on that subject. His views have always been of special value in discussions relating to budgetary and financial matters. We have always been able to draw on his expertise in those areas.

Senator Laird was educated at the University of Western Ontario and at Osgoode Hall. He obtained an excellent background in international studies in Geneva. We are going to miss him greatly, not the least of his qualities being his great sense of humour and his sense of perspective. Indeed, I think it can be said of both honourable senators that they possess a sense of humour, which is absolutely necessary for political survival, whatever one's party.

On behalf of the government, I should like to extend to Senator Laird and Senator Grosart, and their families, our best wishes on their retirement. I hope that they will come back and visit us often. It is not easy to replace close to 35 years of parliamentary expertise, and we thank them for all that they have done for Canada, for Parliament and for our political system.

Hon. senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about Keith Laird, as well as about Senator Grosart. Senator Laird is a quiet, unassuming, reflective man, not given to long, unnecessary speeches like mine.

Senator Perrault: Right on!

Senator Flynn: Mine are necessary, but useless. He can always be relied upon for a balanced, well-presented view on any issue. He is a pleasant, friendly fellow who does painstaking work and is always eager to please, so much so that he started a speech on October 23, 1974 by saying of an amendment to the Immigration Act:

Honourable senators, Bill S-12 is a rather simple bill. In fact, it is so simple even I can understand it.

This "simple bill" has remained as a trademark of Senator Laird. I do not think the good senator ever got over all the debate and controversy that bill caused. We on this side thought it was horrid, and some honourable senators on the other side did not think much of it, either. For several weeks, and through many long speeches and some loud and angry committee sittings, Senator Laird had to defend that "simple bill" of his. He was equal to the task, but I do not really believe that he much enjoyed being in the eye of the storm. He is a kind, placid man, one who probably would have preferred to avoid such a mess.

● (1415)

That is what I believe will be most remembered about Keith Laird—his willingness to work, but always in a spirit of co-operation, of peace and of a search for truth. He will be missed, particularly in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. I am quite sure that Senator Hayden would agree with me on that. I repeat, he will be missed, and we extend to him our best wishes for a long and active retirement.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-84, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on the administration of Part I of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 26 of the said Act, Chapter R-11, R.S.C., 1970.

Memorandum of Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Municipality of Montague in the Province of Prince Edward Island, dated November 23, 1981, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C., 1970.

CANADA OIL AND GAS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 17, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred the Bill C-48, intituled: "An Act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, December 15, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following comments:

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your Committee has considered Bill C-48. In particular, the Committee has considered the conclusions of the Committee contained in its Report of the subject-matter of Bill C-48, which conclusions were stated before the Senate by the Chairman of the Committee on December 15, 1981. The conclusions of the Committee were as follows:

1) That clause 28 be amended to read as follows:

"28. No Crown share is reserved out of

(b) a former lease or former permit on which the drilling of a well was commenced prior to December 9, 1980 and such well subsequently becomes a significant discovery."

2) That Sub-clause 5(2) be amended to read as follows:

"Subject to Sub-section (7), the Governor in Council may, by order, for any purposes and under any conditions set out in the order, withdraw from the application of this Act such Canada lands as are specified in the order."

3) That the NEP and the energy pricing Agreements with the producing Provinces be reconsidered in order to provide for adequate development in the western sedimentary basin to provide Canada with sufficient oil and gas pending sustained production in the Canada lands and in particular to provide for the upgrading of heavy oil and the development of the tar sands and the tertiary recovery process and that the federal government and the producing provinces proceed with their agreements to improve the economic viability of low productivity wells.

● (1420)

The Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appeared before the Committee and undertook as follows:

With respect to subclause 5(2) The Minister gave a commitment to the Committee that no transfer of Canada lands will take place until the Bill was passed. The Committee was satisfied that this commitment, together with language of subclause 5(8) would adequately protect aboriginal rights.

With respect to the National Energy Program and the Energy Pricing Agreements with the producing provinces, The Minister advised the Committee that it could expect developments in the near future with respect to the upgrading of heavy oil, developments of the tar sands, development of Cold Lake and low productivity wells.

With respect to clause 28, The Minister has made the following undertaking:

"I am writing to confirm the undertaking I made earlier today before your Committee with respect to the fiscal regime applicable to the Canada Lands. I believe there is agreement that the Canada Lands have the potential to make an important contribution to Canada's energy future. Within the limits imposed by the need to ensure that the pace of oil and gas development is consistent with the local social and economic requirements and with Canada's energy needs, it would be desirable to have increased exploration activity in the Canada Lands. I believe the price and fiscal regime we have set out will ensure that this occurs. I would like to confirm, however, that I will monitor the situation closely, and if it appears that the fiscal regime is not having the intended effect, I will be prepared to make the appropriate alterations."

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN

Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before third reading is called, I should like to rise on a point of order. We have here the committee's report, read to us by the Clerk Assistant, in English. I enquired and was told there is no French version of the report. I realize the report was drafted rather quickly but that is no excuse for tabling a report in only one of the two official languages. I am warning you that from now on, if this happens again, I shall object to the report's being concurred in.

[English]

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, so far as the French text is concerned, the messenger is on his way over with it. I was proposing to deliver it to the table as soon as it arrived. It is in hand, however. I am well aware of the requirements.

As far as the report itself is concerned, I call attention to the fact that the tabled report is different in form from the copies in the hands of honourable senators. It will be noted that there is an introduction entitled, "Background", a preamble to the report, after which follows the report of the committee, in which the committee reports the bill without amendment. The preamble is for the information of senators only, and is an indication of the attitude of the committee in reaching its decision.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I suggest that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day, in its normal order on the Order Paper.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think that is reasonable.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, are we now discussing the report or the bill? What is the actual situation?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the rules provide that a report of this kind shall be received without debate, but that should not prevent debate on the provisions of the bill. That is because Senator McIlraith has not yet moved third reading. Senator Flynn has suggested that the bill be placed on the Order Paper for third reading later this day. The motion for third reading can be debated. However, the rules require that the report itself be received without debate.

● (1425)

Your Honour, I understand that the Senate wishes the third reading of this bill be deferred until later this day. Is my understanding correct?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until ten o'clock tomorrow, Friday, December 18, 1981 at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as provided in the motion, we intend to adjourn until tomorrow morning, with the possibility that tomorrow one or two bills may be passed on third reading. Afterwards we expect to give Royal Assent to a number of bills already approved in addition to the bills now before the Senate.

Royal Assent should be at about 1:30 or two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, or even 12:30, if possible. However, for the time being, Royal Assent is tentatively scheduled for 1:30. We shall see what happens tomorrow. Our plans, do not however, provide for consideration of a bill to amend Bill C-60. Honourable senators will recall that this bill was passed in the other place, with our amendments. This bill was conceived by a Senate committee, and subsequently tabled again in the House of Commons. It was then considered by our committee, which proposed a number of amendments that were accepted in the other place. Our problem with regard to the passage of the other bill to which I referred is that it is not scheduled for consideration in the other place until tomorrow. So, if the bill is passed in the House of Commons and the Senate is agreeable to expediting three readings in one day, we shall try to pass the bill here tomorrow. However, this is not final, and some consultation will be necessary to reach agreement, if possible.

To recapitulate, we shall sit tomorrow morning at ten o'clock to give third reading to some bills and we may also get another bill and have Royal Assent between noon and 1:30.

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Am I correct that the only bill that could possibly be sent to us by the House of Commons is Bill C-60?

Senator Frith: No, that is not correct. I do not have a number for the bill at the moment, but there is an amendment to Bill C-60, I believe. In effect, it provides for an advisory council or board, and the amending bill asks for the authority in the meantime to set up a temporary board or to have temporary appointments to the board. At least, that is what I took from my reading of the draft. Perhaps Senator Olson can add something to that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that is the substance of what is required.

Senator Flynn: Do you know the number of the bill, or can you identify it?

Senator Olson: No, I do not have the number of it yet because the bill has not yet been introduced in the Commons for first reading. Frankly, I am a little unclear whether it is an amendment to Bill C-60, or whether it is meant to amend the National Energy Board Act. If I understand correctly, Bill C-60 has been passed in the Commons and the resolution accepting the six Senate amendments to Bill C-60 has also been passed in the Commons.

Senator Flynn: It is not possible for the unnumbered bill to be an amendment to Bill C-60.

Senator Olson: I agree. I believe we indicated yesterday that there were some administrative problems. Indeed, if pipelines are under construction, the administrative requirements to carry out the provisions of Bill C-60 would require some temporary additional members of the board. That, in simple terms, is all the bill calls for.

Senator Flynn: With all due respect, I am more confused now than I was before. Has Bill C-60 been passed by Parliament?

Senator Olson: It has gone through all stages in both houses, yes.

Senator Flynn: But you say the House of Commons has accepted the amendments to Bill C-60 made by the Senate.

Senator Olson: That is right.

Senator Flynn: Has it received royal assent?

Senator Olson: No, but it will tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: It will tomorrow.

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Flynn: So the bill which may come to us will be another bill amending the same bill.

Senator Olson: No, that is not so. It is a bill to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Senator Flynn: I understand. That is what should have been said in the first place.

Hon. David Walker: That's right.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is quite correct. Bill C-60 amends the National Energy Board Act. The subject matter of Bill C-60 deals with the question of expropriation. The amendment I was referring to, the unnumbered or "no name brand" bill for which I do not have a number, technically, of course, makes a further amendment to the National Energy Board Act, and in doing so changes the provisions of Bill C-60. As the Leader of the Opposition says, we cannot talk about amending a bill which has not really taken effect.

Senator Macquarrie: Even Homer nods.

Senator Flynn: The Senate as a whole may be willing to make another act of faith, but that does not necessarily apply to this side.

Senator Olson: There is no act of faith involved.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

MODIFICATION OF PROVISIONS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have one or two brief questions for the minister responsible for economic development. Would the minister agree that the budget change causing capital cost allowances to be deductible, in effect, for only six months—only one-half being allowed under the proposed budget—is a disincentive to business investment for at least six months of 1982?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would not agree with that interpretation of the facts. If that kind of argument is made, then I would say it is an incentive for the last half of any year, as opposed to the situation in some countries where they allow capital cost allowances to begin on the date of putting machinery into operation, no matter when the purchase is made.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. If it is an incentive for the last half of the year—and that is precisely my point—would the minister not say then that it is a disincentive for the first half of the year?

Senator Olson: Only on the basis on which you put your argument could you draw that conclusion. Personally, I think it is far more convenient to have a consistent rule than to have all of the complications that surround the date of purchase, the time of putting machinery into operation, and the other factors involved in deciding on the date upon which a capital cost allowance can begin. The proposal in the budget is far less complicated than the situation that would exist if we followed the honourable senator's argument, which I do not agree with.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the Canadian membership in the International Joint Commission. I am somewhat confused by the semantics of two replies I have received.

In answer to a question I asked on March 12 the minister told me:

We expect to announce those appointments shortly.

Yesterday the Deputy Leader of the Government in a delayed answer indicated:

—an announcement will be forthcoming in the near future.

I lay awake all night wondering whether “shortly” is better than “in the near future” or worse; whether it is a fox trot or a turkey trot, which, according to John Crosbie, is one step forward and two back.

Can the minister, who comes from the beautiful and majestic province of British Columbia, tell me if he has any anxiety that the non-filling of the Canadian portion of the IJC could conceivably jeopardize a decision on the very important Skagit Valley?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we hope to have in place soon a full complement of Canadian representatives on the IJC fully qualified to protect Canada's best interests, not only during the Skagit negotiations but during negotiations affecting other Canadian interests. We hope appointments will be made “very shortly” and “in the near future.” We hope to have a person named to the post of chairman, but the selection process has not been an easy one because there are so many talented people willing to come forward to serve.

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the leader for blending both his answer and the deputy leader's use of “very shortly” and “in the near future”. Let us hope that we will be able to have the situation so well in hand when we resume in 1982 that I will not have to ask the leader further questions about this matter, and that the Skagit Valley will be looked after and the leader and I will have exchanges on other issues.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. This morning we were informed that communications had been restored with our embassy in Poland. The minister has undoubtedly been informed of the current situation in that country by our ambassador, if communications were indeed restored as was announced this morning at the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Consequently, could the minister brief the Senate on the current situation in Poland and explain Canada's attitude concerning food shipments promised to the Poles, in view of the severe food shortages in that country at the present time?

● (1440)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received some information that communications have, indeed, been re-established between the embassy in Poland and Ottawa. As far as food sales are concerned, in the current circumstances Canada considers that it should not interfere with grain shipments to Poland as these constitute a major contribution towards the alleviation of the serious food situation the Polish people are facing this winter. Under our long-term agreement there are existing commitments which should be fulfilled. Other exporters, including the United States, are also fulfilling their existing commitments. The United States, of course, had not approved additional food credit for 1982, while Canada did announce, on October 29, an additional credit of $500 million to the end of 1982.

The government is extremely concerned about the situation and is monitoring it closely, in consultation with our allies. As soon as further information regarding the Polish situation is received, it will be brought to the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. This afternoon, on the radio, we heard a French journalist speaking from Vienna, who said that Russian soldiers in Polish army uniforms were intervening in Poland's domestic conflict and were firing at the people. Can the minister confirm this statement or could he perhaps find out from our embassy in Poland whether these are the facts? If such is the case, what would Canada's attitude be with respect to Soviet intervention in Poland's domestic affairs?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I have no information on the allegation which has been communicated to Senator Asselin. Yesterday afternoon I stated the general attitude of the Canadian government with respect to outside interference in this matter. For the time being, I must confine my remarks to that statement, which was provided for the information of honourable senators by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the resolutions passed at the mass rally at Toronto City Hall last evening—which was attended by me and several members of the other place, including the Honourable Paul Cosgrove—were in any way discussed by cabinet this morning, and, if so, what was the response?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course I am not at liberty to discuss what takes place at cabinet meetings and details of matters considered at such meetings. However, a description of the significant meeting in Toronto last evening has been made available to members of cabinet by the Honourable Paul Cosgrove. As a representative of the government, he was most impressed with the rally and the concerns expressed by those in attendance.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary question. In view of the fact that among the four resolutions adopted there are two of particular importance—namely, first, to press for the immediate lifting of martial law in Poland and the release of all Solidarity officials, and, second, to press for the reinstatement of the rights of workers to form free trade unions—has the minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs in any way made known to the public of Canada whether the federal government supports these two resolutions?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I presume that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will at some point make a statement on the subject. However, I do not have any such text before me at this time. The Canadian government, of course, has been very active from the outset in communicating its views to the Polish ambassador in Ottawa and in other ways. The unanimous resolutions adopted in this chamber and in the other place are certainly well known to the Polish government and to other interested parties. I shall bring any further information to the Senate when such information is available.

ENERGY

LOCATION OF PROPOSED LIQUID NATURAL GAS TERMINAL IN EASTERN CANADA—SIGNIFICANCE OF DREE GRANT

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development in relation to a question I asked him yesterday which he took as notice. It had to do with a grant of $150,000 to the City of Rivière-du-Loup with reference to a study of the harbour situation at Gros-Cacouna. I am not sure whether or not the minister is prepared to answer today, but in view of what seems to be the general expectation that an adjournment of some duration will likely take place tomorrow, I wonder if it would be possible to have the answer before that event occurs.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think that it is possible to obtain the answer before the adjournment tomorrow. However, in the event that it is not possible, I give the undertaking that I will send a communication to the honourable senator's office as soon as I receive the information. Therefore, he will not have to wait until after the Christmas adjournment.

Senator Smith: I thank the minister for his courtesy.

THE SENATE

CHRISTMAS RECESS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. When the motion to adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow was under discussion I did not have an opportunity to ask, for the information of honourable senators, whether, when we adjourn tomorrow, it will be for the Christmas recess, and, if so, when we shall reconvene after the recess. Will it be in late January or early February 1982?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the other place is adjourning until January 25, 1982. The Leader of the Opposition and I have discussed the date when the Senate should reconvene, and we soon agreed. In our opinion, at the present time there is no reason for us to come back on January 25, since we will have to await business from the other place anyway. Therefore, I propose to move tomorrow that we adjourn until the evening of Tuesday, February 2, 1982, on the understanding that if, in the meantime, there is a need to return earlier, His Honour the Speaker will exercise his powers to call us back.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PETRO-CANADA—RETAIL SALES PRACTICES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on November 3 by Senator Smith which concerned the retail sales practices of Petro-Canada. I am informed that Petro-Canada has no policy which prohibits the sale of Michelin tires in its Nova Scotia outlets. It is my understanding that managers of Petro-Canada stations are encouraged to promote Petro-Canada brand-name products and to maintain the quality standard established by Petro-Canada in all products they sell.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you mean Petrofina?

Senator Olson: Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: What is that standard?

Senator Doody: It is $120 per share.

Senator Olson: To define the standard would require me to make a long, detailed explanation. However, as has been pointed out in the reply, it says, "to maintain the quality standard established by Petro-Canada".

Senator Flynn: That is not at all convincing.

THE BUDGET

IMPACT ON PROVINCIAL AND TERRITORIAL REVENUES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if I may, I would also like to respond to a question asked on November 25 by Senator Roblin which concerned a miscalculation in a table concerning the financial arrangements from the November 12 budget. To avoid any possible confusion, I would like to make it clear that there is no problem with the budget or any of the federal accounts.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): His tongue is in his cheek.

Senator Olson: In the budget paper on fiscal arrangements proposals there was an attempt to estimate the possible effect on provincial finances of the changes proposed. Because of the complex effects of the federal tax changes on provincial tax receipts and on provincial transfer receipts under the proposed fiscal arrangements, the effect on provinces of the combination of the two was underestimated.

• (1450)

On page 43 of the budget paper outlining the Government of Canada's proposals on fiscal arrangements, the Minister of Finance noted that estimates of the financial implications of these proposals might have to be revised as new information became available. The minister also noted that one of the purposes of forthcoming federal-provincial consultations will be to review these projections and, if required, incorporate revisions based on new information provided by the provinces.

Discussions among officials on November 16 revealed that, because of an inadvertent technical error, the net impact on provincial and territorial revenues of budget tax changes and proposed modifications to established programs financing had been underestimated in table 9 of the budget paper and the more detailed information presented in table A-3 of the appendix. The revised estimate of this net impact is minus $38 million, as opposed to $169 million in 1982-83, and minus $327 million as opposed to minus $225 million in 1983-84 in the original estimate.

I should like to point out that this revision does not affect the position the minister took in his budget speech, namely, that the "increase in provincial revenues during the first two years of the new arrangements will virtually offset the reductions in transfers due to the elimination of compensation in respect of the 1972 revenue guarantee", nor does it affect any other part of the budget. I hope that is crystal clear.

Senator Macquarrie: Top prize.

THE CONSTITUTION

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 27, Senator Flynn asked if the government was satisfied with the legality of the advertising campaign in Quebec. I can say that the government is satisfied with its legality.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You can say, or you cannot say?

Senator Perrault: I can say it without equivocation.

On December 9, Senator Flynn asked if the Senate vote on the constitutional resolution gave a go-ahead to the constitutional advertising campaign in the province of Quebec. I can confirm that it did have that effect.

In response to Senator Flynn's supplementary question on December 9, regarding advertisements in weekend newspapers, I have been provided with the following information:

On the weekend of December 12 and 13, an ad was placed in Quebec dailies at a cost of $25,000 to inform Quebecers of their guaranteed rights and freedoms throughout Canada.

Senator Flynn: What a waste of money.

Senator Perrault: The information I have goes on to state:

A billboard campaign was initiated on December 9 at a cost of $50,000 covered in the estimates. Its theme is: "J'ai de la chance d'être Canadien," and again it's an informative campaign.

It is a campaign in the spirit of freedom of information.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is the right of the people to know.

Senator Perrault: The statement goes on to say:

Further campaigns will be announced when decisions are taken.

Honourable senators, with regard to the publication of advertisements in the newspapers cited by Senator Flynn, I can respond that the Government of Canada believes it has the obligation to inform Canadians throughout each development stage of legislation in order that citizens may follow and understand the debates. The Honourable Gerald Regan, Secretary of State, said in the other place:

Never has the government been more serious about its duty to communicate with the public. Never has it been more determined to communicate better, to listen attentively to the public, and to make visible the work and worth of national government. The government's presence must be visible so that it can be held to account.

The Government of Canada has an obligation towards Canadians to inform them on the constitutional resolution passed by an overwhelming majority of both houses, and with the support of the Leader of the Conservative Party—I am sure we all recall that memorable action—and to inform them of their rights and freedoms under the Charter.

As far as Quebec is concerned, the government believes it has an obligation to correct the misinformation campaign of the Parti Québécois government. Furthermore, the $8.9 million in the supplementary estimates covering the information program will cost approximately 35 cents per Canadian. The program is designed to build acceptance and broaden understanding of its importance for Canadians.

I felt I should bring this explanation to Senator Flynn's attention.

Senator Flynn: Do you not feel you should have an information campaign in provinces other than Quebec? Are you suggesting that the comprehension of Quebecers is lower than that of other Canadians?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that Senator Flynn supports an information campaign in the other provinces as well. That proposal will be brought to the attention of the government, and we will see what can be done.

Senator Flynn: You are always trying to find ways of wasting money, and here you have another one.

[Senator Perrault.]

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PETRO-CANADA—RETAIL SALES PRACTICES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question on a delayed answer given by the Minister of State for Economic Development earlier today. I have just found the reference to the question in the Debates of the Senate of November 3 to which he gave the delayed answer. I certainly agree that he has answered the question as asked.

However, as a supplementary question, has there been any individual case in Nova Scotia, since Petro-Canada began to operate retail service stations, where the proprietor of an independent station—in the sense in which the original question was asked—has been ordered or persuaded not to handle Michelin tires but to handle some other brand of tires?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not sure that the inquiry went forward on those grounds. I believe Senator Smith and myself have no disagreement that the question which was asked concerned whether Petro-Canada had a policy which prohibited its agents in Nova Scotia from selling Michelin tires. I am informed that Petro-Canada has no policy which prohibits the sale of Michelin tires in its Nova Scotia "outlets" which is probably synonymous with the word "agents".

However, if the honourable senator would like me to make some further inquiry it may be helpful, since we are talking about independent dealers that Petro-Canada may be supplying, if the honourable senator could identify those dealers so that Petro-Canada could be more specific in its response.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable minister for his further concern. However, I want to make it very clear that I was not complaining that the question I asked was not answered. It seems to me that perhaps I was not specific enough in framing my question. Now, while I am not prepared to frame it in the sense of offering a name for investigation, I think it would not be a great task for Petro-Canada to examine what has happened in relation to each one of the stations handling its products, the premises of which are owned by an individual. That is what I would be grateful to have information upon.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will do that. I was not asking Senator Smith to give me a name for identification purposes at this time, but if he would write me a confidential letter, I could pass it along. If this were done, Petro-Canada would not have to examine several hundred stations. It would be helpful to be more specific. However, if he is not prepared to do that, or for any reason would rather not, I will ask the general question in any event.

Senator Smith: I am encouraged not to try to be too specific because my belief is—knowing what I think I know—that the number of stations owned, operated or somehow served by Petro-Canada in Nova Scotia, the premises of which are independently owned, is not very large and, therefore, I do not think this would be a heavy task.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

IRAQI NATIONAL TROUPE FOR FOLK ARTS AND THE AMBASSADOR OF IRAQ

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would draw your attention to the gallery where we have the honour of receiving the Iraqi National Troupe for Folk Arts, which troupe is accompanied by the Ambassador of Iraq.

● (1500)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence of the Senate to add my special welcome to the folkloric group from Iraq and to His Excellency the Ambassador, and to indicate that on Sunday evening this group, fresh from their triumph at the United Nations, are giving a concert at the National Arts Centre, of which the distinguished Chairman of the External Affairs and National Defence Committee of the other place and myself are patrons. I wish to assure you that we are not performers but patrons! If honourable senators and their spouses are available on Sunday evening and would like to see this world famous dancing group, I think I could use my good offices with the director and His Excellency to find a place for them at the National Arts Centre.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

MEAT IMPORT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill C-46, to regulate the importation into Canada of fresh, chilled and frozen meat and to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Canadian livestock industry is going through a very difficult period with extremely high input costs and, unfortunately, inadequate returns from the marketplace. Regrettably, this is not a new circumstance. It has been going on for some years and the Senate has been conscious of this situation.

In 1977, on page 1 of a report from the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, the following statement was made:

The Canadian beef industry over the last three years has suffered drastic economic and social shocks. Beef producers have seen prices become severely depressed and production costs increased to unprecedented levels.

Four years later the situation is almost the same. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture is engaged in further study of the problems of this industry. At the same time, beef remains the number one item in the consumer's shopping basket. Therefore, anything that we can do to help to stabilize the industry for the producer, and to guarantee the consumer continued supplies at reasonable prices, should be done.

The Meat Import Bill that we have before us today is intended to assist in doing just that. I do not suggest that it is going to solve all the problems of the industry, but it is one of the tools that will help do the job.

Canada is both an exporter and importer of beef. About 90 per cent of our imports come from Australia and New Zealand. They are chiefly to service the lower end of the hotel, restaurant and institutional trade, and for further manufacturing into meat pies and various processed products.

The United States is the supplier of the other 10 per cent of our beef imports. This beef is primarily the high-quality cuts for the deluxe restaurant and hotel business. We export approximately a hundred million pounds a year, with 92 per cent of that going to the United States.

Until now, Canada has been the only major beef importing country in the world that has not had an ongoing policy to control the import of beef. This has left us vulnerable to distortions in the market, and to international price swings that are beyond our control.

We have been using an ad hoc import quota on a periodic basis, but that has led to uncertainties both for the Canadian producer and for our international trading partners. This bill would put permanent controls in place. All sectors of the beef and veal industry, including consumers, have been pressing for such import controls.

The Senate and, in particular, honourable senators who have been active on the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, can take a great deal of satisfaction in seeing this bill before them after its having been passed by the House of Commons.

In December 1976, the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture began its study entitled: "Inquiry into the desirability of long-term stabilization in the Canadian beef industry." The committee held 14 days of hearings in Ottawa. It then went out to the provinces, and had 9 days of hearings in five different provinces. The committee produced its report in October 1977.

Admittedly, the bill which is before us is not identical to the proposals of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, but, basically, it is the same. It varies in one important particular, that is the inclusion of live cattle. The present bill does not include live cattle, and the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture had been that live cattle should be included. Nevertheless, in fairness, that particular recommendation of the standing committee is probably the one that was most controversial. It did not receive unanimous support from the beef cattle industry when we held our hearings. Nevertheless, it had been our view that that should be proceeded with.

The final report, however, was very clear in its broad recommendations. I should like to read to you from the conclusion of that report of October 1977, as follows:

Beef producers from across Canada have asked the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to recommend both an effective import control policy for beef and legislation to implement it. The Committee is convinced that this request is a reasonable and necessary request. The events of the past decade and the evidence presented to the Committee prove that the Canadian beef market is vulnerable to damage by foreign beef supplies and the Canadian beef producers have much higher costs of production than do producers in New Zealand, Australia and the United States. It is obvious that to prevent the further erosion of our beef industry Canada must adopt and implement a long-term beef import policy.

The then chairman of the committee, Senator Argue, speaking at a news conference on the same day that the report was tabled, said:

This Committee has heard many suggestions from ministers of agriculture, producer organizations, government officials, academics and from producers themselves at public meetings throughout the country. Now as one might expect there was some disagreement about how to bring stability to the beef industry yet on one subject there was unanimity—Canada must develop a policy to regulate imports or the beef industry would slowly wither and die.

So, honourable senators, the bill now before us has resulted from those recommendations.

The Senate took further action. In February 1979 Bill S-13 was introduced in the Senate and was discussed. Unfortunately, because of an election being called, the bill died on the order paper, and we could not proceed with the next step, which the committee recommended, which was to have legislative action. I am pleased, however, that the other place has taken up the proposal and has followed through with the bill that is now before us.

Canada is a trading nation and we have an interest in keeping trade as free and as unrestricted as possible. The bill recognizes that important fact, while, at the same time, taking the necessary steps to ensure that Canadian farmers and consumers are not jeopardized by actions in other countries. This bill would establish a long-term import policy rather than continue the ad hoc policies under which we have been operating. I believe it will provide for the protection of both producers and consumers.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to ask two questions of the honourable senator. First, is it possible that there will be any retaliation on the part of the United States that will affect Canadian exports to the United States; and, secondly, what, in the opinion of the honourable senator, will be the effect of the proposed bill on consumers?

Senator Molgat: In reply to the honourable senator's first question, there really should be no reaction on the part of the United States, because they have had this kind of law for many years, and our law is patterned on theirs. Therefore, there would be no reason for their taking action against us if we are simply doing the same thing as they have already done. I should also point out that they have amended their law—I believe it took effect at the beginning of 1980—to provide for the counter-cyclical suggestion that we had originally made in our committee report. So we are on a par with them, and I cannot see any adverse action emanating from them.

[Senator Molgat.]

With regard to the effect on consumers, obviously, when we impose an import restriction or a quota, consumers say, "This must do something to raise prices." That is not really the intent of this bill. Its intent is to stabilize prices. One of the problems in the beef industry has been the up-and-down price situation, resulting in great instability in the market. That, in turn, leads to instability in production; so there are periods of glut and periods of shortage.

The committee, in its deliberations, did not believe that it was to the advantage of consumers to have those great shifts, and it considered that both consumers and producers would be better served by having stability. Furthermore, this is not a quota preventing imports. The quota is based on the long-term average—I believe that in the bill it is based on imports during the period 1970-74. The bill will simply stabilize and will not cut out imports.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill C-46 is to establish, by legislation, a mechanism to set quotas on beef imports based on the average level of imports during the 1971-75 period.

Senator Molgat has already traced the history of this legislation. Canada has needed beef import legislation for years. Therefore, we, on this side of the house, support the broad provisions of the bill.

It is a well known fact that our government established a beef import consultative committee in 1979, and a bill, the predecessor of the present bill, was to have been introduced on that fateful day two years ago.

Canada needs long-term policies to inject confidence into the beef industry, to enable people to remain in the industry and to encourage those in the industry to expand—perhaps even to promote entrance of newcomers into the industry.

Prior to 1976, Canada was virtually an unrestricted market for beef imports. In 1976 record amounts of beef were imported from Australia and New Zealand. That came at a time when Canadian beef production was running at peak levels. As a result, Canadian beef prices decreased; Canadian beef and cattle were exported to the U.S., contributing to a decline in the U.S. beef prices, which threatened the disruption of the Canada-U.S. cattle trade; and many Canadian beef and feedlot operators went deeply into debt.

As honourable senators know, beef imports are presently regulated by the Export and Import Permits Act, but that is obviously inadequate as it provides no formula for setting import quotas.

I have already stated that we support the bill. However, we are concerned about the amount of ministerial discretion being granted in this proposed law, which would allow more imports to enter than the formula set. We are concerned and feel that such powers should, in this and other legislation, be narrowly prescribed and clearly defined. However, having stated our concerns, we, on this side of the house, support quick passage of the bill. We suggest that it need not go to committee and that we approve third reading of the bill today.

Some hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Tomorrow.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, with regard to Bill C-46, I believe I attended nearly every hearing going back to 1977, and I suppose that the beef industry in Canada today is in more trouble than it has been since the late 1930s. I believe that people in the feedlot business, who were purchasing cattle for 70 or 75 cents a pound in September, and who would be selling them in January at the prices then current, had prices remained the same, would probably have lost $50 per head. Since that time, the reduction in prices during the past two weeks would bring them further losses of as much as $200 per head. So, for a 1,000-pound steer, for which they were hoping to get 85 cents per pound yesterday, they would now be getting 60 cents per pound.

I, too, would like to see early passage of the bill; but it seems to me that this is an extremely important bill. After all, we did a good deal of work on the initial part of the bill, and there are still people involved in the beef industry whom we should hear from. I think this bill, in particular, should go to committee. After all, it is almost four years and two elections since we started working on the bill, and I do not think another month or five weeks will matter. We may not improve on the bill, but we can certainly become a great deal more familiar with some of the problems that beef producers and others involved in the beef business are having from the time the animal leaves the feed lot until it gets into the supermarket.

While I agree with Senator Bielish that early passage would help in some ways, our imports from Australia and New Zealand have not yet reached the quantity that is allowed at this particular time in terms of the quotas set through agreement. I think imports of something like 145 million pounds are permitted. Under this bill increases are allowed as the population increases, but those totals have not been reached as of now.

If there is one problem that we are having, it is in connection with live beef. Hundreds and hundreds of cattle, as I understand it, came into Ontario today, and I understand they will be on the market right after Christmas, but they are not affected by this bill because, as I say, it does not include live cattle. I discussed this aspect this morning with the Minister of Agriculture, and he said that it is rather difficult to include live cattle in the bill because of the problems this might entail. In my capacity as Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, however, I discussed the problem today with the Deputy Chairman, Senator Sparrow, and he agrees that the bill should be referred to committee.

Personally, I would like to see the committee call representatives from some of the beef trades. I would like to hear what the packing industry has to say about the beef industry today. The province of Alberta, that used to have many packing houses, is now down to four. Some areas in Canada have only one. The maritimes are serviced by hardly anybody. These are very important matters.

This industry is in a lot of trouble, and I think that a delay of another month or five weeks would not be a matter of life or death at this particular time. I am perfectly willing to abide by the decision of the house, but I do really feel that the bill should go to committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am in the somewhat rare, and, I must say, happy position, of saying that the government supports the intervention of the opposition on this bill.

I have tried to inform myself of the background referred to by Senator Hays. I agree with everything he has said about the work of the committee, and I must say that I find the Agriculture Committee's report very persuasive in its support of the need for some provisions relating to live cattle. However, without in any way setting myself up against the chairman of the committee, who is an expert as far as the beef industry is concerned, I have to say, on behalf of the government—and I have also been in touch with the department today—that although the additional inquiries the committee wants to make should be encouraged, the matter seems to come down to this, that half a loaf is better than none. None of the investigations or evidence that Senator Hays has referred to with regard to the packing industry, or anything else, if I understand him rightly, is going to change in any way what is in this bill; they will simply add to it.

I ask honourable senators to support passage of this bill along the lines suggested by Senator Bielish—that is, that we give it three readings, if possible, this week, take our half loaf, and then go to work on the rest of the loaf with Senator Hays, supporting and encouraging him in what he wants to do.

Senator Hays: May I ask Senator Frith a question? He mentioned that he does not think it would be useful to call in the packers. I just do not quite follow him.

Senator Frith: I did not say that, honourable senators. What I did say was that I thought it would be useful for this excellent committee—I say that sincerely—to call in the packers and everyone else it wants to, but I have heard no suggestion that the proposed additional inquiries are directed towards changing the provisions of the bill. The government's position, therefore, is that we should indeed take the half loaf we have and call in the packers subsequently with the object of adding to what we do today, thus making the scheme of the bill even more complete.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, let me reply first, in closing the debate, to some comments made by Senator Bielish regarding the discretionary powers of the minister. I recognize that these exist. They are similar to certain provisions in the American bill, under which the President has discretionary powers, although, admittedly, such powers are greater in this bill than they are in the American import law. I think we have to recognize, nevertheless, that it is virtually impossible, particularly at this stage, to set rigid figures each year on import quotas, and as a consequence reasonable leeway ought to be provided the minister.

I point out further that there will be an advisory board. The members of this advisory board will be drawn from the whole range of the industry—from producers to people involved in the marketing end, and consumer interests. The minister will, therefore, have other input. In other words, while his discretion will exist, it will be based on the recommendations of an advisory board.

Let me deal now with the comments of Senator Hays. First of all, I agree totally with what he says about the present state of the industry. It is in a very serious condition, and that is something that Canadians have to be very concerned about. If we do not proceed to correct certain things in that industry, we may well find that Canada will not have a beef industry, and that we will be relying on outside sources for one of our basic requirements. I do not think that any nation can allow that situation to develop.

With reference to the specific request that the bill should be referred to committee, I find myself in an awkward position. I have always maintained that we ought to send all bills to committee, for committee work is something that the Senate does particularly well. Sending bills to committee should be standard practice, because this provides the opportunity for greater input, and so on. Under the present circumstances, however, I find myself in difficulty with regard to recommending a referral to committee at this stage. I recall that in 1977 the Agriculture Committee spent a year studying this question. At that time, as I read to you earlier, a very specific proposal was made to the effect that there ought to be a beef import law. That was in October 1977, and we are now in December of 1981, and we have an opportunity to pass this bill. While the bill is not everything that we asked for at that time, there is nothing in it that is contrary to what we asked for. It does not go as far as we wanted, but it certainly does not go contrary to what we wanted. If we do not pass the bill now, I am afraid we will be faced with another year of operating under the ad hoc rules, and under the import-export law, which is not satisfactory for this purpose.

Therefore, I say to Senator Hays, a former Minister of Agriculture, that it is not desirable under the circumstances to delay passage of this bill. With this measure, the Minister of Agriculture will have long-term manoeuvrability for the coming year, instead of having to deal with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the Export and Import Permits Act and having to go through the negotiations, as we now have to every year under that act, with Australia and New Zealand in order to try to arrive at some understanding. Would it not be better to pass the bill now and empower the minister to act under it? We, in our committee, can proceed with further investigations.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Molgat.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Molgat: With leave, now.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I suggest that the bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the Senate, just in case Senator Hays finds a better argument than the one he now has.

Senator Molgat: Very well.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hayden, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1981-82

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-86, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my assistant, Morley Verdier, pointed out to me this morning that, while I was under the spell of the eloquence of the Honourable Senator Frith, I neglected to mention an important point that I wanted to make. If I may, honourable senators, I would like to make that point now.

With regard to the public debt, I wanted to say that the cost of the public debt now equals the payments for economic development, defence, and transfer payments to the provinces. These are three highly important items, honourable senators, and they do not absorb our tax payments to the extent that the public debt program does. I felt that the record should reflect that these three items are not as expensive as the public debt.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, although I cannot quarrel with the figures because I do not know whether or not they are correct, I am prepared to accept what Senator Phillips has said as far as the arithmetic is concerned. I would, however, repeat what I said yesterday—namely, that the government and I agree with Senator Phillips' statement that the cost of serving the public debt is too high; it is unacceptably high. One of the objectives of the budget put forward by the Minister of Finance is to reduce that public debt and thereby reduce the cost of servicing it.

I have nothing else to add on third reading, honourable senators.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would just point out that that objective would have been advanced greatly if we had not had the change of government that we in fact had two years ago. The present federal government had to save face with regard to the promise that the price of oil would not be adjusted, as was proposed by the former government. In that saving of face, we have lost two years. In any event, we will see what will happen.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: I cannot agree with what the leader of the opposition has just stated, but I can tell him that I would do the same if I were in his place!

Senator Flynn: Fine, I am going to fix that.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill C-84, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, when speaking earlier today on the retirement of our colleague Senator Laird, my friend the Honourable Senator Flynn indicated that Senator Laird had once made the terrible mistake of talking about a "simple" bill. I would not describe Bill C-84 as being "simple", but I will say to Senator Flynn and my honourable colleagues that it is at least the shortest bill that we have had before our chamber in quite some time, especially when compared to some of the pieces of legislation that have recently been sent here by the government. It consists of a total of 10 lines. I hope, with your indulgence, that we will be able to deal with it reasonably quickly.

Honourable senators, it is a pleasure for me to place before the Senate Bill C-84, which is a bill to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. It is a simple amendment to an act which has already received wide support. You will notice that I did not say that it is an "easy" amendment; I merely said that it is a "simple" amendment. It may have been the wrong word for me to use. If I could strike it out of Hansard I would, but I have said it.

Honourable senators, as you will recall, the Small Businesses Loans Act was renewed for a further two-year period in June 1980. At that time three things were done: the limit on the size of individual loans was raised from $75,000 to $100,000; the act was extended for a two-year period; and the lending ceiling for the two-year period was set at $850 million.

The particular amendment proposed in Bill C-84 really speaks for the extreme popularity of the program. The small business community has responded with great increases in the demand for loans, and those increases have been larger than anticipated. In fact, honourable senators, by June 30, 1981, approximately $505 million had been guaranteed. In other words, in the first year of the new two-year lending period there was an increase of 64 per cent over the last year of the previous period.

If the present trend continues, the original ceiling of $850 million will be reached before June 30, 1982. Therefore, Bill C-84 proposes—and it is the sole purpose of the bill—to raise the ceiling by $650 million, to an overall total for the period of $1.5 billion. In other words, instead of its present statutory limitation of $850 million, the ceiling will be raised to $1.5 billion.

Such an increase, honourable senators, will provide for the current accelerated lending with a reasonable cushion, thereby allowing the program to continue without interruption until June 30, 1982, when the act will again be considered for renewal.

Before I close my brief presentation, honourable senators, I wish to make one or two remarks about the Small Businesses Loans Act, just to refresh your memories. Basically, the act is for businesses that do less than $1½ million a year in sales volume. It has been in operation since 1961. It is a loan program which goes through the chartered banks, trust companies, credit unions and other financial institutions under normal procedures, but applications that are approved by the lending authorities are guaranteed by the Government of Canada. The rate is set at 1 per cent above prime rate. Basically, therefore, it allows small businesses to borrow from financial institutions at a rate which they would probably not otherwise obtain.

The loans are judged on sound business practices. There is a right of appeal, and a few appeals do go on to the minister. When I inquired, I found that of the appeals to the minister by applicants whose loan requests to financial institutions had been declined, 15 per cent had in fact been granted later as a result of a review by the financial organization involved.

The loss ratio may interest you. Since 1961 the total payments by the Government of Canada against the guarantees made for these substantial hundreds of millions of dollars involved had been less than $10 million to the end of December 31, 1980. I think you will agree with me that that is a successful program.

I have some brief statistics which may interest you. The service and retail trade, which really represents small business generally in the country, took up about two-thirds of the total percentage of the loans in 1980. It is interesting to note that about 58.3 per cent of the total loans in 1980 were for the purchase of movable equipment. If senators wish any further detail, it can be provided.

There has been a substantial increase in the demand for this kind of accommodation, which has been of great service to small businesses. Honourable senators, I ask for your support of this bill and hope that it will receive your endorsement today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, first I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Buckwold for his introduction, particularly for making it brief. It is always a pleasure to listen to the Honourable Senator Buckwold, especially when he is brief. I hope I will be able to follow the same pattern.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: In particular, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his kind endorsement.

Senator Flynn: That's his job.

Senator Phillips: After all, he gets paid for it; I don't.

Senator Frith: For my endorsement?

Senator McElman: Your speech is getting longer and longer.

Senator Flynn: Because of the interruptions.

Senator Phillips: If you keep interrupting me, Senator McElman, we'll be here until midnight.

This time yesterday afternoon, when I was involved in a debate, I was voicing my concerns about taxation. I am happy to note that the measure now before us does not involve taxation. It does not cost the taxpayer a cent. In other words, it is good Conservative philosophy; and I am pleased to see the government, and Senator Buckwold in particular, adopting good Conservative philosophy. It is to be hoped, honourable senators, that we will find more measures of this kind coming before us in the future.

Honourable senators, it may be unfair of me to mention bankruptcies under this act, so I will not do so, except to point out that in the month of November there were 790 bankruptcies of small businesses. I am sure that after the oil price increases and the various other measures introduced in the budget have their effect we will find far more bankruptcies among small businesses.

The sponsor of the bill referred to increased demand for loans. As a businessman, he must know that there is something wrong when the demand exceeds the supply.

Honourable senators, we should ask ourselves why there was such a need for this legislation. Admittedly, this legislation is good Conservative philosophy, but it is also good Conservative philosophy to avoid this kind of demand. Why was there such a demand for the loans? I would ask the honourable senator to tell us something about that when he is closing the debate.

It is unfortunate that the sponsor of this bill did not go outside the bill. I wish that he had taken the privilege allowed him on second reading and had discussed the problems facing small business. He missed a wonderful opportunity. I am rather disappointed that this chamber has missed this opportunity, so I shall take just a few moments to point out some of those lost opportunities.

The budget of November 12 dealt with an associated measure, the small business development bond. I do not think it is necessary to explain to the chamber the small business development bond, which is another example of good Conservative philosophy. In fact, I believe that the small business development bond was introduced in the so-called Crosbie budget. Basically, it provided certain tax incentives to banks to make low-interest rate loans to small businesses.

The last budget, or, to use the Prime Minister's terminology, the "dire straits" budget, reduced those tax incentives by at least 3 percentage points and made it far more difficult for small businesses to survive in this uneconomic economic atmosphere created by the government. It said that the small business development bond would apply only to those businesses in "dire straits"—again, the Prime Minister's favourite situation. If, for example, a small businessman were to go to his bank manager and say, "I can prove that I am in dire straits and that I am in need of a small business development bond. I would also like to take advantage of the legislation presently before the Senate," I am sure that the bank manager would say, "Don't slam the door on the way out". If Senator Buckwold really believes that we will use up the additional guarantees provided under this act, would he explain to me how those two situations will twine? In my opinion, they will not meet.

While I do not wish to create the impression that I am dealing with the budget, policies outlined therein have created a situation which reflects on this bill. If I may have your attention for a few moments, I would like to deal with that aspect of the budget which says that interest cannot be deducted until the investment brings in a return. Let us consider a situation where a small businessman is considering expanding his plant and it will take two years for the development to be completed. The first thing he must do is borrow the money for the expansion and ensure that there is a line of credit available to him over the two-year period.

Prior to the November 12 budget the interest paid on that loan could have been deducted, but now the interest on the loan cannot be deducted until revenue is derived from the development. Or, to give another example, suppose he buys a piece of equipment. When can he deduct the cost of the interest on the loan he had to make to purchase that piece of equipment? Will it be one year or two years down the road? Will the sponsor of the bill tell us how this matter relates to the bill?

Let us look at the situation from the standpoint of a farmer buying a combine, an item with which I am sure Senator Buckwold is familiar. When will that combine begin to produce revenue if it is bought in December, as a great many of them are because of the reduced prices? Will it be next September or when the farmer begins harvesting? Where is the deduction for the interest payments? I presume that the cabinet minister who introduced this legislation will say that the government has assisted small businesses by doubling the amount of guarantees under this act. I agree that it has, and it is a very important step. However, there are other items which must be considered as opposed to simply taking numbers out of a hat. Many other problems are being neglected, and I hope that the government will give them some consideration.

• (1600)

Honourable senators will recall that the Prime Minister spent a great deal of time this summer in Africa telling those people how to develop their small businesses, their crafts industry, and so on. Meanwhile, at home, Canadian businessmen were wishing he would at least recognize their problems.

They probably do not want his advice—and I do not blame them in that regard.

Honourable senators, let us remember that this situation is rather like one you find in a hospital where a patient is on an intravenous of glucose and water in order to stay alive. While that helps, it is not a cure for the ailment. What small and large businesses need is an economic policy which will attempt to cure the malady afflicting Canadian business. I hope the sponsor of the bill will be able to give us some indication that we will deal with the problem in some way other than borrowing more money.

I would remind honourable senators that at a meeting of a committee to discuss a Farm Credit Corporation bill I said that the farmer who was going bankrupt could say that if he were younger the government would lend him more money. The late Senator A. H. McDonald, who came from Senator Buckwold's province, came to me afterwards and said that he did not think the other members of the committee had understood the point I was trying to make in the course of that story. I also do not think that they did, because the government has continued to borrow money at today's high interest rates. Farmers and small businessmen cannot pay those exorbitant rates.

Honourable senators, under this legislation we are doing exactly the same thing, which is, lending more money at higher interest rates, and we are forcing more and more businesses into bankruptcy but, at the same time, we are hoping to keep their heads above water. Honourable senators should have a look at that head and the water before going too far with legislation of this type.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I have to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Buckwold speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-86.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Phillips for the "budget debate". It seems to me that he strayed rather far from the limited ambit of this particular bill.

Senator Phillips: You mean your limited viewpoint?

Senator Buckwold: Will you let me finish my sentence?

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Buckwold: My viewpoint is not so limited that I cannot look over and see your smiling face, which is always an encouragement.

I recognize the temptation of every member of this chamber, when talking about small business, to rise and say that there are serious problems. We all recognize that fact. I believe the government recognizes that. I am sure that, when we come to the discussion of the budget, we will have ample opportunity to look at the proposals which the government has put forward and note those which it did not put forward.

I can assure Senator Phillips that I fully support many of the things he has said, although I sit on this side of the chamber, and I am sure many other senators also share his view that business and agriculture, generally, are facing serious problems which are very often the result of high interest rates, restricted consumer demand, limited exports, and a world-wide economic slow down. I hate to use the word "recession" but, obviously, the Americans are in that type of economic situation at the present time, and its effects will ripple into Canada, its largest trading partner.

Rather than argue with my good friend Senator Phillips, in many ways I would agree that there are very serious problems and that this bill does not attempt to solve them. This act follows the splendid example set by Mr. Diefenbaker, my late and very good friend, who recognized that there was a problem with small business and instituted a program that was useful through good times and, I might say, bad. This has had an increasing application and usefulness to small business for the last 20 years, and not just for the last year. It has been growing steadily.

It is not just as a result of difficult economic times that there is a demand for loans. It is the fact that it is a very popular program which does allow businesses to borrow at what used to be a reasonable rate—one per cent above prime. Hopefully, it will be at that level some day again.

I hope Senator Phillips will excuse me if I do not attempt to deal, on an individual basis, with the questions he has posed. They are very important questions and I am sure that during the budget debate they will be thoroughly discussed and that there will be many on this side who will share his sentiments.

Of course, there has been a great increase in loans, but part of that situation is directly related to the inflationary aspect of the economy. In other words, a small or a large businessman needs more and more bank loans to finance his business, even if the business is standing still, just because of our present economic situation. I am sure we all devoutly hope that that situation will ease.

I appreciate the honourable senator's comments and agree that small business has many problems. I am suggesting that, in responding to a very small part of that need, the bill that we have before us today, which I have had the honour to introduce, in a small way does help. It carries on the tradition to assist small business, that Senator Phillips spoke of, which started in 1961.

I appreciate what Senator Phillips has said, and I can certainly understand why he could not resist the temptation to say what he did, and I think it deserved saying. Having pointed that out, I again respectfully submit that, in its own limited way, the provisions of this bill will assist small business to a further degree, and I would ask your support.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA OIL AND GAS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill C-48, to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill has been reported by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce without amendment, but with certain comments. Those comments related to the report on the subject matter of the bill. On third reading I propose not to go further into those matters, but Senator Smith raised quite an important question at the conclusion of the debate on second reading which I did not answer fully at that time. If the honourable senator is agreeable, I am quite prepared to answer now, but perhaps he would wish to speak first.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his courtesy; perhaps he would not mind answering now, and then I would have the answer before me when I do speak, as I intend to, very briefly.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, at the conclusion of my remarks on second reading, Senator Smith asked me a question which I did not fully answer. Perhaps I could paraphrase his question in this way: Does the definition of "Canada lands" in Bill C-48 in any way deny or derogate from the claims of provinces to jurisdiction over offshore oil and gas resources on the east and west coasts of Canada, including Sable Island, and will this definition endanger the negotiations now under way between the Government of Canada and the Governments of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland? The honourable senator actually poses three questions in one, and I should like to separate them for the purpose of clarification.

The first question concerns the provincial claims to jurisdiction over offshore oil and gas resources. Perhaps at this point it would be useful if I simply read clause 2 of the bill:

(1) In this Act . . .

"Canada lands" means lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources and that are situated in

(a) the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories, or Sable Island, or

(b) those submarine areas, not within a province, adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the base-lines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is the greater;

Dealing with the first question, it should be evident that this clause does not derogate from any province claiming that offshore oil and gas resources fall "within a province". This point is clear and we are not at issue on it.

The honourable senator refers to Sable Island in his second question. I should like to put on the record section 108 of the British North America Act, 1867. It reads as follows:

The Public Works and Property of each Province, enumerated in the Third Schedule to this Act, shall be the Property of Canada.

The relevant part of the third schedule of the B.N.A. Act reads as follows:

3. Lighthouses and piers, and Sable Island.

That would seem to support the argument—and I do not propose to develop a legal argument here—that Sable Island is under federal jurisdiction. If at some point it should be found by the courts that this is not the case, then I would think that the bill would not apply to Sable Island. However, the relevant section appears to suggest otherwise.

The third question posed is whether this clause will affect the negotiations now under way between the Government of Canada and the Governments of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. I should indicate that these negotiations do not address ownership. Rather, they concern joint management of resources and the sharing of resource revenues. I take it that Senator Smith is referring to these negotiations, and this bill does not, in any way, affect the ownership question. The question of revenue-sharing is not yet resolved.

I believe that disposes of the three questions. It does leave the Sable Island question open for argument, however long and complicated. Fortunately, that is a decision that the courts would have to make. If the courts decide, for whatever reason, that any part of the offshore is not within federal jurisdiction, then it is simply excluded from the legislation. The provinces are free to assert any claims over federally-administered territories.

I hope that deals satisfactorily with the point that Senator Smith raised. I apologize for not giving him the full answer the other evening, but I believe he understands and appreciates that it was better to do it this way.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments on third reading. I should like to begin by thanking the Honourable Senator McIlraith for his very full answer, and to tell him that I do appreciate his very sound reasoning for not wishing to answer it without having the opportunity to consider what it really meant and what its implications are.

I should like to refer to the last two portions of his answer, not with the idea of getting into an argument about it with him now, but just to put on the record my belief that there is an argument and, indeed, a very solid one. I am aware, of course—and honourable senators have heard me argue this more than once—that there is the provision he mentions in the British North America Act regarding Sable Island. A careful reading of that act, and of the history relating to the island, will demonstrate that the reference to Sable Island in what is merely a schedule to the act, and lumping it in with light-houses and wharves, really is a shorthand way of referring to the humane institutions which then existed on Sable Island and were maintained by the Province of Nova Scotia. It was not intended to convey away from Nova Scotia something which Nova Scotia had exercised jurisdiction and ownership over for more than a century—ever since 1713, I believe.

I merely wanted to show that there is an opposite side to the inference drawn by the honourable senator as to the meaning of those particular words in the schedule to the British North America Act.

I agree with him also that in the matter of negotiations the present negotiations are not concerned with ownership of Sable Island or of the offshore rights on what is generally referred to as the continental shelf. They are concerned with other matters such as administration, control and revenues. But I do wish to say that when two parties are negotiating over the control and administration of a certain asset, and the revenue to be derived from it, the matter of who owns it is a substantial factor to take into consideration in those negotiations. If one side believes that the ownership resides in that side, that the other side has no claim whatever to it, then, obviously, in the course of negotiations, that party is going to be substantially affected by its belief in its ownership.

Therefore, I believe the question of ownership is an important one in respect of the negotiations, even though those negotiations are not specifically concerned with it. I was glad to hear the honourable senator say that, so far as he could see, unless the courts decided that some or all of the area mentioned in the definition are within Canada, then Bill C-48 does not affect the ownership. That, I take it, leaves things exactly as they are now with regard to that item. I was therefore glad to receive his answer, and I again thank him for it.

With regard to the bill itself, I do not wish to go into any great detail. Most of my objections were raised by Senator Roblin on second reading, in his thorough-going discussion of the bill. His remarks, for anyone who is interested in seeing them either now or in the future, will be found in Debates of the Senate for December 15, beginning at page 3463.

What I object to most seriously is the retroactive effect of the legislation, particularly with respect to the crown share as it is dealt with in clause 28 of the bill. It is a short clause, and therefore I shall read it. It says:

No crown share is reserved out of a former lease under which oil or gas was first produced, other than for test purposes, on or before December 31, 1980 or in respect of any interest that succeeds any such former lease.

That makes perfectly clear that the crown share has a retroactive effect. That retroactive effect I object to.

Honourable senators will recall the masterful exposition of the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on the reference to that committee of the subject matter of Bill C-48. That exposition begins on page 3453 of the Debates of the Senate for December 15. It was not a report of the committee in the ordinary sense, and the distinguished chairman referred to what he was going to say in the following words—which I believe is important to remember:

Honourable senators, what I propose to do this evening is to state the conclusions reached by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred the subject matter of Bill C-48 and related matters.

So he was simply saying what, in his opinion, were the conclusions of the committee. In his statement as to the conclusions of the committee he dealt with the matter of retroactivity at some length and pointed out that the crown share was, in fact, a retroactive acquisition of certain rights of others.

The paragraph that I wish to read is found on page 3455 of the Hansard to which I have already referred. It begins near the bottom of the page, and says:

The committee has consistently registered its disapproval of legislation which adversely and retroactively affects a third party. The committee agrees that a royalty or tax may be imposed or increased, and as such it may have retroactive effect. The crown share is not, however, a royalty or tax; it is the acquisition of someone else's rights. The committee therefore agrees that clause 28 of the bill should be amended.

That is the clause I read a few moments ago:

The major portion of the amendment is:

28. No crown share is reserved out of . . .

(b) a former lease or former permit on which the drilling of a well was commenced prior to December 9, 1980 and such well subsequently becomes a significant discovery.

It seems to me that it is perfectly clear that the chairman, in placing before the Senate what he referred to as the conclusions of the committee, was making it clear that the committee considered the effect of clause 28 to be retroactively taking away the rights of people who had dealt with a lease in the way to which he referred. He then made it clear that the committee's conclusion was that it was retroactive and was contrary, in principle, to what the Senate had been—and I hope still is—definitely opposed to over the years.

Today we received from the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce the committee's report resulting from reference to it of the actual bill following second reading. I regret to say that the committee did not see fit to authorize him to place in the report the same comment about retroactivity which, in his opinion, he considered was proper for him to state when dealing with the conclusions of the committee concerning the subject matter. Indeed, clause 28—on which the conclusion of the committee, as stated by the chairman, was that it should be amended—is referred to in the report presented today in the following terms:

• (1630)

With respect to Clause 28, the Minister has made the following undertaking:

Then there is a quotation at some length from the minister's undertaking, which reads as follows:

I am writing to confirm the undertaking I made earlier today before your committee with respect to the fiscal regime applicable to the Canada lands. I believe there is agreement that the Canada lands have the potential to make an important contribution to Canada's energy future. Within the limits imposed by the need to ensure that the pace of oil and gas development is consistent with the local social and economic requirements and with Canada's energy needs, it would be desirable to have increased exploration activity in the Canada lands. I believe the price and fiscal regime we have set out will ensure that this occurs. I would like to confirm, however, that I will monitor the situation closely, and if it appears that the fiscal regime is not having the intended effect, I will be prepared to make the appropriate alterations.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not very strong.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is very reassuring.

Senator Smith: It may be reassuring to a true believer in advance, such as the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, but it is certainly not very reassuring, and cannot be even to him, so far as I can see, on the question of retroactivity. The minister's commitment, or whatever you want to call it—the report calls it an undertaking—does not even mention that question. So far as that undertaking is concerned, the question of retroactivity does not even seem to exist.

I was present at the meeting and I heard what was said by the minister. It is clear that he believes that it is perfectly all right to apply the principle of retroactivity in these circumstances, and that he is not prepared even to acknowledge that it is an unusual thing and should not happen unless there is some extraordinary circumstance to justify it. As I say, there is absolutely nothing in the report to indicate that the minister has any other view but that retroactivity is a good thing, or good in these circumstances, anyway.

Senator Frith: It is an implication in clause 1 of the comments; that is, the suggested amendment to clause 28.

Senator Smith: Clause 1 of what?

[Senator Smith.]

Senator Frith: Of the report. The suggested change to clause 28 certainly implies that the concept of retroactivity was taken into account.

Senator Smith: There is nothing whatever in the undertaking of the minister about it, and it is perfectly clear that the minister believes in it, because I heard him say so.

Senator Frith: I am sorry; I have given the wrong impression. I did not mean to say that there is anything implied to the effect that the minister was concerned about retroactivity in this case. I thought the honourable senator was also criticizing the committee's report for the same reason. I am only saying that in the committee's report, because of what it says on clause 28, it looks as if it did give consideration to retroactivity, because the form the amendment takes does take that into account.

Senator Smith: If my honourable friend wishes me to get into a discussion on what went on in committee with regard to this matter, I will be very happy to do so. The matter that appears in the report with regard to clause 28—what the honourable deputy leader referred to, I think, as clause 1 of the report—is the least that possibly could have been said. It does not give any recognition to the fact that the committee still believes that retroactivity is a bad thing. I am not criticizing the report in any other way. I think the majority of the members of the committee were prepared to say that, in the circumstances, they were ready to accept these words which I have quoted of the minister—which were substantially the same as those he used in his evidence before the committee—as giving some reassurance. Well, I do not see anything reassuring about them. He is merely saying what any minister would say about any bill or any program, even if he were not being criticized for it. It would be a poor minister who would not be prepared to monitor very carefully the situation covered by a bill. Any such minister, whoever he might be, would indeed be a poor minister also if he were not prepared to make the appropriate alterations, if it ever appeared that the bill was not having the intended effect. Who would not? Any minister with any sense would do so, and any minister who was not prepared to take that stand would not last very long as a minister. Even if he were not removed by the public he would be removed by his master or colleagues.

The point I am making is that the minister believes, as shown by these words of his containing the maximum undertaking that he is prepared to give, and as shown by his rejection of the suggestion that the bill be amended to do away with this aspect of retroactivity, and—well, I sometimes take so long to complete a sentence that I am not sure what the proper ending ought to be, and I should not be surprised if I had reached that position right now!

Having recited these matters, I feel they indicate that the minister accepts the principle of retroactivity, and that the sponsor of the bill is now asking the Senate to accept that principle. I think it is a principle that the Senate should never accept unless the argument in favour is so overpowering that the principle can be overlooked.

The minister made no such argument at all. I do not think the sponsor made any such argument either, and I do not think, as a matter of fact, that he would like to. I am therefore stating, for the reasons suggested by Senator Roblin on second reading and on this principle of retroactivity, that I cannot support the bill. I urge all other honourable senators to endorse what I believe is their innermost belief, that retroactively taking away the rights of a person or persons, or of corporations, is wrong and unjust.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I have already stated on second reading my concerns with regard to this legislation and I am not going to repeat those concerns now. I rise simply to express disappointment that this very important piece of legislation has been brought forward for third and final reading without the changes that could have made it a far more effective instrument in the government's program of attempting to attain energy self-sufficiency in this decade.

The minister clearly declared, when he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, that in his view this legislation will achieve that result; but I point out to honourable senators what I tried to point out there, that it is not the government's assessment of this legislation that will decide whether or not it will be damaging in attaining the goal of energy self-sufficiency. That issue will be decided by the reaction to this legislation of the developers and the investment community, and not by the reaction of the government.

As all honourable senators know, the general reaction to this legislation, on the part of the developers in the petroleum industry and of the investment community, has been negative. What this legislation will cost Canada in the loss of energy resource development only time will tell, but I feel very strongly that our hope of attaining energy self-sufficiency in the present decade is significantly lessened rather than assisted by this legislation.

There are two clear signals which are sent, by means of this legislation, to the developers and to the investment community. One is that all of the objections which have been voiced before the committees of Parliament and, indeed, directly to the minister and the officials of his department, while they may have received consideration, in the final analysis are being brushed aside. It is as though the industry is being told that those objections and concerns are not valid. I submit that that is a very dangerous signal to send to that industry upon which we are so dependent if we hope to reach our energy self-sufficiency goal. The second signal which is sent just as clearly to the developers and to the investment community is that the government of this country is prepared to implement legislation that adversely affects the interests of developers and investors retroactively.

Honourable senators, I agree with everything that the Honourable Senator Smith has just said in objecting to that principle of retroactivity. I suggest that it is a particularly sensitive issue in the field of investment, where the confidence of investors must be secured if you are going to get their money.

For these reasons, honourable senators, I cannot support this legislation as it now stands. I honestly do not think that it is in the best interests of Canada, from the standpoint of the important goal of trying to attain energy self-sufficiency.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have been in this chamber for 10 years. Though I may have voted against my party on a minor occasion, I do not believe that I have done so with regard to any significant piece of legislation. Unfortunately, in this case I have to say to my leader that, strictly on a matter of principle, I cannot support the bill which is being presented today.

I do not believe in retroactive legislation. I think that it is against the grain of the Canadian way of doing business. I believe that a contract is a contract and should be honoured. I agree that we are setting some dangerous precedents in moving in the direction that Bill C-48 takes us. I have no objection to the objective of the bill, but I feel that the government could have accomplished the same end by means of revenue raising by way of taxation and royalties.

It was indicated to the members of the committee that, in addition, the government wanted a "seat at the table," which I believe was the expression used. I think that could have been obtained by the very broad powers of discretion that were given to the minister under the measure.

I regret to see Canadians and Canada, through its government, moving in the direction of abrogating what were considered firm contracts in the eyes of those who were involved at the time of the original signing. For this reason, I cannot support the legislation. In addition, I feel that it will add considerably to the problems we have with our friends in the United States. There is no doubt that investor confidence will be shaken, and this will also contribute to the tensions which are growing between our two countries.

I regret, honourable senators, that I cannot support the government in this case. I am sure that the members of my party will understand the reasons I have for not being able to vote with them on this occasion.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should first like to add to what I said earlier in responding to the question raised by Senator Smith.

I should make it clear that if any Canadian court ultimately determines that a province had jurisdiction or ownership in the offshore, those areas over which it had jurisdiction would not be part of the Canada lands and therefore the bill would have no effect on them. I hope that was inherent in what I said previously.

As to the other questions raised by honourable senators, I do not propose to go over the entire argument, but I do wish to point out that the matter was thoroughly covered by the committee, in spite of the two handicaps that we had. The first of those handicaps is that the other relevant legislation providing for petroleum incentive payments is not yet before Parliament. However, these payments must be taken into consideration in conjunction with this bill. The measure came to us so quickly that we were not able to complete all of the work in our pre-study.

The argument concerning the crown share provision was developed rather thoroughly by a great many senators. I think it fair to single out Senator Smith, Senator Roblin and Senator Manning, who raised the question persistently. I do not propose to repeat the explanation of the crown share other than to acknowledge that the retroactive application of the provision was, admittedly, a point of real concern to the committee, as indicated in the statement made by Senator Hayden last Tuesday evening.

There are one or two features of the retroactive application of this provision that I would like to emphasize. Retroactivity only applies to existing permits which were issued prior to the coming into force of this act. These permits go back a considerable number of years and vary in tenure depending on the time at which they were granted. However, the legislation under which they were granted was enacted in 1961. Some of the permits were simply issued for exploration to be carried out over a certain designated area, and some of the areas under permit are quite extensive. Some of the permits have expired and we do not need to concern ourselves with them. Others of them have, on their expiry, been negotiated under conditions similar to those covered in this bill. However, all existing exploration permits will be renegotiated to bring them under the regime enacted by this bill, because these old permits have certain disadvantageous elements.

• (1650)

In many instances, these disadvantageous elements arise mainly out of a requirement that a fixed area of the land for which the permit was granted be surrendered if a significant discovery was declared. That was rather arbitrarily imposed in some instances. In many cases, of course, there was no obligation on the explorer who had obtained a permit to do any significant amount of exploration or drilling. But under the new regime those activities may be accelerated, and I am sure everyone, including those who have spoken today, will agree that it is desirable to take measures to increase the activity on Canada lands. I think it would be acknowledged that this retroactive feature has not been called into question at all.

Incidentally, the number of permit holders to which this will apply is quite small. I understand, however, that there are significantly more companies expressing interest in Canada lands exploration because of the advantages. The main advantage is that under the new regime companies seeking a production licence are not obliged to give up an arbitrary portion of the land in certain cases. Moreover, there is the great incentive of the petroleum incentive payments that they will receive.

All these matters were considered, but it remains obscure as to whether any companies would wish to do other than come under this provision when applying for a production licence. However, we are in a vague area there; I cannot be more specific, and neither could the committee.

[Senator McIlraith.]

I can say that three companies did make representations that were dealt with by the committee. Under the circumstances and considering all the evidence before it, the committee decided, by a majority vote, not to adopt the recommendation to amend clause 28 of the bill put forward, I recall, by Senator Hayden. I see no reason to differ from that decision of the committee.

I would also point out that the second part of that amendment contained in the committee report tabled today would be manifestly unfair, because it does not recognize the advantages under the new regime, which are many. It should be recalled that the crown share provides companies with a 25 per cent portion of the costs of the development of whatever they have found. Moreover, they would not be eligible for the ex gratia payments they are now able to obtain. The second part of that recommendation could not, in any event, be tolerated, and I think, had it been understood more clearly, it would not have been accepted. In any event, I think there is little point in my pursuing this further, although it seems to be the major point at issue.

I want to say a word in appreciation of those committee members who performed diligent work throughout the sittings on this rather complex bill, both in the pre-study and in the development of the report on the bill itself.

Although I appreciate the arguments raised by honourable senators this afternoon, I have to let the matter go forward. I do not think there is more I can usefully say about it. I respectfully differ from them, of course, but I will leave it at that.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, just for the record, it is clear that if the committee had acted in perfect freedom, it would have recommended changes in section 28 as indicated in the report on—

• (1700)

[English]

Senator McIlraith: May I ask a question at this point?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator McIlraith: Did I correctly understand the interpretation? Did the honourable senator say that the committee did not act in perfect freedom?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator McIlraith: Then, before the honourable senator carries that argument any further, I would draw his attention to the fact that it was Senator Walker who moved that this bill go forward without amendment.

Senator Flynn: I understand that, and Senator Walker is perfectly free to move such a motion. I will repeat what I said.

[Translation]

If the committee had acted with perfect freedom, it would certainly have recommended changing the bill as indicated, especially where section 28 is concerned. This is one more instance where the government made it clear the bill was not to be amended, which is why we have this report with only a very vague statement by the minister. It is the second time in a matter of days, because the same thing happened only last week. Unless it suits the present government, the Senate can never make any changes. In any case, last week we gave the government the means of doing away with this chamber. Of course, as long as we behave as we are doing now, we will probably manage to survive, but if we were to put up any resistance, I imagine that some day we would get the punishment we deserve.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in the committee's defence, if indeed that is what is called for, I want to point out that there are a number of ways to interpret the expression "in perfect freedom". I believe we have a good idea of the interpretation given to it by the Leader of the Opposition, because he even went so far as to define what he meant by "perfect freedom". However, others may have a different interpretation.

[English]

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I do not believe that the people of the northern communities were sufficiently consulted with regard to Bill C-48. The House of Commons committee which reviewed this bill spent three days travelling in the north. In three days the committee went from Ottawa to Yellowknife, to Inuvik, up to Resolute Bay and Grise Fiord, down to Pond Inlet, and back to Frobisher Bay, and at no time during their travels did they consult with the people in these communities. They simply made stops at the communities and then returned to Ottawa.

Although Bill C-48 directly affects the communities on the Arctic Islands and on the government reserves, these communities are not recognized as the owners of the land. I refer to such communities as Resolute Bay, the community on Ellesmere Island which is a government weather station, and Alert, which is a Canadian Forces base. Last week I was in Rankin Inlet to attend a Northwest Territories constitutional conference. Many people came to me and said that they had not been asked to appear before the committee as witnesses. Therefore, I do not feel that I can support this legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, before I ask for the disposition of this order, I should like to point out that this is not languishing on the Order Paper because of disinter-est, but because it is basically what in the House of Commons would be called "a private member's public bill." The mover is no longer a private member, he having been called to the ministry, and I believe that modalities have to be sorted out.

Therefore, I would ask that this order be stood until February 10, 1982.

Order stands.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Second Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Guay, on behalf of Senator Murray, has asked me to move the adoption of this report. Perhaps the motion can be moved, but I just want to read two paragraphs in order to show you why I feel adjournment is appropriate.

Honourable senators, before the report is adopted, I feel I should draw your attention to the report's two recommendations, because some senators may wish to comment on them. The recommendations are as follows: First:

Need for the Committee to Travel:

The Committee believes that, given the importance and terms of its mandate, it is essential that it go to regions of Canada to help make members of the public aware of their language rights. In addition, as suggested by the Commissioner of Official Languages, the Committee should seriously consider travelling to countries which have official languages policies in order to discuss their legislation with the authorities responsible for their implementation.

The second recommendation reads as follows:

Your Committee recommends that it be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada and abroad, accompanied by the necessary staff, and provided that the estimated expenses for such travel and the locations to be visited are defined in advance.

I have nothing against these recommendations, but they are quite far-reaching, and I believe it would be appropriate to move the adjournment of the debate until Senator Murray or Senator Guay is able to attend.

Some hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration respecting the printing of certain information in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, as you know, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has been considering this very important matter for some time. The proposed recommendations were printed on page 1811 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of yesterday.

There are five rather pertinent recommendations which, I am sure, every senator in the chamber has perused very carefully.

I would point out that the committee very carefully monitored the printing of the present session of Parliament during the period from April 14, 1980 to November 1981—a period which included 154 sittings.

If the Senate approves the committee recommendations, this would represent an approximate saving of over $62,000 for a comparable period and a comparable volume of printing.

As indicated in our report:

Your Committee will continue to monitor the cost of printing Senate publications and may make further recommendations to reduce these costs if necessary.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, December 18, 1981

The Senate met at 10 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Department of Supply and Services, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 12 of the Department of Supply and Services Act, Chapter S-18, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the Department of External Affairs for the year ended December 31, 1980, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of External Affairs Act, Chapter E-20, R.S.C., 1970.

Amended Capital Budget of the Farm Credit Corporation for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with Order in Council P.C. 1981-3302, dated November 20, 1981, approving same.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 2, 1982, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I may point out that our plans are still the same as they were yesterday, namely, we want to come back on February 2 rather than January 25, when the sitting resumes in the other place, because we want to give our colleagues in the House of Commons a chance to prepare various items of business for us.

● (1005)

I merely wish to clarify something I said yesterday and draw your attention to the provisions of rule 14A which reads as follows:

If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting by sending a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate, informing the senator of the time of the meeting.

So, subject to what I have just said, we intend to resume sitting on Tuesday, February 2, at 8 o'clock in the evening, as usual.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I could not agree more. I think that in quoting this rule, the Deputy Leader has demonstrated that we have a very elegant way of saying certain things, because in fact, not only the Speaker must be satisfied, it is above all the Leader of the Government or his deputy who must be satisfied that the Senate should return. In any event, it is very well put.

Perhaps, considering that we are to adjourn until February, we should be told what we are to expect later today and when the Senate may take its leave?

Senator Frith: Certainly, honourable senators. Today, we only have what is on the Orders of the Day and our usual business.

As far as bills are concerned, we have only the third reading of Bill C-46.

That is why—and I have already consulted the Honourable Leader of the Opposition—we intend to sit until eleven o'clock or 11:15, and resume at 1:30, with the possibility that we may receive the bill we discussed yesterday, which is, I believe, Bill C-87 concerning the National Energy Board. If the bill is here by 1:30, with all the amendments, once copies have been distributed to the honourable senators we shall try to get through three readings; however, we are not giving any guarantees. Royal Assent is scheduled for 2:30. If we cannot finish this business or if the bill is not in the Senate, Royal Assent will still take place at 2:30.

Senator Flynn: I have tried to get some information from the Opposition House Leader and it seems there is a possibility that the bill will be adopted before the house recesses for lunch. If that is the case, and if the bill is as straightforward as it is said to be—we have not yet had an opportunity to read it—the Deputy Leader can rest assured that we shall co-operate in order to pass it, although I do not think there will be any earthshaking consequences if the bill is not passed.

In fact, I think that as soon as we have exhausted the number of items on the Order Paper—though not the patience of the senators, since there are not many items—we shall be able to adjourn until 1:30, it being understood that Royal Assent will take place at 2:30.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE PRIME MINISTER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRESS CONFERENCE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It has been announced that the Prime Minister will hold a press conference this afternoon. Can the Leader of the Government inform us what the conference will be about? Is it being held to announce a change in the budget or the Prime Minister's retirement, or the like? Will it be as interesting as all that? What a wonderful Christmas present it would be, if the Prime Minister were to announce his retirement!

• (1010)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I well appreciate the keen interest shown by the Leader of the Opposition in the press conference scheduled for this afternoon. However, it would be most unseemly for me to attempt to anticipate what the Prime Minister might say during his press conference. I urge the Leader of the Opposition, however, to watch his television set or to listen to his radio.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CONDITIONS OF FOREIGN SERVICE— GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO REPORT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, since we are going to be away for some time, I should like to revert to a question I directed to the Deputy Leader of the Government on Wednesday concerning the report of the McDougall Royal Commission. He said that he would endeavour to obtain more information. What I am looking for is the government's disposition in reference to this very important document. I note that the Secretary of State for External Affairs says that, in his experience, morale is very good. However, he said that he had not read the report, but would do so.

What will the government do about this? Will it be thoroughly studied? Will it be taken seriously, and when will that get under way?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when that question was asked Senator Olson was in the chamber. I gave that undertaking to Senator Macquarrie, and he will remember that I felt that I could assure him that it would be seriously studied.

What I undertook to do was give him more information respecting the particular bodies that might study the report. However, I am unable to do so at the moment.

I mentioned that Senator Olson was in the chamber because he may have some information that I do not have. As far as I am informed to this moment, the report will be taken seriously and studied closely.

• (1015)

I agree with the honourable senator that it is an intriguing report, particularly in its manner of presentation with the columnar comparisons of problems and solutions. I am sure it is going to get a lot of attention from the government.

I would ask Senator Olson if he has anything to add, because he was here when that question was asked.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, I do not have anything to add to what has already been conveyed to Senator Macquarrie.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a safe thing to say.

TRANSPORT

CN MARINE—ELIMINATION OF POSITIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question posed on December 9 by Senator Muir which concerns CN Marine and the elimination of some positions.

First of all, I can assure the honourable senator that the government does not intend to eliminate either CN Marine or CN, as both companies provide useful services to Canadians.

Stevedoring employment was artificially high in the period 1970-1974 because of a number of unusual circumstances. The amount of cargos transferred from railcars to trailers, containers and conventional vessels peaked at 139,000 tonnes during 1974. Truck traffic gained increasing prominence following 1974, while total general freight shipments to Newfoundland through North Sydney, declined slightly in the 1975-80 period. These events combined with improved technology, such as roloc procedures, have led to a gradual elimination of double handling and, subsequently, a reduction in the labour force required to handle cargo.

The Minister of Transport asked CN Marine to make no further employment reductions until April 1, 1982. The size of any future employment reductions after this date will be subject to normal labour management negotiations. As an added measure, my colleague the minister is currently supporting the establishment of a joint consultative committee between labour and management as a forum to consider employment reductions that may occur as a result of changes in freight handling techniques, such as containerization of rail traffic.

MEAT IMPORT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): moved the third reading of Bill C-46, to regulate the importation into Canada of fresh, chilled and frozen meat and to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For the record, I think it might be worth mentioning that Senator Hays has apparently given up his struggle to have this bill referred to committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was just going to ask Senator Flynn whether there were any new developments since yesterday when he asked to let the order stand and thus give Senator Hays a chance to express other reasons for wanting to refer the bill to committee.

Senator Flynn: He could not find any.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I suggest that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 1.30 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 1.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-87, to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be read the second time now.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development) moved the second reading of Bill C-87, to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators will recall that last Friday the House of Commons gave final reading to Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act, relating to the detailed routing of pipelines, conditions relating to construction, entry onto the right of way, acquisition of the right of way, and compensation for the use of the land. This bill is now awaiting royal assent.

Honourable senators will further recall that all parties agreed to swift passage of the bill, which originated in this house, and was known previously as Bill S-12.

Bill C-60 will require that a company which files a plan, profile and book of reference with the board must serve a notice on all landowners whose land is proposed to be acquired, and must publish a similar notice in a newspaper in the area where the land is involved. Landowners who have been served with notice, and any other landowner who believes that his land will be affected by the pipeline, will have 30 days to file a notice of objection with the National Energy Board.

If any notice is received, the board must conduct a hearing in the locale of the land affected, at which the landowners who have filed notice have a right to be heard. The terms of reference of this hearing include not only the best possible route for the pipeline but also the best method of acquiring the land and of constructing the pipeline. The board has power to address all of these concerns either by withholding its approval of the plan, profile, and book of reference, or by imposing terms and conditions on the approval.

There is a good deal of pipeline construction contemplated in the near future, and the board estimates that nearly 4,000 landowners will be affected by the bill in the first quarter of 1982. Even if only 3 per cent of them request public hearings, this could give rise to at least 120 cases in that first quarter of 1982. Just how many landowners will apply is unknown at this time, but the board must have the flexibility to deal with the situation.

Bill C-60 did not provide for any additional board members to conduct these hearings. Staff will also be required by the board to administer Bill C-60, but arrangements have already been made with the Treasury Board for the provision of such staff. However, under the National Energy Board Act, the board is restricted to nine permanent members with no provision for temporary members. These permanent members are needed to carry out the existing responsibilities of the board under the National Energy Board Act, the Petroleum Administration Act and the Northern Pipeline Act.

As honourable senators can imagine, there will be a great deal of activity in the energy field, and all nine board members are already committed to hearings throughout the twelve months of 1982 and, indeed, beyond. It is generally acknowledged that the board is a very hard-working regulatory agency. It will be quite impossible for the board to carry out its responsibilities under Bill C-60 without additional members. Hearings already scheduled for 1982 concern an Ontario Hydro transmission line across Lake Erie, the Arctic Pilot Project, TransCanada PipeLines' 1982 facilities, gas export hearings, and several rate applications.

• (1335)

In addition, of course, we know that the TQ & M Pipeline will require easement acquisitions, and also, at some time in 1983, the Norman Wells line will be going into the Mackenzie Valley and down into the existing gathering system for oil in northwestern Alberta.

Concurrence has been received from all parties in connection with the introduction of this bill in the house in anticipation that members will agree to give it swift passage so as to permit Bill C-60 to be proclaimed at an early date. The sole purpose of the bill is to provide for the appointment of temporary members under terms and conditions to be prescribed by the Governor in Council, and for the temporary members to carry out such duties as may be assigned to them by the chairman of the board. Whether or not more permanent members are needed can be determined when experience has been gained in administering Bill C-60. Each of the temporary members will be governed by the same conflict of interest rules as are contained in the National Energy Board Act relating to board members.

You will note that there has been a change in the wording of the residence requirements of the board members who are presently required, "to reside in the city of Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof or within such other distance as the Governor in Council determines". It has been decided to change these requirements and relate them to the National Capital Region, based on the definition set out in the National Capital Act. This seems to reflect the appropriateness of the term "National Capital Region" as embracing an area in both Ontario and Quebec in referring to the federal Government of Canada.

As I pointed out at the beginning, honourable senators, the bill is basically very simple, and by providing for temporary board members it permits the bringing into operation of Bill C-60 at an early date. I hope that all members of this chamber will concur in this.

I should also advise honourable senators that it is the intention to proclaim the coming into force of this bill, if it is passed, on the same day as Bill C-60, is proclaimed.

As I said, the bill is very simple. It provides for some temporary board members. There is an amendment, and I think all honourable senators have a copy of it, limiting the number of temporary members to no more than six, as and when they are required.

It is my view that occasions may arise when the public interest would be better served if there were more than six temporary members. I am thinking, for example, of a situation in which the TQ & M Pipeline land acquisition activity was going on at the same time as that in connection with the Norman Wells pipeline, and those sections of the Alaska Highway pipeline running through the Yukon, the northeastern part of British Columbia, and the northern and central part of Alberta, and perhaps other pipelines as well. In those circumstances it would be necessary for someone in the capacity of a temporary board member to carry out the function of hearing the landowners' representations.

The amendment, however, was made in the other place limiting the number to six. I suppose we can try to get along with that throughout 1982, but I suggest to honourable senators that if there are several major projects going on at the same time, six temporary members, in my view, will be an insufficient number to meet the legitimate needs of the landowners across this country, if we think, for example of having one temporary board member for a massive project such as the one involving construction all the way from Quebec City, or eastern Quebec, to Halifax. It may be that such hearings would be unnecessarily delayed were we unable to assign more than one temporary member to them. The same will be true for certain other major projects. For now, however, what we are asking members of this chamber to approve is the addition of up to six temporary board members to carry out the provisions of Bill C-60.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it may be that the minister is right when he says that this is a simple bill. However, I must say that I am not too happy with having to deal with it in the way and in the form in which it comes to us. We have copies of a bill with no number.

Senator Olson: It is Bill C-87.

Senator Flynn: Yes, we have to add the number. Furthermore, we have this amendment. I can adjust to the amendment with some ease. It would mean that the new subsection 3(6.1) would be inserted after line 13, to provide that there will be "not more than six temporary members . . . at any one time." Line 13 is easily distinguishable in the French version. However, we are not too sure where line 16 is in the English version.

● (1340)

In any event, I simply wanted to point out that we are called upon to deal with this in a very unsatisfactory way. However, if that is the only problem, I suppose that we can adapt to the situation, as we on this side have always done. I am not sure that we would have obtained the same co-operation if our roles had been reversed.

Senator Olson: There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Oh, you certainly would.

Senator Flynn: I was hoping that Senator Frith and Senator Olson would intervene, as they have, because they were the least co-operative when we formed the government, and I remember very well that they were hard on us. I may say that I remember it with pleasure, because I did not lose any sleep over it.

I was listening to the debate in the House of Commons and, while it was not a long debate, the members took the opportunity to deal with the energy policy of the government. We could very well spend an hour or so here criticizing the bad aspects of some of the provisions of this National Energy Program, but we always keep to the relevant issues in the debate when we deal with a bill—and I am not speaking of the ministers when they reply to questions. Therefore, I am simply going to resume my seat and say, "Let it go!"

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I have only one question I would like to ask the minister. I know that this is a simple bill, but it is hardly a simple signature. I would like an explanation regarding the signature.

Senator Flynn: That is a very good question, Senator Denis.

Senator Olson: I think it is what it says it is—the signature of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Senator Denis: It is the signature of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Senator Flynn: What is the name?

Senator Olson: Marc Lalonde.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like some clarification of clause 2 of this bill, which refers to section 4 of the existing legislation. It appears as though subsection 4(1) and 4(1.1) in substance say exactly the same thing. Why, then, are there two subsections?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the two subsections are certainly similar, but I think that subsection 4(1) deals with the legality of the Governor in Council's setting the remuneration for these services from time to time. That is not contained in the previous paragraph.

• (1345)

Senator Tremblay: May I read what it says?

Senator Flynn: Yes. That's a good idea.

Senator Tremblay: It states:

4. (1) Each member, other than a member appointed under subsection 3(6), shall be paid such remuneration for his services as the Governor in Council may from time to time determine.

Then the next subsection reads:

(1.1) Each member appointed under subsection 3(6) shall be paid such remuneration for his services as the Governor in Council may from time to time determine.

I see no substantial difference between those two subsections. One would have seemed sufficient. It would have said everything. That is the reason I asked why there were two subsections.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Do the two subsections not deal with two different groups? Subsection 4(1) deals with "Each member, other than a member appointed under subsection 3(6)," whereas subsection 4(1.1) specifies "Each member appointed under subsection 3(6)".

Senator Flynn: But what difference does that make? Why have two subsections?

Senator McIlraith: I do not know, but they do cover two different groups.

Senator Tremblay: I realize that, but in both cases it is left to the Governor in Council to make the determination, and he will do the same thing for both groups. Therefore, I see no reason for having the two subsections.

Senator Frith: I do not think that is right. With respect to the permanent members there is a minimum, while there is no minimum with respect to temporary members. That is the reason.

Senator Tremblay: It does not say that in the subsection.

Senator Frith: Well, I read it, so it must be there somewhere.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps we should refer the bill to committee to find out.

Senator Denis: May I direct your attention to the proposed subsection 3(7) under clause 1 of the bill? It says:

Each member, other than a member appointed under subsection (6), shall, during his term of office—

Can the minister tell me if a member could perform the function before his term of office?

Senator Olson: Yes, I think so. This refers specifically to the days or weeks while he is there, but he would not necessarily have to be a member or have his residence there before his term of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL OTTAWA GOVERNMENT HOUSE

December 18, 1981

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 18th day of December, 1981, at 2.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Jacques Noiseux

for

Edmond Joly de Lotbinière

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,

Ottawa.

ELECTRICITY AND GAS INSPECTION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-11, relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE BUDGET TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a report approving the supplementary budget of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1445)

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act

An Act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act

An Act to regulate the importation into Canada of fresh, chilled and frozen meat and to amend the Export and Import Permits Act

An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 2)

An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 2)

An Act to incorporate the Jules and Paul-Émile Léger Foundation.

The Honourable Lloyd Francis, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

SEASON'S GREETINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I wish all honourable senators, their families and friends a Christmas season full of joy, nourishment in every sense of the word, rest and good health. Of course, I also wish all honourable senators a happy and prosperous 1982.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I very sincerely echo the good wishes just expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Government. For our part, we also wish you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year as well as a good rest, or a recess period—I am not too sure what it should be called—but a period of contemplation for us all.

I notice that the Minister of Finance will be delivering a speech this afternoon at four o'clock. I was wondering whether we ought to stay here to find out if this is going to be a mini-budget or a new budget, or exactly what is going to happen.

I presume there is no need for us to stay here because we will be able to debate all these new measures, whatever they may be, in due time when we get back.

Before the Deputy Leader of the Government moves the adjournment of the Senate until February 2, perhaps he might tell us whether the government has decided to open a new session or whether we will continue this one so as to beat the record set a few years ago when the session lasted for nearly three years. I suggest that all honourable senators would be interested to know just what are the views of the government in that respect.

Be that as it may, I must say that I will miss you individually but certainly not collectively! In any event, my best wishes are with you until February 2.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, dealing with the first matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition, I am sure that if the budget—or the speech that is supposed to have something to do with the budget—falls within the provisions of Rule 14A(1) so as to persuade the Speaker that it would be in the public interest to call us back immediately, we will hear bells ring on our way to the airport or on the way to take other modes of transportation. I doubt that that will take place.

On the second matter raised regarding the possibility of having prorogation and a new session commence sometime after Parliament reassembles, I can say that that is under serious consideration by the government, but as far as I know now, no date has been decided upon. Perhaps the Minister of State for Economic Development might wish to add something, but those are my instructions and my information now—"instructions" in the solicitor and client legal sense.

Senator Flynn: You have to be careful.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not going to add a great deal to the plan of proceeding with this session or going to another one, but while I am on my feet perhaps I could take the opportunity to sincerely wish a joyous season to all honourable senators, their families and friends. I also wish all honourable senators a prosperous 1982, which my department, of course, views with a great deal of optimism all the time.

Senator Flynn: You have no choice.

Senator Olson: As far as this session is concerned, there are, of course, a number of bills, such as the budget bills and other bills dealing with energy agreements, left on the Order Paper.

I would suggest gently to my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, that he use his great influence—and I know he has that—to persuade his colleagues to expedite passage of those bills, not only through this house, but through the other house. That would lead us quickly to a new session. We are not attempting in any way to break records, but we do have some heavy obligations, and I know that he is ready to give us a commitment to help us discharge those obligations in the most expeditious manner.

● (1505)

Senator Flynn: We have always done that.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, as you know, I am a man of very few words.

An Hon. Senator: That's the best news we've heard this week.

Senator Petten: I should like to thank all honourable senators on both sides of the house for the co-operation shown this session, and to wish one and all a very Merry Christmas and a prosperous New Year.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to add that our wishes extend also to the Clerks, all personnel of the Senate and the reporters and editors of Hansard.

Senator Frith: Yes, indeed, honourable senators, I believe that we should make it very clear that our good wishes extend to those on the Hansard staff, the pages and all the excellent support staff who make life for a Canadian senator that much more enjoyable.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before putting the motion for adjournment, I should like to join with the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in extending my non-partisan Season's Greetings. I invite you to my quarters after the sitting, and I will try to substantiate what I have just said.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 2, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 2, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE LATE HON. PAUL DESRUISSEAU

NOTICE OF DEATH

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is with great sadness that I must inform you of the death of our former colleague, Senator Paul Desruisseaux, who died at two o'clock this morning in Sherbrooke.

There will be no speech to honour Senator Desruisseaux, because this was done when he retired from the Senate, but I believe that we can endorse what was said on that occasion.

The funeral will take place Friday afternoon in Sherbrooke. My secretary will be able to give you further information if necessary.

CLERK OF THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF CHARLES LUSSIER, ESQUIRE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a commission under the Great Seal has been granted to Charles Lussier, Esquire, appointing him Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments.

The commission was read by the Clerk Assistant.

● (2000)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that by the usage of Parliament the Clerk of the Senate is required to take the oath of office before the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate.

The oath of office was administered by His Honour the Speaker.

COMMISSION ISSUED TO CHARLES LUSSIER, ESQUIRE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a commission under the Great Seal has been issued to Charles Lussier, Esquire, duly appointing him a Commissioner to administer the oath of allegiance to members of the Senate and receive their declarations of qualification.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker, I think it should be pointed out that the Royal Proclamation by which Mr. Lussier was appointed as Clerk of the Senate should have been read in French as well, since

French and English are the two official languages of this country, and it is often said that French is not used often enough in the Senate. I therefore register my protest and I want to make it clear that the Royal Proclamation should have been read in both official languages.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have been informed that the French version was accidentally destroyed and there was no time to have it reprinted.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Could we have some further clarification?

● (2010)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on your behalf it is my privilege to welcome the new Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments, Mr. Charles Lussier.

Mr. Lussier has practised law in the province of Quebec and has lectured at the Faculty of Law, University of Paris, and at the University of Ottawa where he taught a master's degree course in civil law.

Honourable senators, our new Clerk brings to this chamber a distinguished background in public service. Mr. Lussier served as Assistant Deputy Minister (Citizenship) in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration; as a special adviser on matters relating to the continental shelf and international negotiations with France and the United States; as Assistant Under-Secretary of State; and as a Commissioner of the Public Service Commission of Canada. Most recently he served as the Director of the Canada Council.

Mr. Lussier, your extensive background in public life, your training in law, as well as your wide administrative experience, qualify you admirably for the duties which you have now assumed. In welcoming you to the Senate, I know that you will receive the co-operation of senators on both sides of this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Your advice and assistance will be sought equally by supporters of the government and the opposition. I know that your conduct will be impartial, thorough and in keeping with the great traditions of your high office. We wish you the very best as you begin your new duties, and we assure you of our full co-operation in your discharge of them.

Mr. Lussier, on behalf of all my colleagues, allow me to welcome you to the Senate.

RESIGNATION OF ROBERT FORTIER, ESQUIRE, Q.C.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, having welcomed the new Clerk, I would now like to say a few words about Mr. Robert Fortier who resigned as Clerk of the Senate at the end of December.

● (2015)

Mr. Fortier was the distinguished and able Clerk of the Senate for 13 years. He served Speakers, leaders and senators, regardless of party, with integrity, judgment and consummate skill. His hard work, thoroughness and dedication earned him the confidence and respect of all members of this chamber. We are saddened by his resignation. We shall miss him greatly, and we wish him well in his future endeavours.

Mr. Fortier has had a distinguished career in the service of his country. To him and to Mrs. Fortier we extend our wishes for a long and happy period of retirement which we hope they will enjoy with their family.

Honourable senators, Mr. Fortier, in his years of service to the Senate, has earned our gratitude and appreciation. Following a series of precedents, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Flynn, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h):

That the Senate desires to record its deep appreciation of the long and distinguished service rendered by Robert Fortier, Esquire, as Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments; and

That in acknowledgment of the dignity, dedication and profound learning with which he has graced the office, he be designated an Honorary Officer of this House with an entree to the Senate and a seat at the Table on occasions of ceremony.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, honourable senators, I wholeheartedly second the motion of the Leader of the Government with respect to our Clerk who has just retired, namely, Mr. Robert Fortier. I had been in the Senate for six years when Mr. Fortier was appointed to take on his very important duties, and during the thirteen years he has been with the Senate, our relations have been most satisfactory. He came here with over thirty years' experience, including twenty-seven spent in the public service. He started out practising law in Hull. He was admitted to the bar a year before I was, I believe, so we are contemporaries. This decision to retire is a wise one, and I wonder if I should not do the same—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh no!

Senator Flynn: However, my courage fails me and I must say this is partly due to the attitude of the Liberal majority in this chamber! I am following the example of Simeon, and I shall wait until things collapse before I take my leave.

Senator Riel: We can wait!

Senator Flynn: As far as Mr. Robert Fortier, Q.C., is concerned, I believe we have every reason to appreciate the competence he has shown in exercising his duties. He has been a very effective administrator as the Clerk of the Senate. We have appreciated his discretion, which is absolutely essential since the Clerk's duties involve relations with both sides of the Senate and occasionally with a more or less independent group—I am referring to Senator Molson's independent party. We have also appreciated his cordiality. I think we all have reason to appreciate the excellent relationship we have had with Mr. Fortier. The Leader of the Government has described his admirable career. Mr. Fortier started in the public service in 1942, some forty years ago. He has had a truly enviable career and once more, I feel that he was very wise to decide to retire at this time.

Mr. Fortier has acted in accordance with the best traditions of the Clerks of the Senate. Here I am thinking especially of Mr. John McNeil, who was also Clerk of the Senate for thirteen years.

On behalf of the official opposition, I wish to express our agreement with the words spoken by the Leader of Government, offer our best wishes to Mr. Fortier and send our cordial greetings to his wife.

Having seconded the motion, I should now like to welcome our new Clerk, but, as Senator Asselin remarked, I am speaking in French only to compensate for the fact that the new Clerk's commission was read only in English. I am sure that most of my colleagues can now understand my French and translate it readily. I do not think there is any problem here. In any case, I have noticed that everyone seems to catch the finer points of my speeches, when there are any—and I hope there are!

Charles Lussier is, of course, a lawyer. That was to be expected. I knew him when he was actually practising law. The first time we met, he was defending a case before an arbitration board, of which I was a member. I must say that his eloquence was remarkable. We later met just before he left for Paris to become director of the Canadian students' residence. Later he was the Province of Quebec's delegate to Paris, so we can say that our new Clerk has been considerably exposed to French influences.

Mr. Lussier subsequently returned to Canada and had a variety of duties here in Ottawa. Most recently he was Director of the Canada Council. He is a man of great charm and his experience has been extremely varied. We can expect him to put that experience, as well as his many talents, to good use in the performance of his duties as Clerk of the Senate. He may have to spend some time becoming familiar with parliamentary procedure, since that is not something that is learned overnight. In any case, he can count on the co-operation of the opposition, just as I trust the opposition will be able to count on his. I wish him every success in his new duties.

He need not worry as far as I am concerned. My bark is worse than my bite, which many Liberal senators will be able to confirm. I may be somewhat sharp at first—I resemble our speaker in that respect—but no cause for alarm!

We wish to offer our new Clerk our best wishes and the assurance that all bodes well for the future.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GODFREY

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. In the Senate Bulletin, distributed by the Information Service of the Senate, I noticed today a clipping from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which referred to remarks made by Senator Donahoe in an interview with the Editor-in-chief. The remarks with which I am concerned deal with the constitutional resolution. Concerning Senator Donahoe the report states:

What bothered him most about the vote on the resolution in the Senate, . . . was the number of members who spoke against the proposal, but decided to vote for it out of party loyalty. He particularly cited Senator John Godfrey (L-Rosedale) whom he quoted as saying he “would hold his nose while voting for it.”

Hon. G. I. Smith: Well chosen.

Senator Godfrey: I hardly need to remind my fellow senators that in my last speech on the final resolution I said, as reported at page 3159 of Debates of the Senate:

One of my reasons for speaking today is to register my delight at the final outcome and to announce that, unlike the last resolution, I will not have to hold my nose when I vote for this one.

Senator Donahoe has told me that he said what is in that article.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Then you withdraw what you said before?

Senator Godfrey: Senator Donahoe said that he was referring to the speech I gave in March, and honourable senators will remember that the resolution before us at that time was not voted upon. I would like to quote from the speech that I made on that occasion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is the question of privilege?

Senator Godfrey: The question of privilege is with regard to the reference in the news article by Senator Donahoe to the effect that I voted for the resolution out of a sense of party loyalty. That, of course, is not factually correct.

Senator Flynn: Don't worry, you are not the only one.

Senator Godfrey: On that occasion in March, I said:

I do not recognize, and never have, any obligation on any Liberal senator to follow any so-called Liberal whip.

[Senator Flynn.]

On that subject, I would like to quote Senator Dandurand, when he became government leader in the Senate in 1922, and I remind honourable senators that he remained Liberal leader in the Senate for 20 years:

I shun party discipline and the party whip. I invite criticism of the measures of the government, criticism from the right as well as from the left; I feel it is the responsibility of each senator to try to improve the legislation that comes before us.

I ended that speech by saying:

As between no Charter of Rights in the Constitution and no patriation with an amending formula and an entrenched Charter of Rights together with patriation of the B.N.A. Act with an amending formula, I have finally come to the conclusion, in spite of my strong reservations about the process, that patriating the Constitution is all important, is long overdue, and should be done now, even though it includes a Charter of Rights which is completely entrenched, which I do not really think is necessary at this time.

And I then concluded by saying that I would hold my nose and vote for the resolution.

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Smith: Once is enough, John.

Senator Flynn: What is the question of privilege?

Senator Godfrey: The question of privilege relates to the fact that I was wrongly quoted.

I would also point out that I objected to the process because I thought that the matter should be taken before the Supreme Court of Canada before it went to Westminster, and that the Charter of Rights should include a “notwithstanding” clause, and, of course, both of these objections were subsequently met.

Senator Flynn: Okay, we all know that.

Senator Godfrey: I object to Senator Donahoe's statement to the effect that I voted because of party loyalty when I expressly stated in my speech that I did not.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I would like to say a word on the question of privilege raised by Senator Godfrey in view of the fact that my name has been mentioned. I did, in fact, give the interview referred to by the Editor-in-chief of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, and I did say the words to which the honourable senator has referred. I want to say, first and foremost, that if I touched the honourable senator's raw spot, or if I offended him in any way, it was entirely without intention. My intention was to be strictly factual.

If the honourable senator takes objection to my having said that he voted as he did because of the actions of the whip of the Liberal party, I am here to say that I do not know exactly who spoke to the honourable senator, but I am delighted that the whip has been absolved and to accept the word of the honourable senator that the whip never spoke to him.

● (2030)

In spite of the laughter from my colleagues on the opposite side, I want to say that I was being factual. We were voting on a resolution, which resolution, if carried, was to have the effect of putting before the British Parliament a bill which, in effect, would become the Constitution of Canada. That is the resolution on which my honourable friend spoke. Here, honourable senators, are the words he used. They are to be found at page 2011 of the Debates of the Senate for March 11, 1981:

Let us get this first step over with, so that we can get on with amending the Constitution at home with respect to other important matters—

Not that the matters that we were going to have amended in England were not important, but there were others that would be better dealt with in Canada. Why they were not all dealt with in Canada he failed to explain.

—such as the division of powers. I am, therefore, going to hold my nose and vote for this resolution.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I leave it to you to determine whether there is any merit to the point of privilege or not.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the question of privilege, I think that Senator Godfrey is mistaken. Indeed, if we were to raise an objection every time we are misquoted we would never see the end of it. That reminds me of the ruling of the Superior Court in Montreal about the Quebec federal members of Parliament who had objected to being branded as traitors by the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste for having supported the constitutional resolution. Chief Justice Deschênes expressed the opinion that, after all, it was a common expression. Personally, I think they went a little bit too far when they used the word “traitors”. Had I been in Senator Donahoe’s shoes, I would have used the word “followers”. As to those who complained, we might say that they are “crybabies”.

The Hon. the Speaker: If honourable senators are satisfied that the facts have been set straight with respect to the question of privilege, we will proceed immediately with the message received from the House of Commons. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Therefore, I will not have to rule on the question of privilege.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-45, to amend the Pest Control Products Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to put it on the record that we give leave because the bill concerns pest control. It is urgent.

The Hon. the Speaker: With this proviso, is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-GERMANY TAX AGREEMENT BILL, 1982

FIRST READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-24, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on income and certain other taxes.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, February 4, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE MAURICE LAMONTAGNE, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to welcome to the chamber Senator Lamontagne after his ordeal. It is good to see him back in such buoyant good health.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would not want the Leader of the Government to be the only one to welcome Senator Lamontagne. We, on this side of the house, are also very happy to see him back. Indeed, I have already had the opportunity to tell him so personally. I am very glad to see him among us and to know that he will continue to make his usual useful contributions.

Senator Asselin: You will not be his whipping boy today.

CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTER—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government give us a progress report about the first ministers' meeting on the economic problems of Canada?

Hon. Martial Asselin: There are no economic problems in Canada.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the discussions have proceeded in a co-operative and amicable spirit, although not without certain differences of opinion on a number of matters. Good progress is being made.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—SHIPMENTS OF CANADIAN WHEAT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think there are one or two more mundane matters that might be raised at this moment to bring us down from the sublime heights of the Dominion-Provincial Conference to the sale of wheat to Poland.

I should like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board whether he could advise me of the state of the government's commitments for the shipment of wheat to Poland. I particularly want to know what the line of credit is that has been extended and how much of that line has been used. Consequent on that answer, I may have another question.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I shall have to take as notice that part of the question regarding how much of the line of credit has been used. I do not have those facts before me.

The agreement for the sale of wheat to Poland for this year amounted to something between one and one-and-a-half million tonnes. My understanding is that arrangements have been made to provide shipments against the contract or that total amount of grain, and that sales to date and sales for about half of the year represent approximately half of the quantity involved. In other words, the sale and the shipments are being staged throughout the whole year so that our commitments or contracts are being met. As to precisely how much credit has been involved to date, I would have to take that part of the question as notice.

● (2040)

Senator Roblin: I am quite happy to have the minister do that. I can inform him that a spokesman for the Department of External Affairs gave a figure of $1 billion as to the amount of the Canadian line of credit that has been made available to Poland. When the minister is looking into the amount of money that has already been drawn against the line of credit, I wonder if he could also answer one or two other questions for me. First of all, has the original term for repayment been renegotiated or rescheduled, and, if so, what are the changes? I ask this because we know that the Polish debts have been massively rescheduled in view of their inability to pay.

The second question I would like to ask him is as to whether or not the Government of Canada is giving any consideration to terminating the line of credit on the amount already drawn down, and, if not, does he intend to increase it in the future, because I think we are all very much interested in the movement of wheat to Poland and the financial terms involved?

Senator Argue: I can reply in a general way to some of the points raised by the Honourable Senator Roblin. I know of no consideration presently being given to an extension or to an expansion of the amount of credit to which the honourable senator refers.

A couple of months ago I announced on behalf of the government that an extension of approximately $500 million of credit to Poland was being made at that time. If my memory serves me correctly, that was in addition to a then outstanding credit of $750 million, which brought the credit up to $1.25 billion.

Regarding Poland's meeting its credit terms, I understand that up until the end of last December all of the interest due, which was on the immediate part of the credit that was drawn, had been paid. I also understand that no part of those interest payments is in default, so, as the Canadian Wheat Board goes forward and delivers wheat against the total commitment for the year, payments in fact are received by the board. I think the government has acted very adequately and very generously in providing such large lines of credit to Poland. There have been those who have proclaimed in the press that Canada should cut off shipments of food to Poland. The position of the government, and my own position, is that it would be a disservice to Poland and to the Polish people in these difficult times to have any thought of cutting off shipments of food. Therefore, I think Canada has been acting in a very responsible manner.

As I said earlier, I do not have at hand details and other particulars, but I would be happy to provide them to the honourable senator.

Senator Roblin: I presume the honourable senator made a slip of the tongue when he said he thought any change in the policy would be a disservice to the Government of Poland. I am sure he meant to say that it would be a disservice to the people of Poland. I do want the situation clarified because the Polish government defaulted at the end of December in the United States on American bank loans which are guaranteed by the American government. That government anted up $73 million of interest due by the Poles to the American banks to cover the American guarantees, and those transactions make me wonder indeed if Poland's obligations to us may be under some pressure of that kind. Therefore, I would be glad to know exactly what the situation is.

Senator Argue: I shall be happy to provide that information. I am glad the honourable senator interpreted correctly what I was implying about the need to send food to support the people of Poland and not the Government of Poland.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether the Canadian Wheat Board has earmarked a definite amount of grain that can be sold to Poland in 1982?

Senator Argue: It is being sold to Poland and is on the way to that country. It is in the range of 1 million to 1.5 million tonnes, and it is going forward on the rough basis that in the first half of the year half of the amount will be shipped. It is not all being shipped immediately and it is not all being delayed until the fall, but it is being shipped on a regular basis spread out over the year. I would think that since people have to eat every day of the year this is probably the best possible method to use in providing that food for Poland.

Senator Roblin: While we are on the same subject, I should like to ask the minister to get more information concerning the assessment that government officials make of the financial stability of the Polish regime at the moment, with a view to forming some estimate as to if and when we can expect to be paid back. What are the risks involved, as the government sees them?

Senator Argue: I will get that information. Obviously, it is a credit advance that has attached to it a very substantial element of risk. That, I think, is perfectly obvious. The fact is that interest payments have been made in spite of Poland's difficulties.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What about the repayment of the principal sum? Are they also on time?

Senator Argue: I will provide that information.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

RESPONSIBILITY OF HON. JACK AUSTIN, P.C.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin. I am referring to a press release announcing that he is responsible for the Canada Development Corporation, which indicated that this change is designed to provide greater ministerial attention to CDC. Could Senator Austin inform the chamber as to why greater ministerial attention is required?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Nurgitz for his question about the Canada Development Corporation. It is the view of the government that the CDC, in which it holds some 48.6 per cent equity interest and some $322 million of investment in 1972 dollars, is an important asset of the Government of Canada, and that the government should thoroughly understand the nature of its investment as of 1982 and establish, if possible, a relationship with the board of directors and management which can serve to obviate criticism sometimes by the financial community that the government may indeed be seeking to interfere directly with the duties and responsibilities of the board of directors and management.

I might also add that the Canada Development Corporation has its headquarters in the city of Vancouver, and I have the pleasure of representing British Columbia, along with Senator Perrault, in the cabinet. When the CDC was established, the purpose of the federal government was to have that corporation be one of the leading edges of the federal presence in the development of resources and industries in western Canada. That is an interest I will continue to explore.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. Would Senator Austin not agree that ministerial attention would result in some form of direction coming from the government to the board of directors?

Senator Austin: While the Government of Canada is the principal shareholder of the Canada Development Corporation, it is not the controlling shareholder in its practice or intention. I have no intention whatever of directing the board of directors. However, as a representative of the principal shareholder, I do wish to establish with the board of directors and its chairman, and with the president and chief executive officer and managers, a correct and proper relationship between myself and themselves with respect to the corporation. I look forward to their co-operation. During the past two weeks I have had a meeting with the president and some members of management, and a telephone conversation with the Chairman of the board. I think these were excellent preliminary discussions concerning the future relationship.

• (2050)

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have two brief supplementaries. I know that the minister has held his appointment only since January 12, but has he yet had an opportunity to consider the statement made by the CDC president, Mr. Anthony Hampson, in a speech delivered in Toronto in December, to the effect that a clear public statement of government intention was required? I would like to know if that clear government statement is forthcoming.

Senator Austin: Mr. Hampson and I discussed the problem of communication between the government and the board of directors of CDC. We are now considering how to state that relationship. Those discussions will continue for a while, and I will be pleased to report to the Senate as soon as I am able to do so.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, as a final supplementary, it is my understanding that in 1980 a review of CDC's performance was undertaken by the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the chamber, first, if that review has been completed; and, secondly, if so, whether it will be tabled?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have not yet had an opportunity to study any of the earlier files in either the Department of Finance or the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but I can assure the honourable senator that I shall be looking at those files in the near future.

GRAIN

STATUS OF CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, is it still the position of the minister and the government that no change or renegotiation is contemplated with regard to the Crow rate?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am certain that the honourable senator, with other honourable senators, has read the newspapers. It is my impression that an announcement is likely to be made in the not too distant future of possible positions with regard to statutory rates, railway expansion in the west, and the matter of meeting with western farm organizations with a view to discussing this important topic.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, in the event that the Crow rate is substantially altered or changed, or that the government's position is fundamentally changed, can we anticipate the resignation of the minister?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I would not anticipate that too much. The Prime Minister stated repeatedly that the government did not intend to change the statutory rate unless and until there was a consensus in western Canada in favour of change.

The honourable senator will, I am sure, realize that major farm organizations in western Canada, on behalf of their membership, passed motions at recent conventions asking the government to state its position, to provide certain moneys and guarantees to the railways; and in the event that the government took particular action, they wished to discuss the whole question of sharing railway freight rate costs for grain with the railway companies and the government.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, is the minister saying that he believes there is a general consensus of farm organizations that there should be a change in the Crow rate?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I am not trying to avoid the question, but the motions that have been passed at recent conventions of farm organizations, such as WAC and commodity groups—that is, excluding the National Farmers Union, the Western Cow-Calf Association, and the Saskatchewan Municipal Hail, but including the great prairie pools, the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture, Unifarm, the Manitoba Farm Bureau and others—indicate that they have all said precisely what I have said, namely, that under certain circumstances and with certain guarantees they are prepared to discuss with the government the question of sharing the cost of transporting grain among the railways, the government and the producers.

[Senator Austin.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government, believing as I do in going right to the top. It will give him the opportunity to provide me with something from his answer book which, quite appropriately, I am sure he has with him. My question concerns the El Salvador situation which has worsened sadly since we last met and on which, regrettably, the Government of Canada is blowing as uncertain a trumpet as it has done in respect of Poland.

In light of the serious violence reported from El Salvador, largely attributed to the government forces, in light of representations made by a subcommittee on external affairs in the other place, in light of the findings of a three-member mission from Oxfam, and in light of the protests of the Canadian Council of Churches and of the Canadian Catholic Bishops which want a change in Canada's attitude toward the holding of elections in El Salvador, can the Leader of the Government advise if, at this time, the government is giving consideration to altering its attitude and moving closer to the view of Mexico and France that the chaotic conditions in El Salvador are such that an election is a preposterous suggestion? Can the Leader of the Government also say whether this country, with its attitude against the introduction of military equipment to areas of tension, has advised the Government of the United States that the sending of vast stores of arms to the Government of El Salvador is not in the interests of peace?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the information sought by the honourable senator is not available in complete form this evening. However, I wish to say a few words on the subject which may be of interest to honourable senators. The information which I am unable to bring to the chamber will be sought and a further reply will be provided.

With regard to the election in El Salvador, as honourable senators know, the Government of El Salvador has officially invited Canada, along with other countries with which it has diplomatic relations, to send observers to monitor the elections to be held on March 28. The invitation was received on January 8 this year. We have sought clarification from the Salvadorean government on a number of issues, including the terms of reference for observers, size and composition of the observer group, its freedom of movement and security, and so on. The Canadian government will decide its reply to the invitation once it has that clarification.

Honourable senators, with regard to the other questions, it would be appropriate, in view of recent events, for a statement on El Salvador to be prepared by the Secretary of State for External Affairs for presentation to the Senate. Therefore, the larger question will be answered later.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF REV. IAN PAISLEY AND ALLEGED IRA MEMBERS

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, over the Christmas recess, as I am sure all honourable senators are aware, the Reverend Ian Paisley visited Toronto and, apparently, his visit caused some trouble. Also, apparently, two IRA terrorists visited Toronto and were subsequently arrested when trying to cross the border into the United States. I presume the information I seek is not available at the moment. I would like to be made more aware of the kind of advice given by the security section of the Department of Immigration to the Minister of Immigration which would lead him to allow into Canada a man who is probably the world's most infamous surrogate terrorist, namely, the Reverend Ian Paisley, along with two apparent IRA terrorists, who, as I say, were subsequently arrested while attempting to enter the United States from Canada. I would also like to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the fact that the Americans have a lobby that is more in favour of the IRA than is the case in Canada.

● (2100)

I would be very interested, honourable senators, I repeat, to learn what information was supplied to the Government of Canada that would lead it to allow these three individuals into this country.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, there have been many instances of Senate committees making valuable suggestions which the government ought to take into consideration. Comments have even been made pertaining to the usefulness of the Senate as a whole. With regard to many of the people who make such comments, I am often very much afraid that they do not know exactly what the Senate is doing, so that they are unaware of the positive recommendations that Senate committees make from time to time.

Many such recommendations have been made by members of the Senate with a view to safeguarding the interests of the province of Manitoba. Many of these proposals have been made by members of the opposition. I refer, at the moment, in particular, to Senator Roblin and his remarks concerning the Garrison Dam project and the steps that ought to be taken to safeguard the fresh water in that locality, and the fish that inhabit it.

We have always been assured in this regard, "We will take the question as notice. We will give the appropriate answer." It seems to me, honourable senators, however, that we are always about three or four steps behind on this matter.

My question tonight is: Ought not the Government of Canada to take positive action to assure not only the Senate but also the people of Manitoba that they will make recommendations through the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the International Joint Commission with a view to seeing that steps are taken which will ensure that the Garrison project will not proceed on a step-by-step basis and eventually become a reality. We do not want this to happen in our province.

I have in my hand a cutting from the Winnipeg Free Press dated January 30. The first paragraph of this article is as follows:

A U.S. court decision permitting work to resume on the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota has heightened fears that foreign fish and bacteria ultimately will enter Manitoba waters.

Honourable senators, we request the assurance that this will not take place. The representations that have been made, spelling out our concern, ought to be taken into consideration. Therefore, I am asking my leader once again to take this matter very seriously and to make representations in the particular areas that I have referred to, so that appropriate answers may be found to this problem, and so that we who represent Manitoba in this chamber can go back to our province and tell our people that this matter will be finalized once and for all, and that the Garrison problem will no longer be facing us every second month of the year.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the concerns of Senator Guay, Senator Roblin and other representatives of Manitoba, I feel certain, are shared by senators from all parts of Canada, since this is a matter that affects an important area of our nation.

I can provide an additional, rather brief, chronology of events in recent days.

On January 22 an announcement came from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which stated that in November the United States Congress rejected the Burdick amendment, which would have given instructions to proceed with the Garrison project despite a court order banning further construction.

We expressed pleasure at this outcome, which followed vigorous efforts by our embassy, and personal representations by our ambassador and the Premier of Manitoba to ensure that members of Congress were fully aware of Canada's concerns. We were successful at that time, since Canada's active opposition was among the reasons cited for rejecting the amendment. We pledged at that time, honourable senators, that we would continue to express Canada's firm opposition to any aspect of the Garrison project which could endanger Canadian interests.

There seems to be a substantial court battle and political battle under way in the United States. Of course, controversy has surrounded this project from its very inception. The court battle is continuing, however. On January 29 the United States Circuit Court of Appeals agreed to stay an injunction blocking further construction on Garrison. The injunction was stayed pending a final decision by the court on the Department of the Interior's appeal.

The court's action will allow further construction and releases approximately $9 million previously appropriated for Garrison. While these funds will permit a limited start-up, they were appropriated on condition that they not be used for features potentially affecting Canada.

Reports indicate that construction may begin this spring on the West Oakes irrigation test area in the James River basin. This would not affect waters flowing into Canada.

I would like to remind honourable senators that in a diplomatic note of February 5, 1974, the United States gave formal assurances that it will honour its obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty not to pollute Canadian waters, and that no construction potentially affecting these waters will be undertaken until it is clear that these obligations will be met. United States authorities have regularly reiterated these assurances, most recently during bilateral consultations in October 1981. We have been in contact with them over this latest development to emphasize our continued opposition to any aspects of the Garrison project which could potentially affect Canadian interests.

Certainly the remarks of Senator Guay this evening, and his expressions of concern, will be communicated to the appropriate ministers. An assurance can be given that Canada is very concerned about this, and that everything possible is being done to protect Canadian interests.

Senator Guay: I would like to say that I appreciate the leader's comments. I am fully aware of the consequences of the report that was made in 1968, insofar as it concerns keeping the waters of the Red River clean. There have been other reports, such as the one in 1974.

What we do request here in this house, as well as in the other place, is some assurance beyond what Senator Perrault has said. We want the government to come out with a definite answer one of these days, giving the assurance that this will not be allowed. It has come out in court that the work will be continued, and we are not satisfied that enough representations have been made.

● (2110)

We are, in fact, fully aware that the International Joint Commission has not really made any move in this respect over the last six months or so. If there have been any recommendations by the International Joint Commission over the past few months, I would like to be informed of them by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As far as I am concerned, the Commission has not even been sitting. The people of Manitoba want to know what we are doing. We in this chamber are not satisfied with the answers we have received because we cannot, in turn, answer the questions put to us.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government would agree that it might be a good idea for Senator Guay to pursue this matter in the Liberal caucus tomorrow.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Guay, Senator Molgat, Senator Everett and other outstanding Liberal senators from Manitoba have been pursuing this matter assiduously, for many months; indeed, for years. I feel certain that they are well on the way to victory.

Senator Flynn: That is because they don't get a satisfactory answer here in the Senate. It might be more useful and practical to pursue this matter in caucus.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

RESPONSIBILITY OF HON. JACK AUSTIN, P.C.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State, whose responsibilities have recently been increased by—

An Hon. Senator: Leaps and bounds!

Senator Smith: —being given some responsibility for the Canada Development Corporation. I heard what he said, and I have not heard a more disturbing statement regarding that corporation since it was first incorporated. I heard him say—and if I am mistaken we can refer to the record to verify this—that he had been assigned the responsibility for liaison with the President of the Canada Development Corporation so that the interests of the chief shareholder, the Government of Canada, could be more adequately represented and, presumably—though this is my inference and not his—implemented by the board of directors of that company.

It is my recollection, honourable senators, that at the time this company was incorporated it was the government's statement that it should be a company which paid particular attention to persuading the private investors of Canada to invest in it. The minister himself said, only a short time ago, that the "principal shareholder," as he called it, the Government of Canada, has only approximately 48 per cent ownership of the company. It follows that the private investors of Canada must have the balance, which would be approximately 52 per cent. Who will represent the interests of the private investors of Canada in this corporation if the minister is going to ensure that the interests of the Government of Canada are more vigorously and intimately conveyed to the president of that corporation than has heretofore been the case?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I am happy to repeat what I said earlier—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, no, clarify!

Senator Smith: We heard what you said earlier.

Senator Austin: I have to be allowed to speak for a moment or two, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Provided that you say something else. We heard what you said earlier.

Senator Austin: In answer to your question, Senator Smith, as I said previously in answer to a question by Senator Nurgitz, the government is the principal shareholder of the Canada Development Corporation. I have been asked by the Prime Minister to examine the relationship between the principal shareholder, the board of directors, the president and the management of the company. I have been asked to discuss those questions with the board of directors, the chairman of the board, the president and the management, and to report back on the means by which a better relationship between the government, as principal shareholder, and the corporation can be effected.

I know that Senator Smith is aware, as is Senator Nurgitz, that from time to time Mr. Tony Hampson, the president, and Mr. Frederick Sellers, the chairman of the board, have indicated their feeling that, possibly, some interference by the government in the responsibilities of the board of directors has been more than theoretical. I have been asked by the Prime Minister to report back, after examining these questions with the corporation, in the hope that a most amicable relationship can continue.

I want to state very clearly that the Canada Development Corporation is and always has been run by its board of directors. There is no instance in which the Government of Canada has sought to intervene in the judgment and responsibility of the board of directors of that corporation.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I certainly hope that is true. I am inclined to accept it as the truth. I do not suggest that I would doubt the intent of the minister in answering any question, but he could be mistaken as to the facts as easily as could some of the rest of us. However, the very fact that he has been delegated to see that there is a better relationship between the Government of Canada and the board of directors of this company indicates to me that the Government of Canada wishes to interfere and to run that company. Otherwise, since it seems to be doing rather well, would not the Government of Canada and the minister be well advised to stand at a distance and leave these able gentlemen alone to run their affairs?

Senator Austin: I believe that Senator Smith, being as knowledgeable a person as he is with regard to business matters, will understand that the Government of Canada has a trust on behalf of the taxpayers and the citizens of this country to ensure that public funds are well used, though I am not indicating that public funds have not been well used in the Canada Development Corporation. In fact, I assured Mr. Hampson, the president, that I believed that the Canada Development Corporation was a great credit to him, to his management and the board of directors, as well as to its initial shareholder, the Government of Canada. However, after 10 years of investing in the Canada Development Corporation, any shareholder anywhere would query the purposes of the investment, and that is a normal question.

Quite frankly, I believe that I am taking a classic approach. Furthermore, I believe that Mr. Hampson also thinks I am taking a classic approach in saying that there are three matters to be examined. The first, qua the investor, has to do with the security of the assets and the opportunity for their growth. The second concerns the relationship between the principal shareholder and the board of directors, its president and management. The third has to do with the question of the investment in terms of the future. I believe those are normal questions, and do not in any way indicate that the government has the intention of interfering with the board of directors and with the management in its conduct of business. The government has not done so in the past and does not intend to do so in the future.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his comment. I must say, however, that as so often happens, the more vigorously he makes such comments, the more they disturb me. When he refers to the duties assigned to him by this government as being "classic duties" I am inclined to think that, in the mind of this government, it is a classic duty that its ministers should interfere in everything. Consequently, I would like to be very well assured in two or three months' time, or whenever the minister ceases interfering by way of his liaison, to know exactly what he has done so as to compare it with what happened before.

Senator Austin: I am prepared to be judged by the future.

Senator Smith: You will be judged by somebody else, not by the future.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must share in some of the concern expressed on this side of the chamber about the minister's actual function with respect to the Canada Development Corporation. I recall, when the corporation was set up, that the announced policy of the government was that over time it would dispose of its predominant position in that company; that it would reduce its position to a relatively modest level. On several occasions I have asked whether that policy has been abandoned and, if so, what the new policy is. I never received an answer, however. Perhaps, now that the minister has a specific responsibility, he can oblige me in this respect.

Honourable senators, I am troubled not only by the points raised by Senator Smith, but by the comments of the minister himself. He said that he would be dealing with the directors, the chairman, the president and the management. My friend is an experienced corporate person. He understands how corporations work. Indeed, he understands that when one goes through the board of directors to the management, one is really going behind the board of directors in that respect. When he says "management", I presume that he is not talking merely of Mr. Hampson or Mr. Sellers, whom he has mentioned previously by name, in addition to the management. I would like to know who is this management he intends to talk to. Are they members of the board of directors or not?

The other matter that rather bothers me is that I was under the impression that the government appointed some of the directors. If so, are not the people who are familiar with the operations of the company over a period of time those who should be asked to give some consideration to these matters? If the minister does not intend to interfere, what is he doing there at all?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He's just a dummy.

● (2120)

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin knows that Parliament created the Canada Development Corporation and that it made a minister of the Crown responsible for its shareholdings. Therefore, it is necessary for the minister to represent that investment in that corporation. I come to that responsibility by transfer from the Minister of Finance, as outlined in the government announcement. As the minister, I am responsible for the shares and for improving relations between the principal shareholder and the board of directors of that corporation.

Senator Flynn: How will you do that—simply by smiling or saying that you will improve the relations?

Senator Austin: When I refer to the chairman and the board of directors, I am, of course, referring to the people whose responsibility it is to run the corporation for all its shareholders, and there are 50,000 individual Canadian shareholders in the Canada Development Corporation. My discussions with the president and management are an entirely different matter. At the invitation of the president, Mr. Hampson, I have already had the benefit of a discussion with some of his management about the strategies of the corporation and the way in which it works.

In no way am I suggesting that I will operate to interfere with the way in which that corporation does its business. I am suggesting that because of certain comments, such as those referred to by Senator Nurgitz and comments made by Mr. Hampson and Mr. Sellers regarding their concerns about the overall nature of the government role in this corporation, I believe I should examine such concerns with these gentlemen. With the consent of these gentlemen, I have begun that process, and I shall carry it through.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would point out to the minister that, as a rule, it is the directors of a company who represent all the shareholders, and that it is a little irregular to find that one shareholder, no matter how important he may be, is able to go behind the board of directors and apparently to deal over, around or through them. Why cannot these shareholders who are ordinary Canadians be consulted in this matter, because they really own more of the corporation than does the government which my honourable friend represents. These people are being left out in the cold. Apparently, it is the policies of the government that will influence this corporation.

My honourable friend laughs, but that is the way in which the public which holds the majority of the shares looks at the matter. I want to know whether my honourable friend will share his discussions with the directors in due course with the other shareholders of the company. It seems to me that in all this business of protecting the public interest the government has overlooked the fact that there is a private interest which is a far more important interest in terms of the percentage of ownership than the public one. It seems to me that these people are being left out in the cold by the government policy which allows a minister to come in and eventually tell the company what he likes and does not like. Certainly, if the minister is not going to indicate what he likes or what he does not like, then he is wasting his time.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has very considerable corporate experience, and I find myself a bit troubled by the way in which he categorizes his questions. Frankly, I see nothing of substance in his concern that somehow I will go behind the board of directors or the chairman. I have said that I will consult with the chairman and the board and, of course, I will do so with the permission of the chairman, and, when it comes to management, with the permission of the president. I made that clear in my previous answer. With regard to his concern about access to these gentlemen by investors, there is nothing I am doing that would prevent any private investor from dealing with the president, the chairman of the board or the members of the board of directors.

Senator Roblin: Now, I have heard everything.

Senator Austin: I am doing nothing to prevent the access of these investors to the officials, and, also, there are financial advisers who constantly study the CDC on behalf of all investors, so I am totally mystified by the thrust of Senator Roblin's question.

Senator Flynn: What was the question?

Senator Benidickson: It was not a question; it was a statement.

Senator Austin: I would like to say to honourable senators opposite that I would consider it irregular indeed if they did not pursue questions with regard to the relationship of the government to the CDC, but to set up phoney categories which I describe as "wife-beating categories" and ask questions like; "Have you stopped beating your wife?", is not conducive to a rational explanation of the issue.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, what other shareholder of a company can go to the chairman and the president and say, "I want your consent to talk to your management" and receive an affirmative answer? I suggest, nobody. And to say that the private shareholders are on the same basis as the government in this situation is a ridiculous comment.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, in no way am I interfering with anybody in going to the officials of the company, and I leave the matter to the board of directors, the independence of whom the honourable senator defends, to make those decisions. They are not my decisions.

Senator Smith: I wonder if the honourable gentleman is going to treat the management and the directors of that company to some of the foggy nonsense he has just been treating us to? If he is, then, of course, he is harmless and I do not care. But if he is going there, as I think he is, to tell them what to do and how to do it, when he does not know himself and the government does not know either, then I am concerned.

[Senator Roblin.]

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

MEMBERSHIP OF ECONOMIC POLICY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I would ask the Minister of State whether he is a member of the committee of ministers and advisers presently developing new economic policy initiatives for the government under the chairmanship of Mr. James Coutts?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Who is he?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, without accepting the information, categories, designations or criteria of Senator Murray's question, Mr. Coutts chairs a committee which—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Then he is on the payroll again?

Senator Austin: —is a Liberal Party committee, and of which I am a member, but I am not prepared to discuss Liberal Party business as such in this chamber.

Senator Smith: No, I can understand that, and the less said, the better.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, far from this committee being a Liberal Party committee and dealing with Liberal Party business, the people of Canada have had an opportunity to see the members of that committee disporting themselves in the Prime Minister's conference room and in other rooms in these buildings, and the people of Canada have the very clear impression that this is a committee made up largely of senior ministers and advisers who are on the government payroll, and it would seem that nothing is more appropriate than that questions should be put and answered about this important committee which is apparently developing new economic policy initiatives for the government. I ask the minister, however, who assigned him and the members of this committee?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I was asked by a member of the Liberal Party executive to attend such a Liberal Party committee meeting, and I was delighted to help. The Liberal Party is very anxious to increase its credibility and support in western Canada, and I am very anxious to participate in any activity that would move in this particular direction.

Senator Smith: Does the honourable senator seriously think that his participation would increase the credibility of the Liberal Party in any way?

Senator Murray: Would the minister confirm that the Minister of Finance is not a member of this committee?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have said that I am not prepared to discuss the business of a Liberal Party committee in this chamber.

Senator Smith: Yes, you are very discreet.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I fear I must leave the "misty flats" of Liberal partisanship for the high road of internationalism with a question that is prompted by Senator Guay's question regarding the Garrison Dam project. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or the Leader of the Senate in the government, whether the final selection has been made of the third Canadian member of the International Joint Commission, which has gone on for month after weary month with three Americans and two Canadians? In these days of very exacerbated relations between the two countries, can the minister tell me whether the appointment has been made and, if so, who is the appointee?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that excellent progress is being made in the pursuit of excellence.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Then you must be going outside the party.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTEREST RATES

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has been stated repeatedly by the Minister of Finance that the reason for maintaining high interest rates is to fight inflation. It was recently stated that the rate of inflation during the month of December was 9.8 per cent, if I recall correctly. In view of this positive development, is the Leader of the Government in a position to indicate whether interest rates will be lowered in the near future?

• (2130)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a good question.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if there were a magic wand to wave and interest rates could be reduced, inflation controlled and full employment achieved, I am sure the Minister of Finance would wave that wand with all the vigour at his command. However, he did make this statement recently:

There's no fast track that I know of for the economy, where things all come together in a satisfactory pattern. You can't have inflation imbedded so deeply as we've had it and expect it to clear overnight. Let me tell you that unless we get it under control, we're not going to overcome unemployment.

I'm not concerned about inflation (just for myself). I am concerned about inflation because I believe firmly that the reason we have increasing unemployment is because we've had a hell of a lot of inflation.

He went on to say that because inflation and interest rates are so inextricably bound together it is inflation that is discouraging investment and not government policy. It is only in the realm of opposition fantasy that all of these economic problems can be resolved instantaneously.

Senator Flynn: Hot air!

Senator Perrault: The opposition spokesmen who, at one time had the responsibility for government—mercifully for a brief period of time—were the leading proponents on this continent of high interest rates as a method of controlling inflation. It is only in the opposition fantasy land that you achieve full employment simultaneously with reduced inflation and reduced interest rates.

What was the estimate given the other day on one of our national programs? Approximately 80 per cent of the economic problems afflicting Canada are generated outside our borders.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That's what you say.

Senator Perrault: So much for simplistic solutions offered by the opposition.

Mr. MacEachen went on to say:

How can you expect to have full confidence in the outcome of investments and how do you expect people to undertake them with readiness in such an inflationary environment?

Presumably, people who undertake investments are influenced very deeply by expectations. What we've been attempting to do with the budget is to establish some basis for changing these expectations, namely, that we are serious about inflation—

I would be pleased to provide members of the opposition with a copy of this speech given by the distinguished Minister of Finance.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Who wrote the speech?

Senator Perrault: The distinguished Minister of Finance, the Honourable Allan MacEachen.

Senator Smith: What is so distinguished about him?

Senator Perrault: Members of the opposition, on every TV program and in every interview, seem to have some magic solution for the present economic problems. If they will send those magic solutions to us in a plain brown envelope, we will put them into effect.

Senator Asselin: What paper did you get that from?

THE BUDGET

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We did not expect any.

Senator Perrault: During the recess we have been working assiduously to try to bring some of these replies to the chamber. I will not impose on the chamber some of the lengthy replies, but may I review with you the essence of them?

[Senator Perrault.]

On November 18, 1981, Senator Roblin asked a question concerning the Established Programs Financing Arrangements. I have a rather long reply to that question, the final paragraph of which reads as follows:

As a result of the budget proposals, total federal transfers to the provinces will continue to increase at an average annual rate of 11.6 per cent.

So much for the myth that there will be drastic slashes.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Of course there will be drastic slashes.

Senator Perrault: The paragraph continues:

(This takes into account provincial cash entitlements, the EPF tax transfer as well as associated equalization.) In 1981-82, these transfers are estimated at $11,477 million, increasing to $19,862 million by 1986-87.

However, honourable senators, may I propose that the complete reply be incorporated into the record of today's proceedings? Honourable senators may wish to ask further questions on it, although they may be completely satisfied with the reply.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before I give my consent to his proposal, may I ask my honourable friend whether his statement deals with the fact that when the budget was originally delivered the Minister of Finance said that the provinces would be getting about $1.6 billion less than they otherwise would with his scheme; that later on he was able to raise that estimate to some $2.25 billion; and that recently he has made a final admission that it is well over $4 billion, between $4 billion and $5 billion? I ask my honourable friend which of these various figures we are to take as being correct, and whether it is likely that we will get a fourth estimate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course the entire question is under discussion at the first ministers' meetings which are taking place in this city.

May I suggest that we put on the record the minister's response to Senator Roblin's question of November 18? After the meetings have concluded this week, perhaps in the light of information brought forward from those meetings the entire situation can be clarified to the honourable senator's satisfaction.

Senator Roblin: I would be satisfied with that, but my honourable friend left me with the impression that the statement made by some of us—to the effect that the provinces would be much worse off under the new MacEachen plan than they were before—was not correct. If that is what he said and that is what he meant, then I think that the answer will be entirely unsatisfactory.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think that there may be a difference in perception regarding what involves being "better off" or being "worse off." If certain cost-sharing programs continued their upward escalation, following the trend of the past five or six years, there would be a substantial payment by the federal government to these provincial programs. As I think I stated in an earlier Question Period, the rate of increase is being slowed. If one can describe that as a loss to the provinces, a slowing of the rate of increase, that does not represent a decline in constant dollars in the support for those programs.

Senator Roblin: I know that we do not want to get into a debate on this subject now, but I merely point out to my honourable friend that the reason for the rise in the past few years, that he refers to as being excessive, is because the cost of running the schools, the hospitals and social welfare systems has been rising to force it up. If you bring in an arbitrary ceiling on that and say that you don't care, that you are only going to contribute so much, then obviously the service will decline because the costs continue to rise, or the local taxpayers will pay. That is really the argument.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in the circumstances, I will read the entire reply:

The question raised by the Honourable Duff Roblin addresses two aspects of the federal budget proposals tabled on November 12, 1981. First, the effect of the termination of compensation for the 1972 revenue guarantee on the Established Programs Financing Arrangements; and second, the net impact of the federal budget proposals on provincial revenues for established programs.

With regard to EPF, the federal government proposes to terminate compensation for the 1972 revenue guarantee. This program was originally introduced to provide a five-year transition period to allow provinces to adjust to income tax reforms introduced in 1972. Subsequently, during the 1977 negotiations on the fiscal arrangements, the federal government agreed to transfer to the provinces one additional point of personal income tax and the cash equivalent of a second point, in order to settle the question of the revenue guarantee and other outstanding issues involved in those negotiations.

In fact, the revenue guarantee compensation was never intended to finance health care or post-secondary education, nor have provinces treated it as such in computing federal contributions towards these programs. Removal of the revenue guarantee for the 1982-83 to 1986-87 arrangements represents a fiscal adjustment that does not lower the level of federal support for these basic social programs.

There would be one other modification to EPF under the federal proposals: Beginning April 1, 1982, federal contributions to all provinces would be equal per capita resulting in an average saving to the federal government of $75 million a year.

● (2140)

As a result of the budget proposals, total federal transfers to the provinces will continue to increase at an average annual rate of 11.6 per cent.

I emphasize the word "increase".

Senator Smith: Oh, go on with you.

Senator Perrault:

(This takes into account provincial cash entitlements, the EPF tax transfer as well as associated equalization.) In 1981-82, these transfers are estimated at $11,477 million, increasing to $19,862 million by 1986-87.

Honourable senators, there is the statement—

Senator Smith: There is the statement and we don't believe it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is the truth, and it is too bad if you don't believe it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable Senator Smith is the doubting Thomas in the Senate. He is always asking for proof beyond the bounds of reason.

Senator Smith: All I ask is some proof.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL DEBT—STATEMENT BY AUDITOR GENERAL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on November 18, 1981, concerning the government's response to the Auditor General's report. There is a very long reply here. May I suggest to Senator Asselin that we incorporate this long reply into the record of today's proceedings. The reply runs to approximately 12 pages, which represents the degree of research which has gone into answering this inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of answer see appendix.)

THE BUDGET

MODIFICATIONS OF PROVISIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on November 19, 1981 concerning inequities arising through time differences in the announcement of the budget. I shall try to paraphrase the question because it is longer than the reply.

Senator Nurgitz said that he was sure the Leader of the Government would not want people in his province to have an advantage over people in the other provinces. For example, he stated that the forward averaging annuities, in effect, are wiped out for a young athlete who lives in the maritimes, Quebec or Ontario, simply because of the time zones.

Traditionally, budget measures become effective the day after their announcement in the House of Commons. Clearly, this lack of prior notice is intended to ensure that taxpayers are not able to arrange their affairs in such a manner so as to defeat the purpose of the budget provisions. The other alternative, having the measures effective prior to or on the date of their announcement, would be retroactive, and is considered to be too harsh a treatment for taxpayers across the country who legitimately arranged their affairs within the existing rules. The budget speech is generally read by the Minister of Finance at 8.00 p.m., being after the normal closing time of the stock exchanges and financial businesses in the western provinces. The government considers this to be the most viable approach.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That a special committee of the Senate, to be composed of seven members, be appointed to inquire into and report upon

- (a) any matter relating to labour relations in Canada with particular reference to problems concerning the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes; and

(b) any proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, may I suggest that this order stand until February 23, and if at that time no honourable senator wishes to speak to this matter we might discuss the way to dispose of this motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I agree with Senator Deschatelets.

Order stands.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL SESSION, MUNICH, WEST GERMANY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Munich, Federal Republic of Germany, from 11th to 16th October, 1981, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe I have the authority of Senator Hastings to say that he is content that that order be considered debated unless there is any other senator who wishes to speak to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I went to Munich as a member of the Canadian delegation and I might wish next week to take part in the debate on Order No. 14.

Senator Frith: In that case, I ask that the order stand in the name of Senator Leblanc.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Order stands.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL DEBT—STATEMENT BY AUDITOR GENERAL

(Answer to question asked by Senator Asselin on November 18, 1981.)

The issues raised by the Auditor General, and referred to in Senator Asselin's question, were dealt with fully by the Comptroller General, Mr. Harry Rogers, when he appeared before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts on November 17, 1981 and again on November 19, 1981.

It should be noted that, in reporting on the financial statements of the Government of Canada for the year ended March 31, 1981, the Auditor General stated that in his opinion the financial statements presented information in accordance with the stated accounting policies of the Government of Canada, and that the accounting policies, except for specified accounting changes identified by the Government, were consistent with those of the preceding year.

As stated in the Preface to the Government's financial statements, the Government's accounting policies reflect the fact that the financial statements have been "designed primarily to provide an accounting of the financial resources appropriated by Parliament. The fundamental requirement to report compliance with legislative authority results in the presentation of financial information in a manner significantly different from that found in the private sector."

It is further noted in that preface, with respect to the Statement of Assets and Liabilities, that

"Since this statement is based on the Government's accounting policies, it does not parallel the conventional balance sheet presented in the private sector. More particularly, fixed assets having been accounted for as expenditures, are recorded at the nominal value of $1, and revenues not yet received, such as uncollected taxes, are not recorded as financial claims. . . . it should be noted that the difference between the reported assets and liabilities is simply the aggregate of budgetary surpluses and deficits determined in accordance with the accounting policies of the Government; in no way does this difference reflect the Government's net worth."

The policies with respect to the reporting of the financial assets and liabilities are consistent with the Report of the Study of the Accounts of Canada endorsed by the then Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee in 1976.

The Auditor General's concerns are not with the application of current accounting policies but with changes in these policies which he judges to be desirable. The Auditor General has estimated that if the Government were to change its stated accounting policies to deal with his concerns the net effect would be to reduce the level of reported assets by $3.4 billion and increase the level of reported liabilities by approximately $5.6 billion. The net effect of reducing reported assets and the increasing reported liabilities would be to augment the level of the accumulated deficit from the $81.3 billion as reported in the financial statements as of March 31, 1981 by approximately $9 billion. It is noteworthy that this amount represents an increase that would have occurred over time with only a fraction impacting on the reported surplus or deficit in any given fiscal year.

The basis for the existing policies, with respect to the specific assets and liability items which were the subject of the Auditor General's reservations, is explained in Mr. Rogers statement which is appended (see pp. 6-7 as regards the level of reported assets, and pp. 3-5 as regards the level of reported liabilities). The existing financial statements disclose, through notes, the terms and conditions of the loans to developing countries and advances and subscriptions to the capital of international development associations, which are the subject of the Auditor General's concern as regards the reported level of assets. The notes also list certain financial liabilities which are not included, and which are the subject of the reservation with respect to the level of reported liabilities.

It is accepted that alternate accounting policies with respect to coverage and to valuation of assets and liabilities could be adopted. However, the specific reservations made by the Auditor General do not, in the Government's view, provide a balanced picture of the impact of adopting a broader approach with respect to assets and liabilities. In his statement to the Public Accounts Committee, the Comptroller General identified close to $30 billion in assets which could be considered for inclusion under different approaches to accounting policy; this figure did not include the value of lands, buildings and works owned directly by the government.

It is thus the Government's position that the current financial statements, including the notes thereto, provide a true and fair view of the financial position of Canada on the established basis. There is full disclosure, through the preface and notes to the financial statements, of the accounting policies followed and of special items such as the terms and conditions of loans to developing countries. It would be premature to modify existing accounting policies pending the development of generally accepted government reporting standards which are currently under study in conjunction with the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Finally, it should be recognized that the adjustments suggested by the Auditor General do not provide a balanced picture of the overall implications of adopting a broader approach to the inclusion and valuation of government assets and liabilities should such an approach eventually be judged to be desirable.

GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSE TO THE RESERVATIONS OF THE AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Public Accounts Committee:

In reviewing the two reservations made by the Auditor General in his Opinion, I would like to underline the fact that he agrees that the Government's financial statements have been prepared in accordance with the stated accounting policies. Accordingly, his reservations relate not to the application of the policies themselves but rather to the absence of generally accepted accounting principles for governments. In the case of the Federal Government, its accounting policies are primarily based on concepts found in legislation.

In the Preface to the financial statements, it is stated that the statements have been "designed primarily to provide an accounting of the financial resources appropriated by Parliament. The fundamental requirement to report compliance with legislative authority results in the presentation of financial information in a manner significantly different from that found in the private sector. The accrual basis of accounting used in the private sector best reflects the costs incurred to earn revenues; the policies followed by the Government under which revenue is on the cash basis and the use of appropriations is on generally the accrual basis, best accommodate reporting to Parliament".

I am pleased to inform you that numerous and significant changes have been made in the financial statements in recent years to improve firstly, accounting for the resources appropriated by Parliament and, secondly reporting of financial information to Parliament.

The financial statements now include allowances for the valuation of the recorded assets of the Government to show more accurately the amounts expected to be collected or recovered from financial claims. The valuation of recorded assets is necessary to recognize in the current year expected future losses. The liabilities of the Government now include accounts payable at the year-end to provide better accounting on the use of appropriation authorities on which Parliament has imposed annual ceilings. This has the effect of recognizing, as charges to appropriations, debts incurred prior to the end of the year for work performed, goods received, services rendered or resulting from contractual arrangements. In earlier years not all these debts were recorded in the year in which they applied.

The notes to the financial statements now include disclosure of the terms and conditions of loans to developing countries and advances and subscriptions to the capital of international development associations. In addition there is disclosure of insurance programs operated by agent Crown corporations and improved disclosure of the financial position of agent Crown corporations to show all of the assets and liabilities of such corporations which are not consolidated with those of the Government.

You will note from the above that the underlying objective of all these changes is to improve progressively the Government's accounting policies, within existing legislation, and its reporting to Parliament. As part of our continuous research in these matters we constantly and closely monitor the developments and practices of other governments and the private sector.

This may be an appropriate moment to mention that the Office of the Comptroller General has recently initiated a project on the preparation of new summary financial statements for the Government of Canada. This is a project of paramount importance which will develop and assess alternative accounting policies which might be used in the preparation of new and different summary financial statements.

UNRECORDED LIABILITIES

Mister Chairman, I would now like to explain the Government's position on unrecorded liabilities.

As a result of the accounting policies of the Government, the Auditor General has highlighted examples of items which in his view should be classified as liabilities and recorded in the financial statements. Those identified and quantified by the Auditor General amount to $5.6 billion. The Government has expressed its view to the Auditor General that his Opinion does not present a balanced picture in that there are numerous items which have the nature of assets which also have not been recorded on the Statement of Assets and Liabilities. The following are worthy of noting:

	Billions
Accounts receivable relating to tax and non-tax revenue (Section 32, Vol. II)	$ 1.7
Market Value of Canada's gold reserves (20,882,-353 ounces at $608.49 per ounce) as at March 31, 1981	$12.7
Equipment and stores valued by the Auditor General at March 31, 1980	$15.0

These examples, which do not include the value of lands, buildings and works, have been identified to ensure that the Auditor General's views of unrecorded liabilities are not taken in isolation from the accounting treatment given to transactions relating to the assets listed above. Notes 1(vi) and (vii) to the audited financial statements clearly identify our policies regarding assets and liabilities, a practice which is completely consistent with the Report of the Study of the Accounts of Canada and the Government's modified cash basis of accounting.

You may recall that the Study of the Accounts of Canada was undertaken in 1975 by representatives of the Department of Finance, the Receiver General's Office and of the Treasury Board Secretariat to study the principles, practices and purposes underlying the accounts of Canada. After considering the many recommendations contained in the Report of the Study of the Accounts of Canada, the Public Accounts Committee in its Report to the House dated March 9, 1976 stated "After careful examination and having been assured by the Auditor General that the measures being proposed are sound and in accordance with current accounting standards, your Committee endorses the 41 recommendations contained in the Study of the Accounts of Canada". The Report to the House also recommended "that the Treasury Board should implement these recommendations as soon as technically possible to do so".

Mister Charman, I would now like to deal specifically with the three items included in the reservation on unrecorded liabilities, the first one being accounts payable on statutory appropriations.

Accounts Payable Relating to Statutory Appropriations

For the year ending March 31, 1980 the Government introduced a new policy on the recording of accounts payable at the year-end. This policy was introduced to provide better reporting on the use of appropriation authorities on which Parliament has imposed annual ceilings. The policy does not apply to statutory appropriations because parliamentary control is normally on the specific amounts which can be paid to qualifying recipients. The Study of the Accounts of Canada recognized this situation in one of its recommendations, (number 24). The Report stated in part "Little would be gained in setting up accounts payable for statutory appropriations, particularly those which have the nature of transfer payments". It is noteworthy that the items identified by the Auditor General all relate to transfer payments authorized by statutory appropriations.

Employee Termination Benefits

The Government does not record employee termination benefits as liabilities since they have the nature of contingent liabilities rather than direct liabilities. Termination benefits paid in the year are included in expenditures while projected termination benefits, that is those payable in the year following the Public Accounts' year, are included as part of Salaries and Wages in the Estimates.

Present Value of Indexed Pensions for Persons Now Retired

Unlike the principal pension plan accounts which are operated by the Government as employer, as well as trustee, on a fully-funded basis, the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account, the account providing indexation payments, is operated on a mainly pays-as-you-go financing basis. The present accounting basis best reflects Parliament's direction to finance the indexing payments in this way.

By way of recognition of the possible value of the indexing benefits which have been granted to pensioners, there was a note in the 1981 Public Accounts of Canada, which cited a $4.2 billion present value for the supplementary benefits granted up to March 31, 1981. This figure is a reflection of actuarial projections which in turn reflect a number of assumptions with regard to future inflation, interest rates and other variable factors.

In the opinion of the Auditor General, the estimated value of future benefit payments should not only be noted but should be "booked" as a liability of the Government of Canada. Such an accounting practice is difficult to justify given that the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act stipulates indexing benefits are to be financed on a mainly pay-as-you-go basis. Such accounting might be appropriate only if Parliament were to agree to an alternative financing method that would alter the actuarial status of the pension indexing program.

SPECIAL ASSISTANCE LOANS AND SUBSCRIPTIONS TO THE SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT FUNDS OF INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Mister Chairman, I would now like to explain the Government's position on special assistance loans and subscriptions to the special development funds of international financial institutions.

As stated in the notes to the financial statements, assets are recorded at cost, that is the amount of money actually paid, and are then subject to valuation to reflect estimated losses on realization.

The Auditor General agrees that this course of action has been followed for the loans and subscriptions in question. However he is suggesting that a different basis of valuation should have been used, one which recognizes as an expenditure of the current year the present value of future benefits. These future benefits represent the difference between the prevailing market rates and the interest actually charged under the terms of the loans and subscriptions. The Auditor General has stated that were this present value basis to be adopted, there would be no effect on the accumulated deficit over the entire term of the loans.

The Government has taken the position that any interest on the public debt relating to the provision of such loans and subscriptions is best recognized in the year in which it is incurred. This is consistent with the treatment accorded all expenditures. It is also consistent with the purpose of the financial statements which is to provide an accounting of the financial resources appropriated by Parliament.

The Study of the Accounts of Canada also supports this position as highlighted in the following quotation:

"A number of loans and advances have been made at interest rates which were lower than those paid by the government at that time. In other cases, the loans may have reflected interest rates at the time they were made, but such historical rates bear little relationship to current debt costs. It is not recommended that these loans be discounted to their present value at current interest costs because this would be anticipating future debt costs which are often unpredictable and which may or may not be incurred depending upon the government's overall financial requirements at that time. Furthermore, to do so, consistency would require the Government's own debt to be revalued at current interest rates. Neither of these exercises would produce particularly useful information since the government does not allocate interest costs to most programs and generally accounts for its debt costs as they accrue or are paid."

The Auditor General has underlined the fact that benefits are conferred to the recipients from the low interest rates, the grace period and the extended repayment schedule. The Government agrees. However, it is felt that the purposes of the financial statements are best met by recognizing the benefits in the accounts only when the related expenditures are incurred. The annual deficit of the Government already includes the annual cost of the loans and subscriptions. The interest foregone reduces revenues while expenditures include interest on the public debt.

To provide complete disclosure of these loans and subscriptions a note is included in the audited financial statements. This is consistent with a recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee included in the Report to the House dated February 21, 1979 which recommended that the terms of the loans and subscriptions be disclosed in the audited financial statements.

CONCLUSION

Mister Chairman, in concluding I would like to underline again that the Opinion expressed by the Auditor General clearly states that the Government's financial statements have been prepared in accordance with the stated accounting policies included in Note 1 to the financial statements. Accordingly his reservations relate not to the application of the policies themselves but rather to his preference that they be prepared according to policies yet to be developed and considered. Perhaps I should explain this statement. In 1976, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants (CICA) created a Study Group to catalogue existing practices in legislative accounting, reporting and auditing. In 1980, the Study Group issued its report and concluded that there is a need for generally accepted reporting standards for federal and provincial governments to achieve consistency in financial reporting.

The Study Group also concluded that the CICA should take the initiative in encouraging the establishment of a body to work toward the development of generally accepted government reporting standards. Let me assure you that I support the work of the CICA in this endeavour. Mr. Jacques Léger, the Deputy Comptroller General of the Policy Development Branch of my Office, who is a Chartered Accountant, is a member of the CICA's Government Accounting and Auditing Committee.

Mister Chairman, until proposals for such standards are developed and considered I believe that it is premature to modify our accounting policies in anticipation of them. Until then, I strongly believe that the reservations of the Auditor General expressed in his Opinion can best be accommodated by notes to the financial statements or other forms of disclosure elsewhere in the Public Accounts.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMATION TO SENATORS

On the tabling of:

Report of operations under the Fisheries Development Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 10 of the said Act, Chapter F-21, R.S.C., 1970.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, may I ask a question as a result of the tabling of that document? It has appeared over the years that the mailing lists of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans do not include many senators. Would the leader check with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to find out whether senators are on the mailing lists, particularly those senators who come from areas or districts where fishing is an important part of the economy? It is my experience that a lot of the information that I used to get as a member of Parliament is not coming to me now.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall be pleased to comply with Senator Marshall's request. In addition, I suggest that those senators who specifically wish to have their names placed on mailing lists of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans should make that known to that department as soon as possible. I certainly welcome Senator Marshall's suggestion.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

PRESENT STATE—POSSIBILITY OF NEW BUDGET

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question I raised on two previous occasions—I believe on November 17 and December 1 last? In the minister's judgment, is Canada now in an economic recession?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, according to the definition that the honourable senator wished to use at that time, there have been two occasions when there was a decline that fitted that particular definition.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that being the case, is the government giving consideration to the presentation of a new budget that would attack the problems of recession?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no, the government is not giving consideration to presenting a new budget, because a number of proposals that are in the present budget, which is now before Parliament, deal with one of the underlying causes of our economic difficulty, namely, higher than acceptable inflation.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPLACEMENT OF RETIRING PRESIDENT

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government? My question arises as a result of the recent announcement concerning the retirement of Dr. Bandeen as President of Canadian National Railways. Is the government expecting a recommendation in the near future from the directors of Canadian National Railways respecting a replacement for that eminent gentleman?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government, of course, regrets the resignation of Dr. Bandeen from the post he has occupied with such distinction. The question will be taken as notice, and information will be presented to the Senate with respect to the recruitment of his replacement.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, will the government take some care to see that Dr. Bandeen's replacement comes from within the ranks of the CNR as of now rather than from an outside source?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Dr. Bandeen's resignation becomes effective on March 31, so there is adequate time to appoint someone before he departs to follow other interests. The honourable senator's proposal that a replacement be sought from within the ranks of the Canadian National Railways system will certainly be given serious consideration.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO MEXICO

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Minister of State? I do not know what his new title is. It embodies economic development and regional development. His wings have been spread a little farther, and we shall watch the new developments with some interest.

● (1410)

I think perhaps I could ask him today about the statement that was made recently on the policies of the government with respect to the financing of Candu sales to Mexico. It is alleged that it is a policy of the government to provide a preferred rate of interest to Mexico to enable that project to proceed. Is that supposition a correct one, and, if it is correct, what are the details of the government's policy in respect of this matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what is clear is that if Canada is going to sell Candu reactors, or, indeed, any other such major item, we have to deal with competition in the international market.

The honourable senator's next question was: What are the further details of this policy of the government? I do not think it would be in the interests of our negotiations, honourable senators, for us to let our competitors know what the so-called preferred rate of interest may be. In a lot of international dealings at present, even though all other things are equal, or even superior—I refer to the quality of the workmanship, the material, and so on—it is a fact of life that negotiations centre very largely around the cost of financing. However, I think some progress has been made recently by all of the countries involved in this kind of so-called concessional financing towards making sure that they are not hurting each other more than they really need to, for we know what kind of a mug's game that can be.

Canada has been in the forefront of trying to introduce more common sense, if that is the right expression, into the matter of how far we should go with regard to concessional financing.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the problem the honourable senator sketches. I fear, however, that the Mexicans will quite likely tell other people what concessional rate has been offered to them, since they are in a bargaining position. It is a little sad that we are not in a similar bargaining position when it comes to purchasing Mexican oil.

What really attracted my attention to this matter was the inference that the subsidized element of interest would be supplied not only by the Export Development Corporation, which is a well established principle at the present time, but also out of general funds. I am wondering whether this represents a new departure in respect of government concessional financing policy. I appreciate what the minister says about getting in line with the United States, which, I suggest, seems to be pushing quite hard now to get rid of this concessional interest rate business, or, at least, to limit it.

ENERGY

EXPORTATION OF ELECTRICITY—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a statement has been made that the government is giving consideration to financial assistance for the development of a second nuclear plant in New Brunswick for the purpose of exporting electricity to the United States. I leave that question to be dealt with on its merits when it arises, but I would ask the minister whether he has given any consideration to the export of electrical energy from other sources in the country. For example, in Manitoba, on the Nelson River, there is a very large hydroelectric development which is looking for markets in the United States. If financial assistance is to be given in the case of a nuclear plant in New Brunswick, then I suggest that the minister will be asked to provide similar consideration for plants such as the one in Manitoba, and, indeed, in Quebec. I wonder if the minister would tell me whether any consideration has been given to financial assistance in the case of Manitoba, or any other province, in its search for markets in the United States.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, we are clearly interested in the further development of energy resources all over the country, and that includes Manitoba, whose major energy resource, of course, is a substantial amount of potential unused hydroelectric power. I think, however, that we have to recognize that there are other negotiations also under way respecting a grid system throughout western Canada that could be rather substantially supplied from that source of power.

● (1415)

As you know, there is a new government in Manitoba which, I believe, is taking all of these things into consideration. I expect that before long that government will inform not only us but also the other provinces that the previous government was carrying on negotiations respecting that matter.

To add a further element of the use of that power, there were one or two other mega-projects—for example, Alcan—that had also reached the discussion stage, possibly even the negotiation stage, although I am not trying to draw a line between the two, for a fairly significant block of that power.

I believe that at the present time the Government of Manitoba is thinking about those matters rather intensely and will make some decision with respect to them. At present I am not at liberty to discuss them because I, as a member of the government, have not had any formal presentation made to me, nor do I know whether any other member of the government has received such a presentation. During the last couple of days, however, I have had an opportunity to discuss a number of economic development matters as they pertain to Manitoba with the new Minister of Economic Development of that province. Therefore, I know that the members of that government have it under active consideration.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I agree with a good deal of what the minister has said. I realize that the new Government of Manitoba will need a little time to consider all of the alternatives. It is my opinion that there is sufficient power available in the Nelson River to take care of all of the obligations and possibilities that the minister has mentioned and, at the same time, to leave some room for export.

My principal point, however, is that it appears that the government is in the process of establishing a policy of subsidi-dizing the export of electrical power from, in the case in point, New Brunswick. I want the government to give some consideration to extending the same financial assistance to other people who may be exporting power to the United States. While the provincial government of Manitoba has perhaps not yet approached the minister, I believe that if it knew there was a policy that would fit Manitoba as well as New Brunswick, it wouldn't be too long before the representatives of the provincial government would be talking to the minister about it. Therefore, I ask him to give some consideration to that possibility, and to let me know whether a statement can be made on the matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend opposite that this government has a policy of being, wherever possible, equally fair to all regions of this country.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: That is what I want to hear. Thank you.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

CONCESSIONAL FINANCING—NEGATIVE SPREAD ON LOANS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I was interested in the minister's comments about concessional financing. I wonder whether he could obtain for us a summary of the so-called negative spread on loans granted by the Export Development Corporation over the past two years.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not exactly sure of what is meant by "negative spread." Yes, I realize that there is one simplistic explanation, but there is another one which is closer to reality and which is a little more complicated; that is, the problem of having made loans at a certain rate only to find, prior to the completion, that the rate has changed. This is often the case and it would be an extremely complicated procedure to provide such a summary. I will, however, give an undertaking to take a look at that.

I believe there is another factor that my honourable friend may want to take into account as well, and that is that there are two types of loans. One is on the export development corporate account and the other is on the Export Development Corporation of Canada account. Usually there is a specific reason for the use of the Canada account, such as our international commitments to certain countries around the world, depending on the kind of project involved. I will take all of these factors into consideration and try to provide an answer, although I cannot guarantee providing the numbers in exactly the way I understood would be required by the question. Perhaps after I have read the question carefully I will understand it better.

Senator Murray: I do not want to complicate either the minister's life or my own unnecessarily. Let me tell him that I am looking for a statement of the difference between the cost of the money to the corporation and the rate at which the money is being loaned.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in most cases there has been no loss, but there are a few cases where there have been some losses.

RUSSIAN NATURAL GAS DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS—LOAN TO LAVALIN INC.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the minister is providing information about the Export Development Corporation, I wonder if he would let me know whether the Export Development Corporation is planning to lend money for a project in the Soviet Union at a concessional rate of 10 per cent as opposed to a buying rate of 16 per cent, the effect of which will cost the country approximately $200 million in the form of an interest subsidy over the term of the loan. Would my honourable friend tell me whether my previous statement reflects a loan that is now under consideration by the Export Development Corporation, or whether this is some arrangement that was completed in the past? Also, can he inform me, considering the present-day circumstances, what the government's policy is on future loans to the Soviet Union?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, with respect to changes in policy regarding loans with the Soviet Union in light of recent circumstances, I shall check with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I shall also check to determine whether the loan which the honourable senator has described is under consideration. I do not wish to get into a position of either confirming or denying what seems to me to be some reporter's speculation. I do not believe there is any reporter who knows for certain whether the Export Development Corporation is negotiating a loan at 10 per cent or at any other rate of interest, although they certainly have the right to, and, indeed, they do, speculate on such matters. I shall look into the matter. Perhaps it would be helpful if the honourable senator would give me the name of the project which is supposed to be under consideration.

Senator Roblin: Yes, I can do that. The loan is allegedly to be made to Lavalin Inc., which has been negotiating for some time with respect to natural gas development projects in the southern part of the Soviet Union. It may well be that this whole proposition was arranged long before there was any problem with respect to the Soviet government, and I accept that. However, I would like to know whether or not the facts are correct and, more particularly, what the government policy will be in the future.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Perhaps also for the benefit of my honourable colleagues and of all Canadians who are still dumbfounded by what was said, I should like to know exactly what the Canadian government's position is on Poland.

During the holidays, a number of apparently contradictory statements were made, either by the Prime Minister or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and these contradictions or statements have caused a great deal of concern in the minds of the Polish minorities in this country and of all Canadians in general.

For instance, the Prime Minister reportedly said that having martial law in Poland was better than being invaded by the Soviet Union. The Prime Minister was also quoted as having said that Solidarity had gone too far, that the situation had to be brought under control, and meanwhile, thousands of Poles were being thrown in jail because they publicly disagreed with the imposition of martial law. Later, however, it seems that on the occasion of the American day for Poland, the Prime Minister of Canada had practically withdrawn his previous statements on Poland and that he spoke enthusiastically about freedom for the workers. All of this has confused Canadians. I should hate to think that the Prime Minister is rejoicing at the arbitrary arrests and denial of freedom—

Hon. Azellus Denis: Get on with your question.

Senator Asselin: —suffered by the Poles during the months of December and January.

With leave, I should like to point out to Senator Denis that he never asks questions, he never has. I have been in this chamber since 1972, and I can recall very few instances where I have seen Senator Denis fulfil his responsibilities as a senator. So I suggest, Senator Denis, that you let those who want to work get on with it.

Senator Denis: Lies, as usual.

Senator Asselin: If you want to go on like that, please do, but you are going to suffer the consequences.

Senator Denis: Lies, as usual.

Senator Asselin: My question is as follows: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us what the Canadian government's position is on the crisis in Poland? Is it still in favour of martial law as it is applied in that country? Will the Prime Minister make a more detailed statement to provide clarification and assuage the concern of Canadians? I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would inform us on this matter.

● (1425)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The efforts being made in some quarters to portray the Right Honourable the Prime Minister as an apologist for the military regime in Poland are, to say the least, reprehensible.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That is what he said.

Senator Perrault: That suggestion by the official opposition, when they know better, does them no credit.

Senator Smith: We know what he said.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Perrault: During the Prime Minister's entire career and during his entire lifetime he has been a proponent of free speech and human freedoms. His record in Quebec before he entered politics clearly indicates that. His efforts to give Canada a Charter of Rights indicates that he is an avid, fervent and strong proponent of freedom under the law for as many Canadians as possible.

The Bible says: "By their works you shall know them." Canada need make no apology for its record with respect to Poland or any other nation suffering persecution, where the rights of the people are not enjoyed in the same way as they are in this nation. It can be said that from Canada's perspective there are no substantial indications that Poland is moving toward national reconciliation, although this was urged by the Prime Minister in November. Martial law has not been lifted, many Poles remain in detention, and dialogue with the union and the church has not been resumed.

The session of the Polish parliament which opened on January 25 offers an important opportunity for the government to make meaningful progress in these areas. It is hoped that the Polish parliament will take full account of international public opinion and concern in their deliberations, and that they will adopt measures to permit the resumption of the process of social reconstruction.

As far as Canada is concerned, we are not anxious to take economic or political measures against Poland. At the same time, we are concerned about the continuing violation of human rights and the failure to honour commitments under the Helsinki Final Act. This has been said several times by the Prime Minister, but still the question is being asked: Where does Canada stand?

Canada's overall efforts have been generous. In relation to the number of people in this nation, Canada has done more than any other nation in the world to help the Polish people during the crisis. In 1981, over 6,500 Poles were accepted for admittance to Canada through the annual refugee plan, family reunification and special measures within Canada which, incidentally, are still in effect.

Under the 1982 annual refugee plan a substantial proportion of the level of 6,000 self-exiles from Eastern Europe will go to Poles in Austria. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has also encouraged private sponsorship.

In the current situation, we do not believe that any further increases are warranted. Any further action should be part of the international resettlement effort, rather than just a few countries as at present.

We continue to closely monitor the situation in consultation with the UNHCR and other western countries.

This does not relate directly to the honourable senator's questions, but the following are efforts which Canada supports.

The Thirty-eighth Session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission began February 1 in Geneva and will meet until March 12. On February 2 the Canadian representative, Ambassador Yvon Beaulne, who is known to many of us, as Chairman of the Western European and Others Group introduced on behalf of Australia, Canada, Denmark, the F.R.G., France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, the U.K., and the U.S.A. a draft decision concerning the human rights situation in Poland. That action, of course, is fully supported by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. He is in the forefront of the effort to help the Poles in a responsible and sane way.

• (1430)

The draft decision shows concern about the human rights situation in Poland and requests the commission to consider, as a matter of priority, the question of human rights in Poland under the agenda item which covers the question of the violation of human rights worldwide.

A very interesting letter appeared in one of the leading Canadian newspapers the other day. I have a copy of that letter before me. May I read an excerpt from it? It is signed by Alexander Kadulski, who states that he is a former Polish naval officer and an underground freedom fighter against Hitler and then a freedom fighter against Stalin. He says:

I am not afraid of fighting, but with years came the realization that Poles are being used once again as pawns in the struggle of the superpowers.

He goes on to say—

Senator Asselin: Who said that?

Senator Perrault: Well, I will provide you with a copy of the letter, honourable senators.

Hon. C. William Doody: Who is this Kadulski?

Senator Perrault: This is what he said. Listen to this:

Without saying much, Trudeau did much more for Poland than Reagan did. Per capita, Canada gave three times more economic aid to Poland (mostly grain on medium- and long-term credit) than the U.S.

He quotes the U.S. source of that statement.

Canada also agreed to accept seven times more Polish refugees from Austria than the Reagan administration. The day Reagan decides to match the Canadian record, the Polish refugee problem in Austria will be solved.

That is what Mr. Kadulski said—this former Polish freedom fighter against Hitler and Stalin. This is a rather interesting observation by this former Polish combatant in light of the recent criticism of the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. I fail to see why the Leader of the Government should blame the opposition for asking questions. Often it gives the ministers sitting opposite a chance to clarify certain situations. They should be thankful. I am now going to ask a supplementary question. The leader claims that the opposition is splitting hairs in order to bring the government into disrepute. Perhaps he could answer this question: Is it true that in a statement after the proclamation of martial law in Poland, the Prime Minister of Canada said that it was necessary, that Solidarity had gone too far with its claims, and that he preferred martial law to a Soviet invasion of Poland?

Is it true the Prime Minister of Canada made such a statement? That is why representatives of Polish groups from Toronto and from across Canada came to see the Prime Minister to ask him to revise his statements on the situation in Poland.

Is it true the Prime Minister of Canada said this after the imposition of martial law in Poland?

[English]

Senator Perrault: I do not resent—

An Hon. Senator: Yes or no!

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: True or false.

Senator Perrault: —the fact that the honourable senator asks questions on the subject of Poland. Indeed, it enables the truth to be put on the record.

An Hon. Senator: Did he say it or not?

Senator Perrault: The Prime Minister's position has been that the solution to the Polish problem should be one for the Polish people themselves, without the intervention of outside forces or any other interest contrary to the interests of the Polish people. I think this view can be accepted by all of us, regardless of party. He stated recently that he does not approve of the imposition of military rule, but it may be under certain circumstances—

Senator Asselin: Did he say that?

Senator Perrault: Well, let us bring the full statement to the Senate.

Senator Asselin: Did he say that?

Senator Perrault: Let us have the facts and not attempts by the opposition to interpret what the Prime Minister is supposed to have said. But he has never supported military government.

Senator Asselin: He has not?

Senator Perrault: It can be said, at least, that no other country, including the Soviet Union, has intervened directly with military force. His Holiness the Pope stated that he hoped that the day would never arise when one Pole would take up arms against another Pole in a civil war. No one wants to see the blood-bath of a civil war in Poland. But I seem to recall that when the Prime Minister suggested that thankfully a civil war had not broken out in Poland, he was criticized in some quarters for having expressed that view.

However, I shall be pleased to bring to the Senate his most recent statement on the situation and place it on the permanent record of the Senate and thereby let the Prime Minister speak for himself.

I hope that the process will bring to an end a line of questioning about Canada's Polish policy which many consider to be unfair and destructive—an opposition campaign which has departed from the long-held view that there should be a bi-partisan policy approach to most major international matters.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. Honourable senators will recall that when we were in power, whenever the then Prime Minister, Mr. Clark, made a statement, people said: Clark goofs again. As for the statement made by Mr. Trudeau regarding the political situation in Poland, I feel it is the worst blunder of his entire political career, if he actually made such a statement.

We have had Clark's goofs and now perhaps we should also refer to Trudeau's blunders.

I am aware, of course, of the replies given by the Leader of the Government, but, so that we can judge the content of the statements made by Mr. Trudeau and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, could the Leader of the Government shortly table in the Senate all their speeches made on the political situation in Poland after the imposition of martial law? Could the leader table the statements made by the Prime Minister and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? We would then be able to judge whether I am right or whether the government leader's version of events is correct. Could the Leader of the Government comply with this request?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think it would be of real service to the Senate and to the nation to have placed on the record the Prime Minister's statements on this subject. All Canadians should be proud of the Canadian record and the record of their Prime Minister with respect to Poland and its plight.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Only 30 per cent of them.

Senator Perrault: The Canadian record of helpful intervention in crises of this kind is one in which all Canadians should take pride. Consider the post-war international crises which have plagued the world—for instance, Hungary and Czechoslovakia and the various problems in the Middle East. Canada has been in the forefront of nations attempting to help refugees to bind up their wounds and in providing food and financial aid as well as peacekeeping forces.

Senator Asselin: That is something else.

Senator Smith: What question are you answering now?

Senator Perrault: And again, in the case of Poland and its great people, no government in the world has been more forthcoming than has been the Canadian government led by a great and humanitarian Prime Minister. I would be most pleased to put his statements on record in the Senate.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE BOARD—DECISION RE SERVICE IN CARIBBEAN

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is very likely that he will have to take the question as notice and make a speech. It has to do with the decision by the chairman of the War Veterans Allowance Board which now qualifies veterans who served in dangerous waters in the Caribbean for War Veterans Allowance. This would help many Newfoundlanders and others who have served in Newfoundland. Since that decision has come down there has been a lack of information as to who will qualify now. Could we find out if the minister is considering amending the act, or has he produced an order in council to indicate to the many Newfoundlanders, particularly, who might qualify for War Veterans Allowance, which would help them for the rest of their lives?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. G. I. Smith: No speech!

Senator Marshall: Could the minister also find out if any consideration is being given to qualifying those war veterans who did not qualify before because of the fact that, through no fault of their own, they did not serve overseas but were kept back in Canada because they were required as instructors and for other reasons? Could he also find out what consideration is being given to those veterans?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to do so.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATION OF FISHERMEN ON EAST COAST FISHERIES TASK FORCE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In fact, I would like to go on a fishing expedition with him, fishing for information and action. The federal task force on the problems of the east coast fisheries is now comprised of a government representative and a business representative. A group of Cape Breton fishermen have formally petitioned the Prime Minister asking that the task force be broadened to include a representative from the fishermen. I see the leader nodding his head, so I am sure he is well aware of the subject matter.

● (1440)

This is not only the opinion of fishermen in Cape Breton but of many fishermen along the Atlantic coast, many of whom are in dire circumstances because of the problems confronting the fishing industry. Can the Leader of the Government advise us if the Prime Minister has replied to that request, and if it is the government's intention that fishermen be given representation together with government and industry?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. Certainly in the past the government has been open to participation by fishermen on either coast in deliberations of this kind.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his reply, limited as it was. I appreciate his words of encouragement and I look forward to the government's doing something to create a proper balance.

Since there will be on the task force the former Deputy Clerk of the Privy Council, Michael Kirby, who will represent the government, and Peter John Nicholson, the former Vice President of H. B. Nickerson & Sons Limited, which controls the seafood conglomerate, National Sea Products Limited, does the Leader of the Government not consider it only fair that those connected with the offshore and inshore fishing industry be represented on the task force in order to have a proper balance? This is no reflection on the two gentlemen I have mentioned.

The Leader of the Government has been waxing philosophical today, with his reference to the Bible. I do not know if he was referring to the Revised Standard Version, the Douay version or the King James version, but the Good Book also says: "The poor always ye have with you." Does that quotation apply to the fishermen?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we hope that when they let down the nets in any sea they will have a bountiful catch. That is the object of the policy of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts where there are serious problems. I know that the honourable senator is not underestimating the problem on either coast, and certainly his views will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The honourable senator has brought forward some recommendations that I know will be considered sympathetically.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Some nasty people say that politicians function in a bibulous atmosphere, but today it is in a biblical atmosphere. I was thinking of the Bible when he was replying to the question of my colleague, Senator Asselin, about the Prime Minister's statement. I recall how difficult it was for the poor Israelites to make bricks without straw. But he did labour strenuously. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the grave situation in El Salvador, which is fraught with danger and which unfortunately reveals every day a terrible assault upon life and liberty.

I noted some indication of a change in attitude on the part of the government, as revealed by the utterances of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the last 48 hours—and I am not so narrow-minded as to refrain from welcoming even a last minute conversion to a better approach. I would not want to be in the position of the present Prime Minister of this country who a couple of years ago sought to make outrageous political capital against the Clark government on the issue of the Iranian hostages. I believe we must transcend that sort of thing.

Can the Leader of the Government indicate whether he will soon bring to the Senate a statement on the situation in El Salvador; whether he would consider participating in the inquiry that is still open; or whether he might consider something similar to what he may well recall occurred in the other place, namely, a statement on Motions, so that this serious issue can be canvassed by this serious assembly?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday I gave a commitment that I would obtain information on the subject of El Salvador. This morning I met personally with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have been provided with a statement which may be of interest to Senator Macquarrie and others.

Canada does not agree with or accept the position of certain other governments on elections in El Salvador. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated yesterday in the other place that if we are speaking in the ideal, we would want to see much better conditions for elections in El Salvador. In fact, through our initiative, we tried to change the conditions that prevail in that country. We were turned down by the rebel forces very clearly in their response, and somewhat more ambiguously by the government, which said that the rebels would not accept it, so it would not work.

In any event, we did not succeed in changing the course of events in that country. We are seriously considering whether, in the circumstances, we should participate in any way in the election campaign in that country through observers or in any other fashion.

Senator Macquarrie may be aware that there is overwhelming opposition to the positions of Mexico and France on this matter by many countries in central and Latin America who view this as gross interference in their affairs. I have been advised that the positions of Mexico and France were rejected by the Organization of American States by a very heavy vote.

Canada prefers to be guided by the kind of information we receive from those countries and regions such as Venezuela, which was recently visited by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Turning to the question of arms exports to El Salvador, Canada has been firm in its stance of opposing the sending of arms from any source to either party involved in the dispute. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has repeated this position, both inside and outside Parliament. Yesterday he stated that Canada would again indicate this position to the United States.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the minister for his partial reply to some serious questions. I take it that the reference to "certain other governments" in the first sentence would refer to the United States. As I am sure he knows, as many thoughtful Canadians know, the basic problem in all of this is that with the ebullience of the present U.S. Secretary of State there is a widespread feeling that on many of these issues—to be biblical again—while the voice is the voice of MacGuigan, the hand is the hand of Haig, and there are dangers in that situation.

I take it that the Canadian government has conveyed to the United States—or if it has not already done so, will convey to the United States—our view with reference to the massive shipment of arms. I believe that is something that should be welcomed, for a country which has gone out of its way to appoint an ambassador of disarmament. I would hope that in a future statement the minister will give us not just comments about Mexico not knowing as much as Venezuela on this, which is a debatable point, but a fuller statement on what the Canadian government thinks of this. But I thank him for his interim reply.

THE ENVIRONMENT

EAST COAST—KURDISTAN OIL SPILL—RECOVERY OF CLEAN-UP COSTS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the long outstanding amount owed the Coast Guard by the owners of the oil tanker Kurdistan, which was responsible for an oil spill between Cape Breton and Newfoundland. The effects of that spill are still evident. What action is the government taking to recover the amount of $6.9 million which was paid for cleaning up that oil spill, or most of it? Can the Leader of the Government report on this matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF REV. IAN PAISLEY AND ALLEGED IRA MEMBERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information concerning the question asked yesterday about the visit to Canada of the Reverend Ian Paisley and others. The question was to the effect: Why did the government allow Ian Paisley to visit Canada?

Citizens of the United Kingdom do not require visas or special permission to visit Canada. Under existing regulations the only grounds upon which entry can be denied is if there is a reasonable expectation of involvement in criminal activity or other activity contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Our High Commission in London discussed the visit with Mr. Paisley before his departure from Britain, and Mr. Paisley gave satisfactory assurances that he had no intention of contravening any Canadian laws, or of acting in any manner unbefitting a visitor to this country.

● (1450)

While the government certainly does not share Mr. Paisley's views, we have never made a practice of trying to exclude visitors whose views are unpopular. It should be noted that a representative of the political wing of the IRA, whose views are at the opposite extreme from those of Mr. Paisley, also visited Canada at the same time.

Senator Stollery also asked yesterday about Messrs. Danny Morrison and Owen Carron, who were in Canada allegedly to counter the visit of Ian Paisley, and who attempted to enter the United States illegally and were turned back at the border.

Messrs. Morrison and Carron were allowed back into Canada on deportation from the U.S.A. because of a reciprocal agreement we have with that country. In any event, as U.K. citizens they do not need visas and have not contravened any Canadian regulations that might have permitted their automatic exclusion. Immigration officials have allowed them entry until February 8, but it is expected that they will be leaving earlier than that.

THE CONSTITUTION

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND NINE PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Neiman on November 19, 1981 concerning whether or not the application of the sunset provision in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is to be applied retroactively to previous legislation containing a non obstante clause.

Honourable senators, the short answer to that question is no. The Charter of Rights has nothing to do with existing provisions in legislation. Previous legislation could, of course, be challenged in the courts. If such legislation were found to contravene the provisions contained in the Charter of Rights, it would have to be passed again pursuant to the provisions contained in the charter.

The other point to be made is that some provisions of the Charter of Rights will not come into effect for three years after patriation. Therefore, no challenges to existing laws could be made before that time.

CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS—PROTECTION OF FETUS—TELEGRAM FROM CARDINAL CARTER TO PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Haidasz on November 26, 1981 concerning the letter of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to Cardinal Carter.

I am pleased to provide the Prime Minister's response to Cardinal Carter's telegram of November 23, 1981. This consists of a three-page text which, I suggest, should be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The letter follows.)

Dear Cardinal Carter:

This is in response to your letter of November 23, 1981 and your telex of November 25, 1981 regarding the possibility of amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. You suggest that an amendment is required to provide assurance that the Charter will not infringe on the rights of the unborn or at least to ensure that Parliament will continue to legislate on this matter.

On November 27, 1981, shortly after I received your letter and your telex, the Honourable David Crombie proposed that the following clause be added to the Charter: "Nothing in this Charter affects the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion". Mr. Crombie noted that the amendment would make it clear that Parliament's freedom to legislate on this matter is unimpaired. He also mentioned that for those who have doubts about the matter being in the Constitution, this will lay to rest their fears.

I responded to Mr. Crombie's motion. I noted that the Minister of Justice had explained on several occasions that the Charter is absolutely neutral on the issue of abortion. According to the interpretation of senior officials and agents of the Department of Justice and according to the Minister himself, under the new Constitution, Parliament will retain the right to amend the Criminal Code, which is the statute affecting the issue of abortion. These are the same opinions we examined when we met last February and which we discussed in our exchange of letters last Spring. At that time, you wrote to me that although you would have preferred specific protection for the unborn you were satisfied that Parliament would retain its authority to legislate on the matter.

Since the November 2, 1981 Conference of First Ministers, Parliament's authority has been strengthened by the addition of the notwithstanding clause to the Charter. Should a court decide at some future date that sections 7 or 15 do establish a right to abortion on demand, Parliament will continue to legislate on the matter by overriding the court's decision and the specific Charter right as interpreted by the court.

I also mentioned in my comments regarding Mr. Crombie's amendment that this new clause could be harmful. There is a danger that by specifically preserving Parliament's power in this area the courts could draw the implication that Parliament's power is somehow diminished in other areas not named in the clause, such as the question of capital punishment or euthanasia.

Our new Constitution has now been approved by Parliament. For many of us this was a bittersweet victory. While I know you support the entrenchment of rights and freedoms, I realize that you are disappointed that the right to life for the unborn was not included in the Charter. I too am disappointed in the final draft of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I have had to delete certain rights during this past year to gain provincial agreement and in order to achieve a consensus, I had to agree to a notwithstanding clause which would apply to rights as basic as the Fundamental Freedoms. I am sorry it has not turned out better for all of us, but I do not regret what I have done.

Believe me, dear Cardinal Carter,

Yours sincerely,

P. E. Trudeau

AUDITOR GENERAL

REPORT TO HOUSE OF COMMONS—ALLEGED IMPROPER
PAYMENT TO CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government):
Honourable senators, on December 9, 1981 a question was asked by Senator Smith concerning the Auditor General's report.

With respect to the $53 million overpayment to the CNR referred to in the Auditor General's report, discussions are presently under way between Transport Canada and CN officials to effect the recovery of the amount in question.

Senator Smith also referred to the recovery of income tax benefits to CN. Concerning the Auditor General's observation regarding income tax benefits, Canadian National's tax returns, which included the allowances and claims referred to, were made in accordance with the standards and criteria of generally accepted accounting principles established by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Department of National Revenue.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—IMPLICATIONS OF IMPOSITION OF MARTIAL LAW

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government):
Finally, honourable senators, I refer to the question put by Senator Roblin on December 16, 1981 concerning the Polish debt.

Poland's hard currency debt is approximately $27 billion U.S. A multilateral agreement in which Canada participated was concluded in April 1981 to reschedule part of Poland's debt to western governments falling due in 1981. As a result of recent developments in Poland, NATO foreign ministers and other western official creditors have decided that negotiations with Poland on any rescheduling of payments due in 1982 would not take place for the time being.

The Canadian government's debt exposure to Poland consists of loans under our bilateral long-term grain agreement which expires at the end of 1982 and loans by the Export Development Corporation in connection with projects involving Canadian companies. The over-all Canadian government exposure is approximately $1 billion. Thus far, Poland has been making payments under the terms of the 1981 rescheduling agreement, and it is expected that these will continue. Polish officials have indicated to creditors that they intend to meet their financial obligations but there may be some delays.

With respect to loans by Canadian chartered banks, it is not the policy of these banks to reveal the amount of their loans to individual countries. The house will be aware from statements by some bank officials that most have begun to set aside reserves on a contingency basis against possible losses from their loans to Poland. The size of Canadian banks' debt exposure to Poland does not pose a danger to the Canadian banking system.

Along with other NATO countries, the Canadian government will suspend for the time being debt rescheduling negotiations with Poland for 1982 and will continue to monitor the debt question very closely. We will also be consulting closely with other government creditors.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is one other point I mentioned that the minister may have dealt with by implication. Perhaps he can tell me. There is no present intention of extending any further lines of credit to Poland, is there? I take it that is what is implied in his statement.

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senators. It is my understanding that this is the case. Lines of credit are being held at their present levels.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-45, to amend the Pest Control Products Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us, Bill C-45, is very short, and I will read it all. It states:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Section 2 of the Pest Control Products Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province and any agent thereof."

Honourable senators, it will immediately be apparent that while the bill before us amends the Pest Control Products Act it does not in fact deal with the substance of that act but with a legal problem in its application. It has been decided by the Government of Canada and by the governments of the provinces, as I understand it, that it would be valuable to lay to rest any question as to that legal matter.

The point is this, honourable senators. The Pest Control Products Act provides the Government of Canada with the authority to regulate all pesticide products used in this country. Up to now the act has been administered with the active co-operation of the governments of all of the provinces.

What, therefore, is the problem? The problem arises out of the legal principle that no statute binds Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in right of any province, unless Her Majesty in right of the Crown, whether federal or provincial, is specifically mentioned in the statute or is bound by necessary implication.

[Senator Perrault.]

Honourable senators who may find this somewhat esoteric point worthy of further explanation I refer to a recent exhaustive study of this principle in the case of Her Majesty in right of the Province of Alberta v. Canadian Transport Commission, (1978) 1 Supreme Court Reports.

That case concerned the purchase of an airline by the Government of Alberta. The question at issue was whether the transfer of the shares to that provincial government was subject to review by the Canadian Transport Commission, and subject to regulations made by that commission under section 14 of the Aeronautics Act.

• (1500)

The Government of Alberta took the position that it was not bound to obtain the approval of the Canadian Transport Commission because the act did not specifically state that it was to bind Her Majesty in right of the Province of Alberta. In that case, the old common law principle of necessary implication was mentioned. Section 16 of the Interpretation Act was also discussed. That section provides that:

No enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner, except only as therein mentioned or referred to.

Therefore, honourable senators, because in practice the act is intended to apply and has always been treated as applying to agencies of the federal government and agencies of the provincial governments, all of which co-operate in the control of pesticide products, there should be no doubt about its legal application.

Clause 1 of the bill before us today lays to rest any such questions, and complies clearly with section 16 of the Interpretation Act by adding to section 2 of the Pest Control Products Act the following subsection:

(2) This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province and any agent thereof.

That is the whole point of this bill, honourable senators. All agencies of the federal government and of the provincial governments are to be bound by this act, which has as its purpose the control of potentially dangerous materials.

Honourable senators, I am authorized to assure you that the provincial governments and provincial agencies concerned with the Pest Control Products Act support this amendment. Under those circumstances, and since the point is essentially a technical, legal one—though somewhat esoteric, it is not that complicated—it is my respectful submission to you that, while we should debate this bill and entertain any questions to be asked or observations to be made, no purpose would be served by referring it to a committee. The relevant committee is the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, but there is not a great deal to study, beyond what has been brought forward to us today, namely, the common law principle of necessary implication and section 16 of the Interpretation Act. Those are the only objects of the amendment before us, and I would ask honourable senators to approve this bill on second reading.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government):
Honourable senators, we expect to deal with two bills tomorrow. One is Bill C-11, which has to do with the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies. Though it is a fairly lengthy bill, I do not think it is too complicated. Of course, those are famous last words, especially with so-called "simple" bills. We will then deal with Bill S-24, which has to do with implementing an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 9, 1982, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have further information on the subject of Poland that may be of interest to you. It has just come to hand and deals specifically with political and economic measures against Poland and the U.S.S.R.

Concerning measures against either Poland or the U.S.S.R., cabinet is in the process of examining a number of options open to it. In addition, our consultations with our allies are continuing. The NATO meeting on February 3 was part of that process.

We have told our allies that we are prepared, in concert with them, to implement measures to demonstrate to the Polish and Soviet authorities that it is in their interest to allow the process of national renewal in Poland to go forward.

Those measures could include limits on academic, scientific and cultural exchanges, delays in important consultations and negotiations, and restrictions on the movement of Polish diplomats in reciprocity for the continuing restrictions on the Canadian representatives in Warsaw.

In addition, we intend to speak to both the Polish and Soviet authorities about our concerns over the situation in Poland, particularly the continuing abuse of fundamental human rights.

THE BUDGET

INCOME TAX ACT—CLOSING OF LOOPHOLES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised by Senator Leblanc on November 17, 1981 on the subject of the budget and tax shelters.

Since the date on which this question was raised by the honourable senator, the Minister of Finance has proposed modifications to the rules relating to restricted interest expense to encourage investment in Canadian corporations by employees.

Where an employer makes a loan to employees and shareholders to purchase stocks, the imputed taxable benefit will be treated as an interest expense of the individual and will be deductible against any investment income that he includes in his taxable income in the year.

For interest on funds borrowed to acquire shares of all Canadian corporations, a special deduction is now provided for up to $10,000 of interest expense against non-investment income. This $10,000 exemption is designed to encourage equity investment by Canadians.

● (1410)

Special rules are proposed to encourage investment by employees in the shares of their employers where such employers are qualifying private corporations. Generally speaking, a qualifying corporation means a corporation that carries on an active business. It is proposed that interest paid or imputed as a taxable benefit in a year will not fall within the restricted interest rules where it is in respect of loans used by an individual to acquire shares in qualifying private corporations of which the individual is an employee, provided that the interest expense does not exceed his income, including any remuneration from the corporation for the year. The result is that most employees receiving a low-cost loan to purchase shares of his employer, where the employer is a qualifying private corporation, will not be affected by this budget proposal.

Regarding the transitional rule, in addition, a two-year transitional period will be provided to give taxpayers time to reorganize their financial affairs. For 1982, any restricted interest expense may be deductible from up to two-thirds of the amount of the taxpayer's income. For 1983, one-third of the taxpayer's income may be offset by restricted interest.

In summary, this means that most taxpayers will not be affected by this measure. Honourable senators, I am pleased to put this information before you.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY— FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on December 3, 1981, concerning the progress of negotiations on the Newfoundland section of the Trans-Canada Highway.

Hon. Jack Marshall: We heard all about that one.

Senator Perrault: On January 30, the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland signed an agreement under which sections of Newfoundland's Trans-Canada Highway will be upgraded over the next three years. Honourable senators, this is another glowing example of federal-provincial co-operation. We look forward to other agreements in the days to come.

The agreement, which totals $48 million, will also upgrade highways 432, 433 and 434 in the northern peninsula.

Senator Marshall: That is my old district.

Senator Perrault: Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin, Premier Brian Peckford, Ron Dawe, the provincial Minister of Transportation, and Revenue Minister William Rompkey signed the agreement for the second phase of the Canada-Newfoundland highway strengthening improvement program, to begin April 1, 1982.

In the second phase of this program the majority of the road construction will be carried out on the Trans-Canada Highway where projects worth $40 million will be implemented. The remaining $8 million will be spent to improve highways 432, 433 and 434. During this second phase total costs will be shared on a 75 per cent federal and 25 per cent provincial basis. Honourable senators, this is surely a generous sharing of the costs by the federal government.

During the initial phase of this program, highway upgrading projects with a total cost of $60 million were implemented on the Trans-Canada Highway exclusively. Those costs were shared on a 50-50 basis.

The projected cash flow for this program will be $15.2 million during the fiscal year 1982-83, $20.72 million in 1983-84, and $12.08 million in 1984-85.

Honourable senators—and I address my remarks particularly to the senators from Newfoundland—there is an appended document listing in rather specific terms the miles involved, the length of the paving and the estimated expenditures. This document may be of interest to honourable senators, should they wish to communicate this information to their constituents in Newfoundland. I would be pleased to have this document incorporated in the record. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: We want the people to be fully apprised of the facts.

(For text of document see appendix, p. 3561.)

[Later:]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, the matter I am about to raise is perhaps not very important except to the people who live in the area. With regard to the delayed answer dealing with Newfoundland, I believe I heard the Leader of the Government use the term "northern peninsula." Just for the record, there is no geographical area in Newfoundland known as the "northern peninsula"; the correct name is the Great Northern Peninsula.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is there, then, a "lesser northern peninsula"?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, the word is "distinguished."

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I yield to the proven, demonstrated and renowned historical expertise of the Honourable Senator Rowe. I meant to say "the Great Northern Peninsula."

Senator Roblin: That's better.

AUDITOR GENERAL

AVAILABILITY OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau on December 9, 1981 concerning an alleged policy of keeping documents secret from the Auditor General.

I have been in touch with the office of the Auditor General on this matter. They assure me that, although there was some foot-dragging on the part of some public servants—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Ha, surprise!

Senator Perrault: —the Auditor General was able to obtain the documentation he required. I have been advised that nowhere in chapter 1 of the Auditor General's report does the Auditor General say he was denied information.

On the part of the government, there is most certainly no policy of keeping documents secret from the Auditor General.

In fact, the contrary is true. This government is interested in improving efficiency and cost accountability in the public sector. That is why the Auditor General and the Privy Council office are presently working to resolve the issue.

• (1415)

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

STATUS OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What about the Access to Information Bill? How is it proceeding in the other place?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It is receiving the painstaking attention of the government ministers at the present time.

Senator Flynn: "Painstaking" is the right word.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I suppose they are getting ready to withdraw it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We are having trouble with the provinces.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we are attempting to achieve, as close as possible, perfection in the drafting of this measure.

Senator Flynn: You have a long way to go.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to Senator Macquarrie's question of February 2 on El Salvador. With respect to Canada's observation of the forthcoming elections in El Salvador, we are currently considering our position.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What else is new?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Macquarrie's questions are always very meaty.

Senator Perrault: Canada, like a number of other countries, received an invitation to send representatives to El Salvador to observe the forthcoming elections. However, it appears that it is not El Salvador's intention to have an organized international monitoring group with a specified mandate such as, for example, there was in Zimbabwe. We are, therefore, now considering what role Canada could usefully play in these different circumstances.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Jolly good.

ISRAEL—ANNEXATION OF GOLAN HEIGHTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one final statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The subject is the United Nations General Assembly emergency debate on the Golan Heights. Canada is strongly opposed to the Israeli unilateral move to annex the Golan Heights as being contrary to international law and detrimental to the peace process. While no draft text has yet been tabled in the General Assembly emergency debate now taking place in New York, one is expected soon.

[Senator Perrault.]

Canada is deeply disturbed by indications that a draft resolution might be presented which inter alia will contend that Israel is no longer fit for membership in the United Nations and thus lay the grounds for a possible move to prevent Israeli participation in the General Assembly.

Canada would be most concerned by a move to inhibit Israel's right, or, indeed, that of any other state, to participate in the United Nations and its agencies. Canada firmly supports the principle of universality of participation in the United Nations. Canada's permanent delegation to the United Nations has been instructed to make our concerns known to other members.

As the situation is still evolving, it would not be appropriate to speculate on what specific action Canada might consider should Israel's right to participate in the General Assembly be denied.

GRAIN

STATUS OF CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. James Balfour: Honourable senators, now that Senator Argue has entered the chamber, I would like to put a question to him. If I understood the minister correctly on Tuesday evening, he indicated a willingness on the part of the government to discuss changes to the Crow rates. Is my understanding correct, or does the minister's position remain as that which he expressed to the delegates of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool last November when he implored them to—and I quote—"Come to the defence of the Crow; don't let anyone take it away from you." What precisely is the minister's position?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, as a member of the government in good standing—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For the time being.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Which is in good standing—the government or the honourable senator?

Hon. Richard Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I am afraid the honourable senator made a mistake when he said "a member of the government in good standing." What he should have said is "a member in good standing of the government."

• (1420)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, as a member in good standing of a government in good standing, I can say that the policy of the government with respect to the Crow rate will be announced in due course, and when it is announced, I will make a statement on the particular proposals and on my position.

Senator Flynn: You will support it one way or the other.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister. If he is signalling a change in the position of the government, can he indicate whether this change of position is shared by the leader of the Liberal Party in Saskatchewan, Mr. Goodale?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I may be responsible for something, but I am not responsible for the position of the Liberal Party in Saskatchewan. I believe the honourable senator knows as much about his position as I do because he reads the same newspapers.

Hon. Lowell Murray: By way of supplementary, I have a two-part question for the minister. First of all, has there been any change in his position, as just mentioned by Senator Balfour, and, secondly, would he confirm that it is the intention of the government to make an announcement on the Crow rate policy in Winnipeg in a couple of days?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not know that a decision has been taken. I do not know that a decision has been taken to make an announcement on Monday in Winnipeg. I do not know whether that is a fact, or whether it is not.

My position on the Crow rate is the same as my position on many other subjects: I do all I can every day of the year to help the grain farmers in western Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: The minister, then, will have seen reports in the media to the effect—or will have heard of reports in the media to the effect—that an announcement on this matter will be made on Monday next in Winnipeg. I must say that I find it absolutely incredible that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board would not know whether that is the case, and has not attempted to confirm those reports with his colleagues.

Senator Flynn: I am not surprised.

Senator Argue: I know exactly what is going on, and precisely what is going on, almost hourly on the subject that the honourable gentleman has raised. I do not get any of my information from him.

Senator Murray: I am seeking information.

Senator Argue: As far as I know, unless it has been made in the past few minutes, a decision has not been made which would result in a press conference being held in Winnipeg. However, the week is not over and a decision could still be made that could result in such a press conference. That is all I am saying.

Senator Flynn: They don't consult you?

Senator Argue: They don't consult you.

Senator Flynn: If I were in your place, I would agree.

CANADA-GERMANY TAX AGREEMENT BILL, 1982

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the second reading of Bill S-24, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on income and certain other taxes.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to implement an agreement between Canada and Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on income and certain other taxes. In addition, the bill provides that the Governor in Council may, subject to a resolution of Parliament, give effect by Order in Council to any supplementary agreement.

● (1425)

At the time of tax reform, Canada had tax treaties in force with 16 countries including Germany (signed in 1956). The number is now 32 and it is expected that many other countries will be added to that list.

As in the case of similar tax treaty legislation approved by Parliament in the past, the bill contains clauses which deal with supplementary agreements. They are clauses 5 and 6 of the bill. These clauses are designed to ensure that the tax treaty can be kept up to date as a result of changes in the tax system of Canada and Germany. The mechanism provided for under this bill is similar to that agreed to previously.

The tax treaty under review follows the general pattern of the treaties concluded with other countries after tax reform. It also follows, to a large extent, the format and language of the Model Double Taxation Convention prepared by the Committee of Fiscal Affairs of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

The treaty generally provides that dividends can be taxed in the country of source at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. A general rate of 15 per cent is also provided for in the case of interest originating in one country and paid to a resident of the other country. Certain types of interest—for example, interest paid to the Export Development Corporation—are exempted in the source country. With respect to royalties, the treaty with Germany provides for a general rate of 10 per cent.

[Translation]

Other aspects dealt with in such treaties include:

Capital gains: The provisions of the agreement dealing with capital gains are in line with Canadian policy, ensuring that the source country retains its taxation rights in the case of sale of immovable property, business assets or shares in real estate companies.

Non-discrimination: The agreement prevents discrimination on grounds of nationality. It ensures that nationals of one country will receive the same treatment as those of the other country, all circumstances being equal. However, it would not prevent a country from granting tax incentives, such as small business deductions, on the sole basis of the taxpayer's residence.

Regarding teachers, the agreement does not provide for any special treatment for foreign teachers in Canada.

Pensions: Canada has retained the right to tax pensions paid to residents of the Federal Republic of Germany. However, pensions paid to veterans and welfare payments in the country of residence are to be tax-exempt.

Relief from double taxation: In Canada, relief from double taxation is provided by crediting income tax paid in the other country against Canadian income tax payable, subject to limitations provided under each country's legislation. Dividends received by a Canadian business from its foreign affiliate are tax-exempt in Canada if they are received out of the exempt surplus of the affiliate.

On the whole, the terms of the agreement provide equitable solutions to various problems concerning double taxation that exist between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, which country is anxious to see the implementation of this bilateral tax agreement. Consequently, I shall, if I may, recommend that this house give due consideration to the bill that is now before it.

[English]

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

● (1430)

ELECTRICITY AND GAS INSPECTION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill C-11, relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-11 is a measure to replace the Electricity Inspection Act and the Gas Inspection Act. The bill was first introduced in 1978 by the Honourable Warren Allmand, but it did not proceed beyond first reading. It was then introduced by the Honourable Allan Lawrence in 1979 and died on the order paper when Parliament was dissolved in December of that year. The bill was again introduced in 1980 by the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable André Ouellet, and was passed by the House of Commons on December 18, 1981. This bill has now been before Parliament for four years and the department is anxious to have it approved.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bosa: The proposed consolidated Electricity and Gas Inspection Act is required to modernize and improve our present regulatory framework aimed at ensuring accurate energy measurement in Canada. It will be noted that the two acts now in force were last amended in the 1920s, and circumstances and technology have changed significantly since that time.

The proposed legislation will increase the responsibility of concerned industry for accurate measurements by providing for the accreditation of qualified meter shops of electricity and gas utilities, as well as of manufacturers and related repair industries to verify and seal meters. Accreditation would be granted only to those meter shops which meet rigorous standards, the maintenance of which would be ensured by a continuing program of auditing and surveillance by government inspectors.

The program of accreditation will facilitate the continuing verification of ever-increasing numbers of meters. At the same time, it will ensure that the increasing workload does not reduce the time spent by government inspectors directed toward ensuring necessary measurement accuracy in less well-equipped meter shops, dealing with the more complicated devices and maintaining the industrial metering installation program.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will be maintaining the "dispute test" procedure under which buyers or sellers of electricity and gas can have a government inspector carry out an examination of meters whose accuracy is questioned. The dispute tests, and the regular surveillance of accredited meter shops, should ensure the continuation of the present high standards of accuracy of electricity and gas measurement enjoyed by Canadians.

The proposed consolidated act will also permit the extension of its provisions to cover measuring devices which may be required for new forms of energy or new means of distribution, an example of which could be the supply of steam to households from central powerhouses. The opportunity is also being taken to rationalize and strengthen the criminal offence provisions, and the consolidation of the two acts will remove the minor inconsistencies that now exist between the two separate acts.

In addition, it should be stated that the intent of the bill has widespread support and several public utilities have written to the minister urging its early passage.

In summary, the proposed law is consistent with the mandate of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I am confident that it will maintain a system whereby the consumption of electricity and gas is accurately metered in our country. I therefore urge that the bill receive the support of all honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Muir, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 9, 1982, at 8 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. As everybody knows, the press and newspaper editorials have been mentioning the fact that ten Quebec M.P.s, including two ministers, sent a letter to the Prime Minister, asking him to take some kind of action in order to bring some improvement in the disastrous job situation in Canada, now that over one million people are unemployed and 170,000 more will be added to the unemployment statistics for January.

In view of the Prime Minister's evasive reply in the House of Commons, can the Leader of the Government inform us whether the letter and the Prime Minister's reply should be seen as indicating an intention to shift away from the emphasis placed by the Prime Minister on fighting inflation during the federal-provincial conference? In other words, is the Prime Minister preparing for another about-face?

● (2005)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is seeking ways in which to mitigate the effects of inflation and the current recession which is not confined to Canada but which afflicts the world in general. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have welcomed suggestions from every quarter in order to obtain those proposals which might be beneficial to the Canadian people.

Indeed, I would remind honourable senators that the Minister of Finance, in Toronto on January 25, said:

This is not to minimize the importance of the very considerable resources which the government is devoting to job creation within the existing fiscal framework. Fiscal restraint does not and will not prohibit the government from taking targetted and specific measures to improve growth, productivity, and investment.

In a sense, the Minister of Finance was inviting members of Parliament and others to suggest ways in which the government's program could be made more effective, and some members of caucus have suggested targets and specific measures that should be taken.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That has already been done by the opposition.

Senator Perrault: The fact they have given so much thought to this problem and have expressed their—

Senator Asselin: It's a farce.

Senator Perrault: —concerns in this way will certainly be noted with interest and with care by the government and by the Minister of Finance. Indeed, the members who wrote that letter said:

As members for Central and Eastern Montreal, we realize that any real and durable but long term improvement of the employment situation can only be achieved by controlling inflation.

So the members of that group are aware of the fact that the control of inflation—which threatens not only the present economy but, indeed, our whole political system, in its ultimate and cancerous form—is the number one target.

May I suggest that this is a time for Canadians of all political persuasions to advance their positive proposals to assist the country during its time of travail?

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Could the government leader explain whether in quoting from the Minister of Finance's remarks on November 25 he was really asking for our suggestions? Why did those members from the other place feel compelled to make that letter public and indicate that in their view it was not simply a matter of long term remedy but immediate and short-term solutions that are needed. Were they talking through their hats?

● (2010)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only say to the Leader of the Opposition that inherent in the entire concept of Liberalism is the idea of reform, change and improvement of the social condition.

Senator Flynn: That's fine.

Senator Perrault: Members who are concerned about the problems which afflict those who are less fortunate in our society deserve to be commended. Indeed, as reported in House of Commons Debates of February 8, 1982, at page 14749, the Prime Minister said:

I referred to it [the letter] earlier when I indicated that the Minister of Finance, in his statement on January 25 in Toronto, had pointed out that a number of concrete programs would have to be considered, and the letter referred to by the hon. member provides an example of those programs. I can assure him that the Minister of Finance and the government will consider the letter's recommendations with an open mind.

Senator Flynn: But they had not had time to talk about it.

Senator Perrault: May I say that proposals from the other side of the house will be considered with an open mind. This is not the time to make political capital out of the country's economic distress.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Oh, sit down.

Senator Asselin: Again?

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: This is a time for members of the opposition to do more than just criticize; it is a time for Canadians, regardless of their political affiliation, to rally around and assist the nation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Well said.

Senator Flynn: Then, do I understand from what the Leader of the Government has said that the government would rather switch than fight?

Senator Perrault: It is not a matter of switching.

Senator Flynn: It would not be the first time.

Senator Perrault: It is a matter of listening.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: It is a matter of accepting those ideas that will assist this nation and the people of this nation.

Senator Flynn: Have you changed your mind again?

Senator Perrault: We would cheerfully accept proposals from the Leader of the Opposition, but he has not been noted for his constructive proposals in the past and we should not expect too much from that source.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary question. How is it that ever since the budget was introduced, the official opposition and the New Democratic Party have been asking the government for the same measures as those mentioned in the letter from the 10 honourable members? Why would the government refuse to listen to the opposition but would listen to the 10 honourable members from his party?

● (2015)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Senator Asselin, who has had vast experience in Parliament, suggests, incredibly, that he is unaware of the substantial job-creation program which has already been initiated by this government.

Senator Flynn: That is hot air. That is not the question. Reply to the question.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator would care to schedule a debate on employment creation in this nation, we, on this side, would welcome it. Then the facts could be laid before the Senate and the Canadian people.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you reply to the question? You cannot.

Senator Smith: Do you have an answer?

Senator Perrault: Throughout the entire process, the opposition has been most notable for its ability to criticize—but not constructively.

We hear unceasing demands that interest rates be reduced, with no expression of support for the other measures which would have to be taken in order to support that kind of policy. We hear blatant contradictions of the Conservative policy when they were in power and were faced with economic reality.

Senator Flynn: What about your policies? What did you do then?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I repeat the invitation: If members of the opposition have stumbled across a method or a formula which will ease the difficulties facing many Canadians today, we would welcome that information.

An Hon. Senator: Get rid of the government.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. Obviously, the letter the members sent asking for quick action to turn around the economy, especially in the Montreal area, has been good for a giggle! One wonders whether this is another advertising gimmick, showing that the government listens to its own members who ask for solutions to economic problems but ignores the opposition.

However, the real joke to Quebecers is the fact that the letter was signed by two ministers who are supposed to adhere to cabinet policy and who accepted the budget—

Senator Flynn: Blindly!

Senator Asselin: Blindly, as the Leader of the Opposition says. Now how can these members publicly dissociate themselves from the policies of the Liberal Party, the party in power, without handing in their resignation? What does the Liberal Party make of ministerial solidarity?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, those ten honourable members in the other place are not dissociating themselves from the budget. They say that the thrust of the budget is correct, but they are prepared to support—as are many other members of Parliament—additional measures to alleviate the plight of the unemployed in this country. Is there anything dishonourable about this offer by those members?

Senator Asselin: They have to resign.

Senator Perrault: Would that there were more vocal members from all parties with suggestions as to how to improve economic conditions in this country.

Honourable senators talk in terms of changes to the budget which have taken place. There has never been a budget presented to the Canadian people which has not been subjected to variation, change, modification and amendment.

Senator Flynn: Not in substance.

Senator Perrault: Senator Asselin, with his experience in Parliament, knows this to be a fact. Invariably, every budget which has been brought before Parliament since 1867 has seen a number of modifications before the next budget came along.

Senator Frith: Except the one in 1979!

Senator Perrault: The deputy leader reminds all of us that in 1979 the period of Conservative government was so mercifully brief that there was not time for radical budget surgery.

Senator Asselin: You will recall, honourable senators, that when Walter Gordon was Minister of Finance he changed his budget so often that he had to resign. However, the present Minister of Finance is making changes to the budget every day, yet he does not resign.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, are we to take it from Senator Asselin's remarks that in his view flexibility in government is a sin, a fault, or undesirable?

● (2020)

Flexibility is the essence of the Liberal Party. I do not want to become unduly partisan at any point in this chamber, but flexibility is a desirable attribute of a government truly concerned about the people of this country.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is the present government, with regard to cabinet solidarity, now prepared to let ministers express dissenting views publicly while remaining ministers of the Crown? Or has it recently dreamed up a new concept of what cabinet responsibility and solidarity stand for?

Senator Guay: It is to make suggestions!

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question is very much a rhetorical one. I have only had the opportunity to read the letter and have not had the opportunity to discuss their views with the authors, but I do know how supportive these members and ministers have been during the development of programs to help the unemployed. I have seen them in action in caucus—some in the cabinet and all in Parliament. They have not gone against the budget—

Senator Asselin: They did.

Senator Perrault:—indeed, they have emphasized that additional employment measures would find their support.

Senator Asselin: They did.

Senator Flynn: Would the honourable Leader of the Government tell me whether he has ever dared to make public any suggestions of that kind? If he thinks that that is the way a minister should behave, then why does he not behave that way himself?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not for me to stand in judgment on the performance of other parliamentarians.

Senator Flynn: If you find it correct to do that, why did you not do it?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have advanced many proposals in my time in the service of Parliament.

Senator Flynn: Not in public.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is very aware of that.

Senator Flynn: You never had the courage to do that.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: A last supplementary. Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether the Prime Minister knew beforehand that such a letter signed by ten members would be sent to him?

[English]

Senator Perrault: I can only suggest to the honourable senator that he contact the Prime Minister and ask him that question himself.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, in light of the dramatic announcement made yesterday with respect to the Crow rate, is the Leader of the Government in a position to indicate the whereabouts of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, or is that a matter of national security?

An Hon. Senator: He is eating crow.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Argue deeply regrets his inability to be in attendance in the chamber this evening.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Did he send you a letter?

Senator Perrault: He is speaking to a prominent group from the farming community this evening in Almonte.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Was that accidental?

Senator Perrault: That is because of a long-standing commitment. Earlier this afternoon some senators asked why Senator Argue was not in Winnipeg yesterday for the announcement by the Minister of Transport. This is most unfair to Senator Argue. He had a long-standing commitment yesterday to speak to the High Noon Optimist Club in Regina.

Senator Smith: Is that the best you can do?

Senator Perrault: He regarded it appropriate and important that he speak for the government in his own province of Saskatchewan on this very important initiative.

The Honourable Senator Argue has provided me, however, with a statement on the western transportation initiative announced yesterday, and I would be pleased to read it at this time.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be kind enough to repeat the name of the club to which Senator Argue was speaking? Unfortunately, I am becoming a little hard of hearing and did not catch it clearly, but it sounded to me like a club which the senator might have joined. I thought I heard the word "optimist". It is clear he must be the optimist if anybody believes that he would rather be here than there.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Liberals of western Canada are always optimists.

Senator Donahoe: Both of them!

Senator Flynn: They have no choice.

Senator Smith: How did you know?

Senator Perrault: He spoke to a meeting of the Optimists. It was important that he be in Saskatchewan for the transportation announcement. He did not avoid his responsibility. As the minister from Saskatchewan he was in his own province, where he should have been.

Honourable senators, this is what Senator Argue states:

As I said yesterday in Regina and this morning on Canada AM, this initiative to improve the railway system in Western Canada will be welcomed by westerners, indeed, by all Canadians. The whole economy will benefit from the opportunities that will be fulfilled as a result.

[Senator Balfour.]

Exports of the products of our fields, our forests, and our mines will increase. Jobs will be created across Canada.

Senator Flynn: Oh yeah!

Senator Perrault: The statement continues:

The Government has appointed Professor Clay Gilson of the University of Manitoba to act on its behalf in negotiations with the railways on this vital matter. He is charged with the responsibility of reviewing their investment plans, their revenue projections and their cost estimates. In this he will be seeking to protect the Treasury from unnecessary additional costs and so will be utilizing the work of Mr. Snavelly for reference only.

In his discussions with the railways, Professor Gilson will be seeking firm commitments on their investment programs; changes to freight rates on agricultural products that will promote diversification and processing; and guarantees concerning performance and service for various commodities.

The announcement made yesterday also contained the response of the government to the consensus that has developed in Western Canada amongst farmers and farm organizations at the rate they pay plus the subsidies paid by the government no longer covered the costs of moving their grain to port. The Statutory Rate has been of great benefit to the West. We have been able to settle the land and develop it—

Hon. Martial Asselin: This is Question Period.

Senator Perrault:

—largely because of the advantageous rate. But it has been eroded by inflation and farmers and their organizations have indicated that they are willing to consider paying more to ship their grain if they can be assured of service and performance.

The major farm groups have responded—

Senator Asselin: Dispense! Dispense!

Senator Perrault:

—favourably to the government's proposal that discussions take place and to the various commitments that we have made. They have also welcomed the appointment of Professor Gilson as our representative in discussions with them.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: In conclusion Senator Argue says this—

Senator Flynn: It's about time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is an important statement by an honourable senator who is as deeply committed to promoting the welfare of the farming community in this country as any other person in Canada—

Hon. Lowell Murray: He should resign.

Senator Perrault: —and surely his views deserve to be made known.

He further states:

The government has committed itself to a significant new contribution—one that will cover the so-called gap after we have negotiated exactly what that “gap” is. We are now asking the farmers and the railways to consider—

Senator Asselin: Why is he not here to say this himself?

Senator Perrault:

—the form and extent of their contributions. These must be fair and they must also take into account the capacity of each to absorb cost increases.

The government has committed itself to enshrining the results of this comprehensive and shared approach in statute—

An Hon. Senator: Speech!

Senator Perrault:

—so that I believe that in the end the grain producers of western Canada will be able to say that the new statute provides them with as good a deal as the statute that it replaces. I believe that this is the government's intention and it is certainly mine.

The government has committed itself to a continuation of the branchline rehabilitation program and to the immediate acquisition of an additional 1,280 hopper cars.

And if I may repeat, the government is committed to securing guarantees of service and performance and reductions in the freight rates on other agricultural commodities and their products.

The process of negotiation with the railways and with the farmers' organizations is now under way.

Senator Flynn: It's about time.

Senator Perrault: Senator Argue concludes:

I believe that a consensus will come out of it that will be as good a deal for the western grain farmer as he has now. I also believe that all Canadians will benefit tremendously from the expansion of the economy of the west.

The discussions that have now begun will involve westerners in the shaping of their own future.

Senator Flynn: Blah, blah, blah!

Senator Perrault: He goes on to say:

The proposal which was made yesterday, and which was so well received, was developed in the government by westerners, and I would very much like to congratulate my colleagues from the Senate who have played such an important role in discussions and the decisions in cabinet. I believe that they have served the people of their provinces and this chamber very well indeed.

Honourable Senator Argue will be here later in the week to speak on his own behalf.

Senator Donahoe: No wonder he is at the High Noon Optimist Club.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The Leader of the Government has made a statement, not a reply to a question, and I think the opposition has the right to reply.

• (2025)

The Hon. the Speaker: I must ask the honourable Senator if this relates to the same subject.

Senator Balfour: It is a supplementary question, with perhaps a brief preface. The Leader of the Government has been obliged to make a statement in the absence of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, who has chosen to absent himself from this chamber at a time when one of the most significant statements with respect to grain policy has been articulated by his minister, the Minister of Transport, affecting the three western Canadian provinces in particular and also, incidentally, agricultural communities in both Quebec and Ontario, which is perhaps not fully appreciated. Perhaps that exemplifies how this government can speak out of both sides of its mouth.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That is an unfair statement.

Senator Balfour: We shall see how unfair it is. Let me tell the house what the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board said in the past, both in the other place and here. In Commons Hansard, at page 3760, referring to the Crow rate, he is reported as saying—

An Hon. Senator: What date?

Senator Balfour: May 18, 1959. Referring to the Crowsnest rates, he is reported to have said:

I think they were part and parcel of a national policy, and the people who brought forward and completed that national policy at that time decided that those rates would be of advantage in maintaining an important grain industry on the prairies, which in turn would support the economy of three provinces in that area, and that this in turn would do much toward the prosperity of the Canadian nation as a whole.

Has he changed his mind? He continued:

It has been part of a national policy that is necessary to the national welfare of this country. I will go even farther and say it is essential if there is to be national unity in Canada. If the Crowsnest rates are interfered with, it would be the greatest blow to national unity administered by a government in this generation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): So it was in 1959.

Senator Olson: Let us have the question.

Senator Balfour: The Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has said that the Crow rate is essential to national unity, that if the Crowsnest rates are interfered with it would be the greatest blow to national unity administered by a government. In that context, does the Leader of the Government support his government's policy of tampering with the Crow rate?

Senator Asselin: Explain.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is depressing to see the opposition bring forth—

Senator Smith: Depressing to you.

Senator Perrault:—those yellowed and tattered newspaper clippings from the past. Do they support the dismal view that there should be no change in government thinking; that every attitude, every policy, must be frozen in time? Is there a suggestion that the government is to be penalized if certain of its members have fresh and new approaches to the problems confronting this nation? If tonight we are quoting from newspaper articles, let me quote from a contemporary and relevant one. I have before me an editorial which appears in today's Edmonton Journal, which is not a notable supporter of the Liberal government. Senator Hastings knows the type of "support" that we have received from the Edmonton Journal in recent years. I would ask honourable senators to listen to these words from a newspaper that supported the Conservative Party in the last campaign. In part, the editorial reads:

The federal government is facing up to the Crow's nest freight rate issue with courage and clarity. For this, Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin deserves full credit.

Because of the Crow rate, Western Canadian farmers pay only 20 per cent of the cost of moving grain destined for export on our railways. The remaining 80 per cent must be picked up by the Canadian taxpayers through subsidies to the railways, and by the railways themselves. If the Crow rate (established in 1897) remains frozen, farmers will pay only 12 per cent of the cost of moving grain by 1985, and seven per cent in 1990 . . .

● (2030)

No one is suggesting grain farmers suddenly pay 100 per cent of the cost of moving their product over the railways. But it is surely reasonable to suggest that at least the existing 20 per cent paid by farmers continue to be paid as transport costs increase.

Then the editorial continues:

The plucky Mr. Pepin—

Yes, and the plucky Senator Argue.

—will need more than background encouragement from Alberta if this reform is to pass through Parliament by Christmas. He will need help.

Obviously, he is not going to receive help from certain spokesmen of the Official Opposition, who would make this a political football rather than try to solve a developing transportation problem in western Canada.

Perhaps credit should be given to certain farm spokesmen in western Canada who have said, "Let us approach this pending negotiation with open minds. Perhaps a new statutory arrangement can be brought into effect which will be good for all and fair to all—yes, and even better and fairer for the grain farmer than the present system."

[Senator Balfour.]

Senator Argue's statement reflects that positive spirit. But the opposition suggestion that policies should be frozen in time, and that nothing can be done to forestall the looming rail transportation crisis in the west and nothing can be done to help the grain farmers or anyone else shipping any other commodity in western Canada, is contrary to the interests of the west and all of Canada.

Senator Smith: We never said you were frozen; we just said you were petrified.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, Senator Olson has indicated a willingness to participate in this exchange. I wonder if I might pose a question to him.

As the only cabinet member from the province of Alberta, is he square on with the policy articulated by Mr. Pepin in Winnipeg on Monday?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is more in sadness than anything else that I reply to this kind of question, because it is clear that members of the opposition do not understand what the proposal is. It is changing from one statutory rate to another statutory rate—

Senator Smith: Which we do not know yet.

Senator Flynn: That is not true.

Senator Olson:—which guarantees the financial benefit of the so-called statutory rates up to and including 1981.

Senator Flynn: False!

Senator Olson: It also includes a statutory framework from here on for asking the producers to consider some additional contribution to the increase in the cost of moving the grain from 1982 on into the future. This answers a great many of the comments that have been made by a lot of people in western Canada, including some grain producers, that we now have a massive job to increase the rail capacity out of western Canada for all commodities.

I think members opposite really ought to look at the proposal somewhat more objectively, perhaps even a little more intelligently. If they do, I am sure they will come to the same conclusion—

Senator Flynn: You have not understood it yourself.

Senator Olson:—namely, that it is an intelligent and courageous action that has been taken towards coming to grips with the problem.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I wonder if the intelligent Minister of State for Economic Development would indicate at least the parameters within which the new statutory rate will be established.

Senator Olson: That has been very clearly laid out in the proposal that has been made. If my honourable friend would like it, I will bring to the chamber tomorrow a very detailed list of the parameters, and the terms and conditions under which the negotiations will go forward. If you would like me to take another fifteen minutes now, I can give them to you from memory, because I have gone over them very carefully in the last few months.

Senator Balfour: Just to pin the thing down, it costs the grain producer at present 14 cents to move a bushel of grain. Is it going to cost him 20 cents, 50 cents, a dollar? What are the parameters? Just give us the ball-park figures.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators generally, and Senator Balfour more particularly, ought to know that you go into negotiations in good faith and you do not announce results until they have been achieved.

Senator Smith: I thought you told us a moment ago that you knew what they were.

Senator Balfour: The honourable the minister clearly indicated that the parameters had been established. What are the parameters?

Senator Olson: I will be very happy to bring that information. I can start giving it to you now, but I must say that I really have a twinge of conscience when I am asked to abuse Question Period, as you are inviting me to do now. I will bring you a sheet of paper tomorrow, and will be glad to expand on it at that time.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should have made my intervention about twenty minutes ago. I want to say that although I am sure Senator Asselin had no intention of misleading this house, he was wrong when he said that the Honourable Walter Gordon resigned as a result of the budget he introduced in May 1963. The Honourable Walter Gordon resigned after—

Senator Flynn: Order! Order!

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I am correcting—

Senator Flynn: This is entirely irregular. You are out of order.

Senator Bosa: Senator Asselin made a statement, and I want to correct it. The Honourable Walter Gordon resigned in 1965—

Senator Flynn: You are not involved. How is this your business?

The Hon. the Speaker: A point of order has been raised, and I think the honourable senator is right.

Senator Bosa: I have a question, honourable senators. The question is the following. Is Senator Asselin aware—

Senator Flynn: On a point of order. You cannot put a question to Senator Asselin.

Senator Bosa: With leave of the Senate, my question is to the Leader of the Government. Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate remember if the Honourable Walter Gordon resigned in 1965 following the election of November 8, for the reason that he had given the Prime Minister of the day the advice that he was going to win the election and form a majority government? Because that majority government did not materialize, the Honourable Walter Gordon resigned—which is the epitome of everything that characterizes the integrity of Walter Gordon.

Senator Perrault: I certainly agree with that question.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he does not remember that in fact the Honourable Walter Gordon resigned as Minister of Finance because of the corrections he was forced to make in his budget, long before 1965?

Senator Perrault: No, I do not remember.

Senator Smith: You should.

Senator Macquarrie: That example should be followed.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—ADVICE FROM MEMBERS OF FEDERAL LIBERAL CAUCUS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, arising out of the answer given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate to the question raised by Senator Flynn, I have a supplementary.

In the honourable leader's reply, he invited the opposition to make suggestions to deal with the economic problems of this country. Would he advise us if his followers, the silent majority, have made any suggestions either to himself or the Prime Minister, and if so, would he share those suggestions with this chamber?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): May I say that there is a constant flow of proposals from Liberal senators to the government arising from their earnest desire to improve the condition of this country.

Senator Phillips: Would the Honourable Senator Perrault agree to table those suggestions in this chamber, so that we may all have the benefit of them?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senators are not avid seekers of publicity.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you mean that the Quebec members are seeking publicity?

Hon. Martial Asselin: The answer is yes.

Senator Flynn: Serge Joyal also?

ENERGY

ALSANDS PROJECT—WITHDRAWAL OF PARTNERS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, though I am not quite sure that that is his correct title now because of the restructuring that has taken place in the cabinet.

Hon. R. James Balfour: It ought to be "Captain of the Titanic"!

Senator Doody: In any event, he is the gentleman responsible for the whole economic picture, I understand, and my question deals with the Alsands project in western Canada.

At least two of the Alsands partners have withdrawn. They represent, I understand, about an 18 per cent interest. There is another partner, Dome, that may have withdrawn, or seems to be in the process of withdrawing. I wonder what impact the withdrawal of these companies will have on the viability of the Alsands project.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe there have been statements made by the federal and provincial governments to the effect that there are other interested parties that would take up the percentage that the honourable senator referred to.

● (2040)

With respect to the viability, I doubt that that will change it significantly, because other investors can pick that up. Therefore, the terms and conditions offered by both levels of government will be the same.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, my understanding was that the Alsands project was one of the key factors in achieving the aim of energy self-sufficiency by 1990. Will the delay in the project affect that goal or is energy self-sufficiency still a tangible objective?

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, it is, and the Alsands project, which we hope will go ahead, is a significant part of the increased production that we need. Therefore, the view of the government is the same as that expressed in the past.

Senator Doody: Just dealing with the same sort of mega-project—I believe that is the fashionable term now—I believe the Cold Lake project is in the same ball park in terms of involvement in energy self-sufficiency and employment and regeneration of the entire economy of the country. Where does the Cold Lake project stand at the present time in terms of the same objectives?

Senator Olson: The government's views and objectives with respect to Cold Lake have not changed, but I would have to seek some information, I suppose, from the private sponsors—in this case, mostly Esso Resources—as to their position at this point in time. I have not heard in the last few days.

Senator Doody: My understanding is that there is at the present time some $40 million of government funding in that Cold Lake project. Is there a chance that the federal government will put more money in behind that? What is the status of that $40 million? What is the prospect that the government, or one of its crown agencies, will make an additional investment in the Alsands project?

Senator Olson: I do not believe that there have been any announcements recently about any additional participation by the federal government in the projects that have been identified.

[Senator Balfour.]

Senator Doody: I think the minister misunderstood me. I did not ask about announcements lately. I asked what the government's plans are in terms of major dollar involvement in these programs.

Senator Olson: Well, the answer I gave you is just as valid to that question as to the previous question, which was almost identical.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to pursue the line of questioning with respect to mega-projects, because in several of his statements the honourable minister has underlined the fact that he and the government are relying on the development of mega-projects to get Canada out of its current economic problems. They regard that as the major bright spot on the horizon. That is an opinion which is shared by the Economic Council of Canada.

Now we find serious doubts being raised about whether some of those mega-projects, particularly the two mentioned by my colleague, are likely to go ahead in the near future.

I would appreciate the minister's making a more complete statement than he has on this subject, particularly with respect to the matter of financing. I would like him to tell us how he visualizes that these projects, at a 20 per cent interest rate or whatever is required to get the money to invest in them, are still viable. In particular, I would like the minister to consider the heavy oil project of the Husky company on the Saskatchewan border.

On December 16, 1981 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appeared at a meeting of our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. At that time I went into the question of these mega-projects with him. He gave most reassuring answers. I particularly asked him about the Husky project, as to whether it was in effect correct that they had been able to fit themselves into the announced pricing regime. He replied that the regime that had been agreed to in the Saskatchewan agreement would be satisfactory. That is the impression he left with me, and I think a reading of the testimony would indicate that that is a fair assumption.

On January 12 of this year the president of Husky Oil, Mr. Blair, speaking in this city, went through a list of the mega-projects in which he had some interest to announce where they stood in his mind. When he came to the heavy oil project he stated—and I have his speech in my hand—that they had been milling around on this subject for the last three years and still did not know whether they would be proceeding in the 1980s.

That fits in with the general picture we have that the oil industry is in some quandary as to what it will do with these mega-projects. If the minister is placing his faith in them, as he is, I should like to know exactly how he intends to approach these difficult problems. I am particularly interested in having him reconcile, if he can, the statement of the minister about the Husky project and the statement of the president of Husky about the same project delivered about a month later. In particular, I should like him to deal with the interest question, which is, I think, the sticking point in all these matters.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, some of these questions were raised last week at the First Ministers' Conference. I do not like to complain about being misquoted, but I think in this case I was "underquoted," if that is the right word, because I have said over a number of weeks that, although proceeding with the major projects is a very important part of Canada's economic development, it is not all of it. It probably adds up to somewhere between 20 and 25 per cent of the capital investment that will be required in Canada between now and the year 2000, which is the year at which the major projects committee looked when they identified $440 billion worth of mega-projects.

In the course of the discussions, I recall drawing up a list, just from memory, of 18 mega-projects already under way, that have already been financed. There are some that have been announced for which financing has been arranged, but where, indeed, the actual employment on site and the cost for much of the material have not yet begun to show in large amounts. But they are on target. I can give you one example, namely, the Northeast B.C. and Northwest Alberta coal development, an investment of some $2½ billion which is now under way. That will increase rapidly.

I can also advise the honourable senator that the railway expansion in western Canada is another of the very large mega-projects. With the proposals that have now been put out, we believe that the basis has been laid for the financing of that very large amount of capital investment, being over $7 billion worth.

As I have said, there are 16 or 18 more that are already under way.

I think it should be borne in mind that there is not complete reliance on only some of the energy mega-projects, important as they are; there are many more besides those.

I can look into the matter of the Husky Oil project at Lloydminster, probably on both sides of the border, but it seems to me that, if my honourable friend has already had a direct report from the president of that company, Bob Blair, probably all I would obtain would be a repetition of the views the honourable senator has already quoted to me. If he would like me to verify those, however, I can do that.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the force of the minister's reply, but his own figures indicate that out of the $440 billion of mega-projects over half are energy-related.

Senator Frith: They are what?

Senator Roblin: They are energy-related. That is the phrase my honourable friend used, and that is correct—half of them are energy-related. I express a particular concern about the energy mega-projects, because energy is the nub of one of our great problems these days. I am not concerned about the fact that some of them are going ahead. That is fine. I am concerned at the fact, however, that in respect of this energy field the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made statements to a committee of this house that were entirely reassuring about the future of the projects we have been discussing here tonight when as we found out subsequently, the future does not appear to be quite as bright as all that. So, I think we are entitled to an explanation as to what has gone wrong in the meanwhile.

• (2050)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is no mystery as to what has gone wrong or what has caused apprehension with respect to making a firm commitment as to the date and time that these projects will go ahead. It is simply that there is no longer the same attitude in the international oil market as there was some time ago. Of course, the pricing arrangement and the terms and conditions relating to that arrangement were known, for example, prior to and up to September 1, and they were predicated on a steady incline in the international oil price. This situation has changed since and, rather than the price marching along at the anticipated rate, there has been a decline in some cases. As a result, there must be a reappraisal of the costs of the project in relation to the rate of return on investment. There is no mystery about that at all.

However, I am still confident and the government's view is that there will be enough of the very large energy projects, that, in fact, this project will come onstream and we will be self-sufficient by the end of the decade.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, now the minister is making a little more sense and is getting down to some of the real considerations that we must look at. No matter what happens to the international oil price, Canada's need for oil from international sources has not changed; it is still very significant indeed. We are concerned here not only with mega-projects as economic "trickle-downers", as the minister, I think, regards them, but also with respect to the security of our energy supplies.

If the circumstances of the world market are changing, as indeed they are, then I suggest to the minister that he is obligated to review the terms and conditions under which he has been proposing these projects to the other partners he is trying to interest in the development. I think we will probably find that the Government of Canada and, perhaps, the Government of Alberta as well—although I have no information on that point—are asking for a little more than the traffic will bear, and if the industry is faced with doubts and concerns about the future price of oil, and it seems to be, then the government cannot adhere to the position it took six months ago in the matter. I would like to see a little bit of that flexibility that the Leader of the Government in the Senate mentioned a little while ago. Certainly, we had a great example of flexibility last week when the provinces were here. How much flexibility did we see there? Not a millimetre; nobody moved.

Senator Olson: The provinces were completely inflexible, that is why.

Senator Roblin: Incidentally, the provinces came forward with suggestions. We are always being asked for suggestions on the government's economic policy.

Senator Frith: But all of them were inflationary.

Senator Roblin: That is not so, because many of the provinces concerned about the interest problem brought forward suggestions as to what could be done to improve the rate of saving, investment and productivity—enhance our foreign balances by the sale of natural gas and a whole combination of suggestions which should have at least been considered. So, when I hear talk from the other side about flexibility I must say they are about as flexible as an iceberg or as a glacier as it comes rolling down the mountainside. So far it has borne all before it, but I have a hunch that that situation will not last for very long.

I want my honourable friend to give me some assurance that he is willing to see that the terms and conditions under which these mega-projects are being looked at at the present time are sufficiently flexible so that he will not find himself stopped because international prices have thrown a spanner into the works. I want to see some of that flexibility, and I want an assurance from the minister that he is willing to undertake that kind of review of the terms and conditions offered to industry in these projects.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the government has demonstrated, over and over again, its capability of taking into account the real conditions in the real world, but my honourable friend is not really asking that. If he wishes, I will relate what he is asking now to some of the requests of these companies. They have not been talking about the world price of oil, but about some kind of undertaking that they will be guaranteed a return on investment of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent. I do not believe that it would be prudent for the government to guarantee such a return, regardless of what happens in the marketplace.

Senator Roblin: That is a perfectly reasonable request on the part of industry if the government is writing all the rules and creating a tax situation which impinges so heavily, as it does, on the returns of these companies, and if the government is laying down the terms and conditions under which these projects are to operate, then it need not be surprised if some of these companies ask for a guaranteed rate of return. Were the government willing to allow a freer system, then it would be quite right to say, "You're on your own, bud, and you take your chances."

Senator Flynn: You referred to the minister by his first name!

Senator Roblin: I am sorry; I did not mean to refer to the minister. I was using a slang expression for the generality of mankind, and I would never confuse my honourable friend with the generality of mankind.

Senator Frith: He is a man of the people.

Senator Roblin: He is a unique specimen, and there is nobody like him.

Senator Flynn: This "Bud" is for you.

Senator Roblin: I think it is probably a good idea that we leave names out of this. I would just like to say to my honourable friend that, if he imposes what in some sense is a public utility approach to the development of oil in this country, he must not be surprised if he receives a public utility response on the part of the people who are engaged in the industry.

Senator Olson: I am very surprised, honourable senators. I cannot imagine that my honourable friend is of the opinion that it would be good government policy if the government were to guarantee a 20 per cent return on investment regardless of how the marketplace performs. If that is what he is suggesting, then that is a very significant change in Conservative policy.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not propose that for one second. What I said was that this was the consequence of my honourable friend's policy. If he followed a sensible policy in respect to these development projects, he would not be doing what he is doing at all. He would say, "You go ahead. The rules that we are interested in are ones in connection with the environment, the employment of natives and people of that kind. But if you make money, then we are going to get our share, either through the taxation system or the same kind of tax regime as we apply in the Canada Lands"—which, God knows, will prevent anyone from skimming off the top. I suggest that the government let these projects go ahead freely, and then, if there are profits, collect the economic rent to which the people of Canada are entitled. In this way it will avoid the unpleasant dilemma of being forced to guarantee what it is guaranteeing now, the 20 per cent rate of return. That is what you have guaranteed the partners remaining in that project.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is perfectly entitled to state his opinion, but in this case, as in many cases, fact and opinion are not necessarily synonymous. Insofar as guarantees and the changing of the terms and conditions now are concerned, I would remind my honourable friend that essentially the same terms and conditions have been agreed to by the governments of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, all the provinces involved, and the federal government, and I must advise him that if the international oil price had marched along according to the projections, then I suppose the investors in this project would have been quite happy to take those returns. Now my honourable friend comes along and says that we must have rules to make sure that the economic rent is collected for and on behalf of the people of the provinces in their right. I think that all of the terms and conditions are in the agreement. Therefore, when my honourable friend adds up what he is admonishing us to do, I think he will have to agree that we have done exactly that.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, let me just comment and ask the minister a question on the real meaning of his logic. What he told us a few minutes ago is that one of the basic factors in this whole situation of change is that the world price of oil does not look as buoyant as it did before. As a consequence of this situation, people are backing out of the oil projects in Alberta and as a result they may not be undertaken, unless my friend undertakes to do them himself.

So, what I am saying is that unless my friend changes his rules somewhere, and if the world price continues its current trend, then the oil projects will not go ahead. Is that the policy of the government, to see that these projects do not proceed, when, by changing the rules, they could proceed and Canada could be getting its foreign exchange situation under control and a higher domestic content in oil consumption in this country? Logic demands not that he sit tight and do nothing so that nothing will happen in regard to the oil sands, but that he look at the matter and, realistically, make such changes as are necessary. Does he not think that is right?

Senator Olson: I agree that that is what needs to be done and that, in fact, is what we are doing.

I would mention one other point which the honourable senator did not bring up, and that is that there is an escalating formula involved in the pricing arrangement. That is known. One of the problems, of course, is inflation. The costs of construction based on the inflation rate may march ahead of oil prices themselves. If that is so, it would cause anyone concern. That is why the government has the very heavy responsibility—and it assumes that responsibility—to attempt to keep inflation within moderate and reasonable terms.

Senator Roblin: If the minister is drawing our attention to the correct escalating factor in the pricing system, what happens to that factor if oil prices do not justify it? He knows perfectly well that the escalation factor is a dead issue unless world oil prices render it practical.

I do not want to flog this horse any further because the minister and I are getting nowhere.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION, UNEMPLOYMENT, GOVERNMENT DEFICITS AND PRODUCTIVITY—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would now ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to deal with the question of inflation. When the budget came out in November of last year, the Minister of Finance made certain projections with respect to inflation, unemployment, government deficits, productivity and other salient factors in the economic statistics of the nation. However, just the other day he admitted that those were figures he would not care to support today; in fact, he said that they were optimistic.

My question is: Will the Minister of State for Economic Development ask the Minister of Finance to give us the up-to-date figures for unemployment, inflation, and those other figures of which I have spoken, and which are forecast in connection with the budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will convey that message to the Minister of Finance. However, to be somewhat more precise, what he said was that the rate of unemployment was slightly out, and I am not sure if it was out by very much either when you look at the seasonally adjusted rate which my honourable friend mentioned. That does not assist in the whole situation.

The simple answer to the question is: Yes, I will convey that request to the minister, and I am sure that, at some appropriate time, he will be prepared to give a re-assessment of those factors based on what, in fact, has happened since November 12 that is somewhat different from what was projected at that time.

STATEMENT BY TEN MEMBERS OF FEDERAL LIBERAL CAUCUS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I would return for a moment to the divergent views being expressed by members of the cabinet and of the Liberal Party on budgetary and economic policy. I note, following the statement released by the ten members of Parliament from Montreal, that David Weatherhead, Chairman of the Ontario Liberal caucus, was quoted as having said that Ontario Liberal members “feel ‘just as strongly’ as the 10 Montrealers, if not more so.” This dispatch continues:

Weatherhead predicted in a telephone interview that his fellow MPs will put “a lot of pressure” on the government in coming weeks to come through with measures to put people back to work.

Hon. David A. Croll: What is the date of the quotation?

Senator Murray: It is from a Canadian Press dispatch of this morning.

With regard to the legislative measures which will be brought in to give effect to the budget, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether it is the intention of the government to regard those as matters of confidence?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to read the transcript of the remarks attributed to Mr. Weatherhead and, for that reason, it would be unfair of me to comment at this time. However, I will make it a priority to secure a copy of his remarks, review them, and perhaps bring a reply to the Senate later this week.

As far as the statements attributed to Mr. Weatherhead and the statements attributed to the 10 members of Parliament from the Montreal area are concerned—accurate or not—I see nothing in them which, in my view, suggests a want of confidence in the government. As I suggested earlier, they are concerned members of Parliament interested in promoting the best interests of the people of this country, and they have made public statements that they would like to see even greater emphasis on certain job-creation initiatives by the government. Certainly, they should not be criticized for that.

Senator Murray: Mr. Weatherhead did not address himself to the question of whether the legislative measures would be regarded by the government as matters of confidence. It would be obvious to the minister, however, that, if the government did not regard those matters as questions of confidence, Mr. Weatherhead, his colleagues from Ontario and the ten, or perhaps more, Liberal members of Parliament from Montreal will have an opportunity to vote their convictions when the various budgetary measures are brought forward in the form of legislation. I want to know whether the government intends to regard those matters as matters of confidence.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, before we proceed to delayed answers, I have one of my brief and succinct questions for the Leader of the Government. Can he tell me now, after the painful efflux of time since the subject was first mentioned in this session, if the Government of Canada has decided to send observers to the election in El Salvador?

Can he also tell me if the Government of Canada approves of the attitude and actions of the Government of the United States which, as we know, include the proposed shipment of extensive and expensive arms to the Government of El Salvador which has been regarded, in many parts of the world, as repressive and undemocratic?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Canada does not supply arms to any of the competing forces in El Salvador, and we think that all other countries should follow the same policy. Canada's position in this regard has been made clear publicly and privately to many governments, including those of the United States and Cuba. This policy remains unchanged and was recently reiterated to the United States government.

As far as the other inquiry regarding the observation of the election in El Salvador is concerned, I have no further information to add to the statement that was provided to the chamber last week.

The inquiry has been directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

POLAND—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some material which relates to a question asked by Senator Asselin on February 3, 1982, concerning the Prime Minister's statement about the situation in Poland.

I am pleased to provide honourable senators with statements made by the Prime Minister concerning the situation in Poland which I would ask to be incorporated as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate. These documents include an excerpt from the Prime Minister's news conference of December 18, 1981; a statement made on December 30, 1981; a CBC Radio interview given on January 23, 1982; and, finally, a release from the Office of the Prime Minister dated January 29, 1982.

I know honourable senators will find all this material to be of great interest. It has been provided in its complete form by the Office of the Prime Minister.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Martial Asselin: The Leader of the Government will recall that I also asked that all statements in this regard made by Mr. MacGuigan, Secretary of State for External Affairs, be tabled in the Senate, along with those of his officers.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I was not aware of that request to have all of Mr. MacGuigan's statements tabled, but an inquiry will be directed to his office to see whether that request can be met.

(For text of documents see Appendix "A", pp. 3577-3581.)

TRANSPORT

WESTERN RAIL CAPACITY—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in connection with the historic announcement made yesterday with respect to rail transportation rates in western Canada, I believe honourable senators will be interested in a transcript of a news conference held in Winnipeg yesterday by the Minister of Transport in which Dr. Gilson describes how he hopes to proceed with the investigation. Perhaps that could also be incorporated as an appendix to today's proceedings.

Honourable senators may be interested to note Dr. Gilson's views and, perhaps, some questions might arise from that document.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADA-GERMANY TAX AGREEMENT BILL, 1982

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 4, the debate on the motion of Senator Leblanc for the second reading of Bill S-24, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on income and certain other taxes.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, first of all, I should like to thank the sponsor of the bill for his introduction. However, he did cause me some concern when he referred to tax reforms. I think he will find a good many Canadians asking when there have been tax reforms.

In December 1980, the Honourable Senator Hicks introduced a similar bill, Bill S-17, providing for like agreements between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia. At that time I responded for the opposition and felt very much like a neophyte. I do not believe I have become a tax expert in the meantime.

As the sponsor of the bill stated, Bill S-24 provides for avoidance of double taxation between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, and is one of a series of agreements with other countries. I believe we have 35 or 36 similar agreements now. The drafting of this bill is similar to the drafting of the agreements to which I just referred. The tax people did not miss an opportunity. The taxation provisions include director's fees, alienation of property, interest earned on dividends and pensions.

In article 2, clause 3 lists the existing taxes to which the agreement shall apply, and they are the Canadian income tax and four taxes imposed by the Federal Republic of Germany. The fact that it requires four German taxes to equal our income tax is a most interesting point. On the other hand, perhaps the Minister of Finance is being generous to us and has not yet imposed the additional taxes. The Minister of Finance has had his difficulties concerning taxation matters recently, and perhaps he may find some form of defence in Bill S-24 in that he has overlooked the German taxes referred to.

Article 4 describes the status of persons who shall be deemed to be residents of both countries. It is interesting to note the procedure in that section. The tax people follow the individuals through, first, the permanent abode, the habitual abode and then the nationality, and when none of these requirements can be determined they settle the matter by mutual agreement.

What is unclear in that article—it is certainly not described in the bill—is the reference to “vital interest”. The sponsor of the bill might describe that when he closes the debate, or it could be dealt with in committee.

Article 18 provides that pensions and annuities will only be taxed in the contracting state in which they are paid. This is similar to the provision in other such agreements, but I note that war pensions and war veterans allowances are not subject to taxation in Germany.

Article 10 caught my attention in that it refers to a “sleeping partner.” I thought that perhaps a sleeping partner would be a member of this cabinet, but I asked the legal people for some assistance and they have advised me that it compares with the silent or dormant partner in Canada. However, there is some discrepancy in the German understanding and our understanding. The Germans have a so-called genuine sleeping partner, who is really a creditor who loans money to companies and gets interest according to the profits of the company to which he has loaned the money.

I suggest, honourable senators, that there may be some confusion there in the future. When the committee deals with this matter, I hope that it will give some consideration to this and attempt to get further clarification of it.

I note that the agreement between Canada and Australia was signed by the Honourable Edward Lumley in his capacity of Minister of State (International Trade), while the agreement in Bill S-24 is signed by the Minister of Finance. I do not know that taxation between Canada and Australia should be considered a matter of international trade, and taxation between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany to be a matter of finance. Perhaps it is merely the convenience of having a cabinet minister dormant in the city at the time the signature was applied.

Finally, honourable senators, I follow the pattern that has been followed with similar bills and ask why clause 6(8) is put into these bills. Clause 6(8) gives the government the responsibility to introduce an amendment in Parliament within 15 sitting days after an order under clause 5 is made. However, if Parliament chooses, in its wisdom, not to pass that amendment, then the amendment becomes law anyway. I ask honourable senators why we have to put in that clause if it does not apply, and I close my remarks this evening by repeating the same question I asked with regard to Bill S-17.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: If no one else wishes to discuss Bill S-24, I think that the points raised by Senator Phillips can be easily dealt with in committee. Since the Federal Republic of Germany is very anxious to have this bill passed as soon as possible, and since the bill also has to go to the House of Commons, I ask for leave to have this bill referred immediately to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and subsequent report to the Senate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before second reading of the bill, I have a question for its sponsor. He just said the bill will be sent to the House of Commons. Has it been tabled in the Senate? Was it not tabled in the House of Commons before?

Senator Leblanc: The bill was tabled in the Senate which is why it bears the number S-24. It has to go to the House of Commons, to the other place, and then receive royal assent.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Leblanc moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTRICITY AND GAS INSPECTION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 4, the debate on the motion of Senator Bosa for the second reading of Bill C-11, relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I rise to make an electrifying verbal contribution to this oratorical gas on Bill C-11,—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Has your meter been inspected?

Senator Muir: —the measure relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters.

I trust I will be forgiven by honourable senators for putting off my reply until this week. I did not feel that an additional few days would make much difference in the case of a bill that has been kicking around Parliament since 1978.

I should like to refer to the comments of the sponsor of the bill, the Honourable Senator Bosa, who said:

The bill was first introduced in 1978 by the Honourable Warren Allmand, but it did not proceed beyond first reading. It was then introduced by the Honourable Allan Lawrence in 1979 and died on the order paper when Parliament was dissolved in December of that year. The bill was again introduced in 1980 by the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable André Ouellet, and was passed by the House of Commons on December 18, 1981. This bill has now been before Parliament for four years and the department is anxious to have it approved.

I also wanted to make sure I had grasped completely the essence of this important piece of legislation. Some of you may think I was being sarcastic in referring to a bill that had had a four-year gestation period as being unimportant, but I was most definitely not.

In addition to its housecleaning aspects, as I see it, this bill makes a rather significant statement. The government, in this humble piece of legislation, seems to have recognized the value of "privatization." An essential part of any intelligent program to properly govern this country must be "privatization." The aim is to return to the private sector economic and administrative functions that should never have been taken over by the government in the first place.

This is what we see being done in this piece of legislation, and I, for one, consider it refreshing. The transfer of a portion of its meter inspection function to the private sector will allow the federal government to cut expenses and enable the people in this branch of government to use their knowledge and training on more important features of the same general service. All this is being achieved, it is well worth noting, without diminishing in any way the protection offered the consumer against unscrupulous merchants who might try to short-change customers.

The bill authorizes qualified utilities and meter manufacturers to verify and seal electricity and gas meters, subject to frequent audits and inspections by the staff of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Only those utilities that are qualified and only competent and accredited meter shops will be permitted to inspect gas and electricity meters. The qualified service people will have to register annually and be subject to spot audits by federal government inspectors, in order to ensure that strict quality control procedures are being followed. If meter verifiers do not meet the standards set by the department, then their accreditation will be revoked. Further, should a consumer dispute a meter's accuracy, a government inspector can be called in to arbitrate the matter. I believe this to be quite fair. Therefore, safeguards are provided and the penalties for non-compliance are severe, as they should be.

It is also worth noting another innovation in this bill, the "sunset clause." It provides for a report to Parliament by the minister responsible after five years. This provision ensures that the administration of the act will come under review at that time, and that is a wholesome exercise.

The bill recognizes that what is being done by government can sometimes be more efficiently done by the private sector, and it provides for a review of the whole matter in five years. For these two reasons I believe the bill deserves our support.

I sincerely hope that what we see here is indicative of new-found wisdom on the part of the federal government, and that this attitude of limited interference will spread to a number of other areas and be wisely reflected in upcoming legislation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is a point in this bill, which is also found in Bill C-45, that I want to check. I should like to look at it before we resume tomorrow in order to be sure that I am not speaking for nothing.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Would the honourable senator care to put the question to me now?

Senator Flynn: No. It is not only a question but a comment that I wish to make. I would not be satisfied with the reply that you could give me, in any event.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 3574)

TRANSCRIPT OF THE PRIME MINISTER'S NEWS CONFERENCE, NATIONAL PRESS THEATRE,
OTTAWA, DECEMBER 18, 1981

JACK BEST (Canada World News): Mr. Trudeau, yesterday in the House of Commons, the government blocked a fairly moderate move on the part of the Opposition to call on the Polish Government to lift martial law, and also rejecting the idea of outside intervention. I was wondering whether this accords with your personal feelings, or whether, on the other hand, you would not agree that this would have been a fairly minimal gesture of solidarity on behalf of the Polish people in the present situation.

A. Sorry, I didn't read the Motion. I understand Mr. MacGuigan gave several answers in the House. There was a part of the Motion which might have been objectionable. I don't know what. I haven't read it. But it would be usual—and it is often done—that when you are going to move a motion like that where you expect a bipartisan approach, that the other party is made aware of what the content of the Motion is.

So, there may be something in it that Mr. MacGuigan found objectionable. You would have to ask him. Sorry.

Q. A brief supplementary on the Polish situation. We have been told that the Government intends to honour its present credit arrangements with Poland having to do with foodstuffs, and other things.

Is this policy subject to review, and if so, under what circumstances might it be changed?

A. Well, obviously policies can always be reviewed, but I foresee no circumstances now where there would be a change of that policy. We have long-term credit extended to Poland—I think some $500 million this year—so that it can buy foodstuffs, and we believe that this is a very good way to help stabilize the situation in Poland and help the Polish people settle the problem themselves.

If we were to have some evidence that the grain wasn't being used for the Polish people, or something like that, obviously we would have to revise it. But you know our policy from the outset has been to hope that the Polish people would exercise the proper amount of restraint and good judgment—which they have thus far—to not justify any foreign intervention. The situation is getting bad now with martial law, as you put it; but that is no reason that I can see, that the government can see to, in effect, boycott Poland and cut off food supplies to them. I think that would be a mistake.

There is not much I can say beyond that—yes, maybe one thing as far as the government is concerned, and it is that we have repeatedly told the Polish embassy here that we would like to see communications restored. I think that that is a very unfortunate side of the events in Poland, because it makes you wonder what the military regime is trying to hide. There are circumstances where order has to be imposed, but it would be, I think, a good thing if the outside world were able to have communications with what is going on there so that any abuses of civil liberties or unnecessary use of violence would be made known and reported to the outside world.

So, in that sense I think the best role we could play now would be to have communications re-opened, and it would be in the interests of the Polish regime themselves to have observers, as Canada is, impartially in there reporting on what is happening.

I wouldn't purport to make a judgment on whatever decision the Polish authorities make, but it would be a function we could play to report any abuses going on there and any unjustified violence, and so on. And of course beyond that we are concerned for the some few hundred Canadians who are in Poland. But the indirect evidence that the Minister has had is to the effect that they are not in any danger.

So, the big thing that remains is for us to express whatever support we can for the Polish people in Canada, who are very worried with the events there.

MARC PEPIN (Nouvelles Télé-radio): Q. Monsieur le Premier ministre, ma question est exactement dans le même sens; je m'en excuse un peu à l'avance.

J'aimerais savoir si le Canada prendra des sanctions économiques ou politiques concernant la Pologne et quelle est votre limite de tolérance à l'endroit de la répression qui est en cours, là-bas, et deuxièmement que se passe-t-il dans les communications entre votre ambassade à Varsovie et le secrétariat aux Affaires extérieures? Ça fait deux jours que monsieur MacGuigan répète—sans rire, d'ailleurs—qu'il n'y a pas de violence là-bas.

R. Eh bien, effectivement, comme je viens de l'expliquer, l'essentiel du point de vue gouvernemental, maintenant, sera que nous puissions rétablir les communications avec notre ambassade en Pologne, précisément pour pouvoir—comme le Canada est reconnu comme un pays impartial, certainement pas violemment anti-soviétique et pas violemment anti-américain, quelque part dans le camp de l'OTAN mais avec de bonnes relations avec certains pays de l'est—il serait important que nous puissions, en observateur, nous faire rapport à nous, au gouvernement, sur l'état des choses là. Et, si le régime militaire là-bas se sentait surveillé dans sa bonne conduite, ça ne serait peut-être pas une mauvaise chose; ça serait une garantie contre des excès.

Quand monsieur MacGuigan répète qu'à notre connaissance, il n'y a pas de violence, il parlait ainsi jusqu'à ce qu'on apprenne qu'il y a eu sept morts. Mais, d'une façon générale, ce sont des informations qu'il obtient d'une façon indirecte, c'est-à-dire par d'autres pays alliés qui ont des sources d'information en Pologne, ce que nous n'avons pas.

Est-ce que j'ai perdu une partie de la question?

Q. Oui, la première partie de la question, monsieur Trudeau.

Je vous demandais quelle était votre limite de tolérance au sujet de la répression pour décider si vous allez prendre ou non des sanctions économiques ou politiques contre la Pologne.

R. Nous avons eu comme politique, depuis le début—je crois qu'elle reste la bonne—de nous en remettre au peuple polonais et aux autorités polonaises pour résoudre leurs problèmes de sorte qu'il n'y ait de justification pour aucun camp, ni de l'Est ni de l'Ouest, d'intervenir dans les affaires polonaises. C'est une politique que nous avons suivie et que nous continuons de suivre. Je pense que c'est la bonne.

Il y a d'autres pays qui se sont donnés des régimes militaires avec lesquels nous n'avons pas brisé les relations diplomatiques. Il s'agit de savoir si le régime polonais, actuellement, va tomber dans des abus et dans l'excès, dans la violence, la torture et tout le reste. Et, à ce moment-là, nous devons peut-être porter un jugement. Mais, pour le moment, nous regrettons que les autorités polonaises aient dû, pour maintenir l'ordre, proclamer un régime militaire, un régime martial. Mais, encore une fois, je crois que c'est au peuple polonais d'essayer de trouver une solution à ce problème et la meilleure aide que nous puissions donner, c'est une aide économique, surtout dans le domaine alimentaire, pour nous assurer que la faim et la misère ne poussent pas les gens à faire une révolte irrationnelle qui serait probablement désastreuse et qui pourrait mener à une guerre civile.

Il est certain—j'ai dit cela il y a longtemps—que s'il y a une guerre civile en Pologne, il y a bien des chances que les Soviétiques interviendraient, pour ne pas permettre une guerre civile sur ses frontières.

Alors, tout ce qui empêche la guerre civile, pour moi, c'est un pas positif. Si un régime militaire a comme effet d'empêcher une guerre civile, je ne peux pas, à l'avance, dire que c'est mauvais. Ça dépendrait des conditions dans lesquelles l'ordre est maintenu.

JOHN ROGERS (Reuters): Prime Minister, back to Poland. As Chairman of the Ottawa Summit last summer, do you feel the Polish situation is one in which the Summit leaders could usefully coordinate their views now, and has there been any such coordination?

A. Yes, that is a very good question—or suggestion. There has been such coordination within the framework of NATO, and a great amount of consultation. I haven't at this stage picked up the phone, as we said we might do, and spoken to Schmidt or Thatcher or Mitterand, or anything like that, Spadolini, on the situation.

Quite frankly, I think they, like us, are trying to assess the reality of the situation in Poland before doing anything which might be counter-productive—and that goes back to the early comments I was making. A civil war in Poland would be about the worst thing that could happen. We have no evidence—there may be evidence, but we have none—of Soviet troops shaking their sabres on the border, or anything like that. I think that they, quite frankly, don't want a civil war in Poland. I don't know what would happen if there would be one. I would think that there would be great danger that the Soviet government would send troops in to maintain peace.

But I am convinced that that is not something that they want, any more than we would want. As I said last spring, the Polish people have shown a remarkable—well, I am repeating myself. I haven't had direct consultations with my fellow Summit leaders. It may come to that when we have a more precise view of the situation.

LUBOR ZINK (Toronto Sun): There may not be civil war yet in Poland, but according to Warsaw official broadcasts, blood is being spilled in Poland right now—

A. Seven people—what do the broadcasts say?

Q. About 400 wounded; about seven dead.

Since Soviet responsibility for the repression is obvious to any one but the naive, as President Reagan put it yesterday, can you still find justification, or even excuse, for maintaining your Friendship Protocol of 1971 with Moscow?

A. What do you accuse the Soviets of doing in Poland right now as a reason for us to break up the protocol?

Q. What is happening in Poland is the responsibility of the Soviet Union. There wouldn't be a Communist government in Poland if it hadn't been imposed on Poland by the Soviet Union. There wouldn't be the repression and the spilling of blood that is going on right now without the Soviet policy towards Poland since World War II.

I asked you after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan what justification there was for maintaining the Friendship Protocol with Moscow that you signed in 1971, when even the Communist government of China saw it necessary to abrogate its friendship treaty with Moscow, and you said, "We are not as anti-Soviet as the Chinese".

Well, this has nothing to do with the Chinese. I am asking you what justification do you have now for still maintaining your Friendship Protocol in the situation as it exists now in Poland.

A. Well, if you are saying that there would be no Communist government in Warsaw—

Q. That's right.

A. —if there had been no Soviet communism, you are probably right; but you are saying, also, that there should have been no Tehran and no Cairo meetings, no agreement between Churchill and Roosevelt and Stalin that a certain zone of influence be recognized to the West and another to the East in Europe. And you could go back to that and say that Churchill and Stalin were wrong to permit Poland to be put in the Eastern camp—and that is a view that I know you entertain. But that is trying to re-write history, and that is not within my potential.

The policy we have tried to follow is one of détente, and all the countries of Europe, and the United States, signed an agreement in Helsinki saying that it was better to try and keep peace in Europe than to try and resettle old scores and re-write the agreements that Churchill, Stalin and Roosevelt had made after the war—and De Gaulle, in some circumstances.

You can re-write history, but it is not a very profitable exercise.

Q. I am not re-writing history, Prime Minister. I am finding it peculiar that a democratic country keeps maintaining a Friendship Protocol with a totalitarian regime which is exercising repression, not only in Poland, but in Afghanistan and in a dozen other countries.

A. Yes, I know that is your view, and you should get the United States and France and Britain and Germany, and the rest of the world, to break off relations with the Soviet Union. But you know a lot of us would like to prevent a third world war. Some people, I think, would like to re-establish the balance in Europe the way they see it, even if it means risking a third world war. Well, they are prepared to take that chance. That is not our view. I think the division that was made after the second world war in Europe may or may not have been a good thing, but it is certain it has been respected in the case of Budapest; it has been respected in the case of Poland now.

MICHEL GALAN (Agence France Presse): Q. Monsieur le Premier ministre, j'avais déjà posé une question similaire à monsieur Clark au moment de l'affaire Afghan.

Quelle différence y a-t-il entre les événements polonais d'aujourd'hui menés par l'armée polonaise avec la bénédiction, sinon l'aide directe, soviétique, et les événements du Chili en 1974 menés par l'armée chilienne avec la bénédiction, sinon l'aide directe, des États-Unis?

R. Quelle différence y a-t-il?

Mon Dieu! je ne suis pas assez versé dans l'analyse et l'histoire pour vous dire s'il y a des différences ni s'il y a des ressemblances!

Les grandes puissances, c'est certain, essaient d'exercer une influence directe ou indirecte dans les pays qui sont dans leur sphère d'influence. Je pense qu'il y a une différence fort, fort lointaine. La situation en Europe, en quelque sorte, est née des accords de Téhéran et des autres accords vers la fin de la deuxième guerre mondiale.

Je pense que les affaires de Chili, si elles se sont passées comme vous le dites, remontent probablement à la doctrine Monroe d'il y a un siècle sur la non-ingérence dans les affaires du continent de l'hémisphère occidental. Mais je ne suis pas très habile à ces jeux à moins que je me sois ferré à l'avance sur les événements de Chili qui ne sont pas, dans ma mémoire, aussi clairs que vous le dites, ni ne le sont-ils dans le cas de la Pologne.

J'ai exprimé mes vues sur la Pologne et l'Union Soviétique, sur le Chili, il faudra que je me rafraîchisse la mémoire!

Q. Une brève supplémentaire, si vous le permettez.

Puisque la Pologne est dans des problèmes économiques très importants, est-ce que le Canada serait prêt à vendre à la Pologne, malgré les sept morts et les centaines de blessés, un réacteur nucléaire CANDU du même type que celui livré à l'Argentine, où des dizaines de milliers sont emprisonnés et plus de 1,200 ont totalement disparu, sans qu'on sache ce qu'ils sont devenus?

R. Sauf erreur, votre question est fort hypothétique.

La Pologne, à ce que je sache, ne nous a pas demandé d'acheter de réacteur CANDU.

Q. C'était au conditionnel. Le Canada serait-il prêt...?

R. A acheter des CANDU?

Qu'on nous fasse une demande, je regarderai ça. Je ne sache pas que les CANDU empêcheraient les morts d'avoir eu lieu, ni le sang de se verser.

Ça me paraît une question tellement hypothétique que je n'arrive pas à la saisir.

Dans le cas de l'Argentine, non plus. Sauf erreur, les CANDU c'est pour produire de l'électricité et après...

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER ON THE SITUATION IN POLAND—DECEMBER 30, 1981

The World has followed the unfolding of events in Poland with deep anxiety for months past. This anxiety increased dramatically with the imposition of Martial Law. It suddenly became difficult to know what was happening in Poland. Reports of massive arrests and detentions, and of widespread abuse of human rights, became current. We still do not know the extent to which basic human liberties may now stand in jeopardy. The already battered vision of a European order based upon respect for the obligations assumed by Governments under the final act of Helsinki has been further defaced.

Yesterday President Reagan made a statement on developments in his government's policy with regard to the Polish situation and we understand that his statement was the subject of discussion at a NATO Permanent Representatives' meeting in Brussels earlier today. In that respect, the position of the Canadian Government bears repeating.

From the outset, Canada, and indeed the international community generally, have asserted that all countries should respect Poland's right to settle its own problems in its own way. In addition, the Canadian Government's policies have shown deep concern for the economic hardship being endured by the people of Poland. What I say today should be seen as a re-affirmation of those basic propositions.

Poland's fate involves us all—in particular, in this country, the hundreds of thousands of Canadians of Polish origin. Their ardent calls for the restoration of a civilized measure of liberty in their ancestral country command the respect and support of their fellow citizens. Indeed, as Canadians, our heart goes out to a valiant people struggling against great odds to pursue their own destiny.

Given the claim of the Polish authorities that normalcy is returning, the Canadian Government calls upon the Polish Government for an act of national reconciliation. Only history can be the judge of the extent to which Martial Law averted the danger of Soviet intervention. But, however that may be, now is the time to begin the movement toward compromise and renewal. Military rule cannot be a permanent answer in Poland or any other country. Armies may command the streets, but they cannot command the confidence of the people: that can only be earned through actions which engender political assent.

The earnest desire of the Canadian Government is that the spirit of reform will be allowed to revive among all those forces in the society that can contribute to a peaceful and constructive solution of Poland's problems so that Poland can take its place as a respected member of the international community; so that other nations may return to all forms of exchange with Poland without fear of chaos, repression or foreign intervention; and above all, so that the Polish people themselves can freely pursue the task of reconstructing their society in ways of their own choosing.

TRANSCRIPT OF THE PRIME MINISTER'S INTERVIEW WITH JUDY MORRISON AND STEPHEN
BOISSONNEAULT FOR THE CBC RADIO PROGRAM
"THE HOUSE", JANUARY 23, 1982

JUDY MORRISON: —I would like to change the subject, if I may, to the situation in Poland. Apparently, by the words of Mr. MacGuigan, the minister of External Affairs, the situation is deteriorating there, and there has been considerable criticism, here in this country, about the Canadian government's apparent reluctance to condemn the imposition of martial law in Poland and criticism of Canada's seeming indifference to the demands of Solidarity for increased freedom. Has it reached a stage now where Canada should begin to reassess its position? And I'm wondering also if you have any second thoughts about your original position that expressed a preference under the circumstances for the imposition of martial law.

PIERRE TRUDEAU: —Well, let's look at my original position which, if you read the transcript of the December 19th press conference essentially said that we regretted the imposition of martial law, that we hoped that its rigors would be kept to a minimum. I suggested that communication should be restored and hopefully the Canadian mission there will be able to report any abuses and therefore try and reduce the number of those abuses by the way of public opinions and the minimum. So far I see nothing contradictory in that with the position taken by, I suppose by most public opinion in Canada, and presumably by the Canadian-Polish congress itself. Where I seem to have made a fair amount of enemies is when I said that if martial law prevents Soviet invasion, then I think martial law is preferable to a Soviet invasion which presumably would be automatic following a civil war. Now even with hindsight, I don't think I can withdraw any of that. There is a big "if" there. And people may well argue: yeah, but that isn't what was going to happen. There was going to be no civil war and there was going to be no Soviet invasion. Well, you know, if you can guarantee that to me, then I said, then there should have been no imposition of martial law, if there was going to be no civil war and no Soviet invasion. My "if" is that if there was going to be a Soviet invasion, it was better to take measures to prevent that, it was better that the Poles act themselves to reestablish order than to let the Soviets come in and do it. So, the whole argument is around that "if". And I think, as I said a couple of times before, I think we'll have to let history judge. The only thing I ask is those who see another scenario that they would spell it out. And I haven't heard that spelled out. You know, for at least two years now, we've been saying let the Poles settle their problem themselves. And we've been sort of warning the Soviet Union that if they marched in Poland, there'd be hell to pay. Well, they didn't march in Poland, and we're seeming to say, but still there should be hell to pay. My question to those who disagree with me is, what scenario did they see evolving? With solidarity having obtained a five-day week instead of a six-day week, solidarity having, in that sense, reduced the output that Poland could produce. Poland that needed food and needed exports and needed currency and needed production, and when the congress had adopted the resolution in favour of a referendum. What is the scenario that could have happened. I don't mean in a better world, I mean in the real world that the authorities in Warsaw would have said, "yes, of course, let's have a referendum to see who would be the government!" Or would there have been an attempt to topple the government or not, would it all have happened peacefully? And would the authorities in Poland have refused to use the police if there'd been a general strike? What scenario do you see that makes us feel that there was no need for the military authority? Please tell me.

JUDY MORRISON: —I think you're probably right, that a variety of scenarios might develop depending on what your point of view is, but the question still remains. Our response? Do we owe a measure of support to Solidarity given its demands for freedom? They don't seem that extraordinary to the average person in this country.

PIERRE TRUDEAU: —Well, I guess the basic question is: "does the government give up governing because the trade unions massively say, we will do a better job? I know what my answer would be. It would be, "Well look, get yourselves elected if you think you can do a better job, that is our way." Now how do you do it in Poland? There's no democratic elections so how do you replace the government in Poland if you, Solidarity, think you're going to do a better job? What do you do? Tell them go away or do you have a general strike or do you occupy the mines and the factories? And if that happens and the government says well we're not going to abdicate our authority just because of a general strike, we'll and break the general strike all, President Reagan broke an air controllers' strike all, we often hear: "send in the army when there's a postal strike or a grain handlers strike, the government govern." But in the case of Poland, I'm not supporting the government, I'm just saying that it seemed unlikely to me that the government would suddenly say: "Okay, the people don't like the government, let's have a referendum to see if maybe Solidarity should be governing the country." That didn't seem likely to me. Now if it seems likely to others, obviously we have a disagreement on the hypotheses on which we're arguing. But if, as seems more likely, the government would say: "well we, we're not going to permit a general strike, and we're not going to permit an overthrow of the government", then what do they do to reestablish order? One of two things: establish order themselves with the army or let the Soviets come in and do it for them. From the point of view of the Poles, which of the two would have been better? Both are bad, but which would have been worse for the Poles in the immediate and medium term.

STEPHEN BOISSONNEAULT: —So if you would be good enough to briefly summarize what you've just said, do I understand you correctly to mean no direct Canadian action until there is clear evidence of direct Russian intervention? Let the Poles handle it.

PIERRE TRUDEAU: —I'm not saying exactly that because even the Poles can handle it well or badly. If the military regime is shown to use a measure of force which is excessive, and if it does not show inclinations towards relaxing or relinquishing the military rule, then I see that it is our duty to put pressure on them as I did in my statement at the end of the year when I suggested that it was time for reconciliation and so on. I think that friendly countries can tell each other: "look we'd prefer it if you didn't do it that way." I mean when I went to Korea, I was told to tell the government to have a little more respect for civil liberties. You know, we are a member of NATO; there are members of NATO that have less respect for civil liberties than others. I mean how many tens of thousands of people are in jail in Turkey? How many people are in jail in Northern Ireland? You know, the military is used by ourselves. We used it in 1970. As I say, a lot of Canadians are always writing, every time there is a postal strike or a grain handlers strike or a rail strike: "send in the army." So it's not an a priori thing that the state should suddenly give up governing, it uses the means it can. But, if it uses excessive means, it is criticized as a lot of people will want to criticize us in 1970. And pressure can be made to bear, in a friendly way, from one country to another, to ensure that the repression ceases. And that is what we are doing now with Poland.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

—RELEASE—

JANUARY 29, 1982

Tonight, hundreds of millions of people throughout the free world will focus their attention and their sympathies on the plight of the people of Poland.

Canada has been made a better place through successive migrations of Poles to our shores. They have contributed with energy and spirit to the development of our country and its democratic institutions. Many of them maintain close ties with families and friends in Poland.

During the past year, all of us have watched with joy and trepidation as the Polish nation bravely attempted to liberalize its social and political institutions. Canadians were therefore bitterly disappointed when it became clear that the Polish People's attempt to secure for themselves the freedom we so deeply cherish would—at least for a time—be suppressed.

Individual liberty in Poland has been dealt a heavy blow. Too many Poles remain in detention; too many freedoms crushed.

I fervently call upon the government of Poland to bring an end to martial law and to open the way to national renewal and reconciliation. It is not, however, for us to say how this should be accomplished, for we have always held that the Polish people should be left free to settle their own problems in their own way.

[Translation]

It is the Poles themselves who must find Polish solutions to the economic and political problems which afflict their country.

Every group in that country will have to demonstrate that it has the determination, the patience and the wisdom to help create once more an atmosphere in which Poland's legendary love of freedom and independence can flourish again.

APPENDIX "B"

*(See p. 3574)*WESTERN RAIL CAPACITY—NEWS CONFERENCE BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—WINNIPEG, FEBRUARY 8, 1982

HON. JEAN-LUC PEPIN: I would like to introduce those who are with me at the table. On my right side is Dr. Gilson who is going to be the government representative in the exercise that we are beginning today. On his right side is Robert Bockstael who is my distinguished Parliamentary Secretary and on my left side is Arthur Kroeger who is my able Deputy Minister.

I just had a meeting with the leaders of the western agricultural community. Their reaction to the announcement as you will hear from them directly in a few moments will be most constructive, and for that on behalf of the government I'm very grateful. I want to compliment them for the role that they have played in getting us where we are now. I am not just being diplomatic when I say that. They have been wise, enlightened, responsible, in some ways they have started it all. I'm talking about the Western Agricultural Conference, I'm talking about the Prairie Farm Commodity Coalition, I'm talking about these farm leaders who have played a very, very important role in getting us to this very intensive period of negotiations which is going to follow.

They have done it by using two words: "if" and "negotiate". These are the two words that started it all. They have said that if the government can meet this series of conditions, they will negotiate with the government. They have challenged the government to put before them a package of commitments and a good amount of money as the basis for negotiations on the statutory rates. Today, we're producing the package that they called for.

I wish at this moment I could say something quotable, but I can't because I know that what needs to be done is going to be very difficult, and consequently this is not yet time for rejoicing or quotable quotes. Today is but one step, albeit a very important one, towards a major development in western Canadian economic history, and Canadian economic history. But we're not there yet. What we are talking about today is terribly important. If you talk about mega-projects, if you talk about big things that can be done in Canada on the economic side, what we're talking about today is one of those.

The package that I'm going to present to you is the result on the government side of a collective effort. I want to underline the fact that this document has been produced, essentially and fundamentally by the Western Affairs Committee of Cabinet. On the political side, no doubt about it, it is western-influenced, it is western-preoccupied. I am admitted to this Committee because of my job as Minister of Transport. I am admitted to it also because in the past I've displayed some passion about the West and indicated my great eagerness to make a bit of a contribution to a process of balancing of the different regions of Canada.

What we will talk about today is essentially two things. The first one is the necessity of ensuring adequacy in the mainline for the transportation of western resources, raw and processed, which will be produced in much greater quantity as years go by. We've got to make sure that Western Canada has an adequate railway transportation system. That should be our collective objective: terribly important for the growth of the west economically, terribly important for the economic future of Canada too. It is of the essence that we demonstrate to the world that Canadians can produce a transportation system that has certainty, stability, and security. That's the challenge, and I am quite sure that we're going to have the nerve, the will, to realize this objective.

The second point is that in order to get to that objective, it is judged essential to rebalance the contribution that the Government of Canada, that the railways and the producers of grain make to the transportation of their products.

Those two points are of course intimately related and this is the main purpose of my statement today. I'll deal with it in two parts. I'm going to indicate first what kind of solution we're looking for, and second, describe the main elements of what we're presenting today.

What kind of solution are we looking for? I want to stress a number of points.

1. The solution has to come soon, it is urgent that it should come soon. There are already strains on the mainline. Double tracking and tunneling must start now, so we cannot indulge in a great consultative process with the public, a kind of Pepin-Robarts exercise on grain and on transportation. It's got to be done rapidly.

2. What I said about this solution being western-inspired has been true up to now and will remain true. The farm organizations of the West, the non-farm organizations and the press who have played such an important role up to now will continue to do so. The decision that we're announcing tomorrow is one that came out, I repeat from the Western Affairs Committee of Cabinet. Mr. Gilson is a good westerner, he's got his credentials as a westerner. Most of those who have advised me up to now have been westerners. My Deputy Minister is from Alberta, that's a credit card anywhere you go.

So this has been and will continue to be very much western-inspired.

3. The comprehensive approach is of course the approach that we've taken and it will continue. It means that you are looking for a solution which encompasses a statutory rate revision.

4. The solution has got to be statutory, has got to be a legislated one. This was so with the Crow's Nest rate and it will be so with the framework that we are developing. I suggest that grain will always be treated differently than other commodities. Why? For a great number of reasons, some of them having to do with history, some with psychology, others with sociology, some with economics. Grain will always have, to use the language of Quebec, a special status in Canadian economics and the producers of western Canada should be able to count on that.

5. The solution has to be fair particularly to the producers and has to be fair also to the government. There are limits to what the government can contribute money-wise in the resolution of this problem of mainline capacity. It would be pleasant to be able to say that there aren't any but it wouldn't be true, and it would be wrong because this is very much a priority of the government, there are other priorities that have to be attended to, there are other regions of Canada who feel that they deserve some attention also. People will say, well the government could put more than $1.3 billion, why don't they double the amount? That's not realistic. The amount that is there has been decided taking all factors into consideration.

6. The solution that we're looking for has got to be seen as evolutionary. The different world will not come tomorrow. There will be, possibly, a phasing-in period and consequently people who are not totally satisfied at the beginning, should not give up hope.

Finally, whatever we do must lead to a greater degree of efficiency in the rail transportation system.

This being the kind of solution that we're looking for, here's what we're announcing this morning.

In the paper that you have in front of you, there are essentially two parts. The first part has to do with principles, with fundamental objectives that are considered by the government of the essence. On these, the government's representative has no great amount of flexibility. What are they?

That the statutory framework should be maintained.

That the railways should have adequate compensation, in return for which a number of obligations are assigned to the railways. One of them is to provide adequate data; another is to commit themselves to performance and service guarantees; another is to make the necessary investments so that the mainline will be adequate; the acceptance that the solution might be phased-in; and finally that they might also make a contribution to other objectives like diversification and processing.

The next principle is on federal responsibilities. The government commits itself to pay for the current Crow benefit established at 1981-82 level. That's a major decision as you all know. The Crow benefit being the present losses of the railways and the present cost of branch line subsidies. The government will discuss with producers and the railway companies its possible contribution to added costs. In years to come, of course, costs will rise and it will have to be determined what percentage of these added costs producers will pay for, or alternatively what the railways will not be paid for and what the government might contribute.

The government also commits itself in this document to continue the branch line rehabilitation program and to acquire 1,280 hopper cars in another effort to have the adequate rolling stock.

And then you have the statement which says that producers will be expected to pay more. There is no percentage assigned here, since this is part of the negotiation which is beginning.

Finally, we have the principle that we should be looking for increased efficiency in transportation.

The second part is on flexible aspects in the consultation process which is beginning now. In other words, aspects in which the government is keen to receive the recommendations from its representative. The aspects are:

The proper level of compensation to the railways: what is it exactly, what should it be. Variable costs, fixed costs, what percentage of fixed costs and so on. The government representative will make recommendations on that after hearing everybody who is involved in the process.

Who should be paid: the railways or the farmers. To whom should the Crown benefit payment be made. This is a tough one as you know in which positions have been taken in the recent past.

Performance guarantees: What should they be, what should the railways be asked to commit themselves to, keeping in mind that they don't control everything, that much of the efficiency of the railways depends on other parties. So what kind of commitment are you going to look for?

The next item is variable freight rates, a very debated subject also. Here the governments simply picks up the formula used by the Western Agricultural Conference, that variable freight rates should not be "detrimental to individual producers". Mr. Gilson will have the very heavy responsibility of finding out if there are variable rates that are not injurious to individual producers and consequently that could be acceptable.

Another item is how to help diversification and processing. The government representative will try and find out if there are ways in which the federal government, for example, by programs other than freight rate subsidies could be helpful in this process of diversification of the western agricultural base.

Another item that you find there is an obligation to find out what should be in the statutory document which will come in the fall, what should be included, what is of the essence in the law.

So this is the program for the next three or four months. To lead this extremely important exercise, the government is fortunate to have the good services of Dr. Clay Gilson. Dr. Gilson is a professor, as you know, but he is more than a professor, if that is possible. He has been an administrator in the academic milieu. Even more fundamental for the exercise that he's going to lead, he has been very active in a number of organizations, some agricultural and some not. His present role as President of the Agricultural Institute of Canada is a clear indication not only of his knowledge but of his tremendous activity in this area. The challenge for him is great and we wish him luck for many reasons because his luck is going to be our luck too. So if he's successful everyone of us stands to be.

We are eager to try and answer some of the questions you have. Mr. Kroeger will join me in doing that but maybe Dr. Gilson would like to say a few words before we get to the question period.

DR. GILSON: My observations will be brief this morning because my association with this extremely important project has been only recent. I will have to have an opportunity to digest the policy document that the minister has discussed in the task ahead of me. Let me say that I have mixed feelings Mr. Minister about this task. I'm obviously enthusiastic and delighted to be identified with what you label to be probably one of the more important projects and ultimate decisions made in Western Canada. It is a project that is a great importance to the West. At the same time, I'm apprehensive at this stage about the tremendous challenge ahead. We have a very short time to do the task but I think with the will and with a lot of work we can arrive, I hope at the end of May with a consensus that will permit the type of legislation that you anticipate in the fall.

Perhaps more important I'm optimistic that we will achieve a constructive consensus at the end of this relatively short period. Optimistic, because I have detected during the past year or two, an emerging will among farm leaders in the West that this is an important issue. There are differences, there are honest differences but I believe and detect the will that we must come to some consensus on such an enormously important part of the West. They will allow us to deal with some of the outstanding issues that if left unresolved will obviously grow in intensity in the next four or five years as you've pointed out. I will be immediately digesting what is in front of us and trying to set out the overall process. I will very shortly thereafter be meeting with the major farm groups and organizations to get a better identification of the issues and to see what more fundamentally we have to deal within the negotiation and perhaps the third phase. Most important of all is the actual negotiation itself and time will be short and we promise and commit ourselves to hard work to try to deliver that consensus that I think is there, by the end of May.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul C. Lafond, for Honourable George van Roggen, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, tabled the first report of the Subcommittee on National Defence.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Lafond: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I shall begin by expressing my gratitude to members of the subcommittee who laboured so assiduously and successfully in this study, often at inconvenient hours which were assigned to us by the co-ordinator of committees!

I shall not attempt to go into the details of this report or to elaborate on them. We believe it to be succinct and concise enough to warrant its being fully read, absorbed and acted upon with little or no delay by honourable senators, by the government and by others who are or should be concerned with the state of Canada's defence capabilities.

There should be no question that the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada have been delinquent in matters of defence in the last decade or so. Indeed, many of us, including myself, would have been inclined to be much more sanguine in denouncing many of the things that have been done, that have not been done or that have just been left to happen in terms of Canada's defence since our first centennial.

The questions we decided to attack were: Where do we stand at present? What do we need? How do we get it? The first aspect we inquired into was manpower requirements; hence this report.

[Translation]

We are proposing specific and realistic recommendations for increasing our defence establishment, while avoiding any unnecessary build-up of our defence apparatus and continuing our efforts to resolve the serious economic problems confronting us today.

We are proposing a plan of action by which we shall be able to meet our commitments to our common security and other international objectives, and protect our territory to the extent judged necessary for our security. The plan is comprised of two phases, the first ending in 1985 and the second in 1987, which seems reasonable.

[English]

The last chapter of the report deals with the cost of implementing this plan. We can afford it. It involves the addition to the defence budget during this decade of one-tenth of one per cent of our GNP. When this is added to our current commitment to increase the defence budget by 3 per cent per annum, our total defence spending would only increase from 1.7 to 1.9 per cent of our GNP. Even then Canada would retain its rank in the scale of defence expenditures among the countries of the North Atlantic Alliance ahead of Luxembourg but trailing all others.

● (1405)

We are, therefore, presenting Canada and its government with a course of action it cannot reject if we are to retain a modicum of self-respect and self-preservation. The time has come for the government of this country to show good faith. Obviously, in recent months some changes of attitude have taken place and some progress has been made. Some good things have been undertaken and have been done, and the current Minister of National Defence deserves all our plaudits for the pressures he has applied and for what he has achieved, but he needs much more support and attention than he has been receiving.

It is not a question of preparing for war or of warmongering. Regretfully, it can hardly be a question of defence in its total meaning. Our relatively small population and resources and the vastness of the territory and the seas over which we claim sovereignty make it impossible for us to defend ourselves by ourselves against any overwhelmingly superior opponent. Still this does not mean we should lie on our backs and give up. We should at least give ourselves the means to detect and learn what may be taking place at any time in our own immense backyard, counter it to the extent we can, and also give ourselves the means to live up to the engagements we adhere to towards our friends, our allies and the community of mankind through the United Nations.

[Translation]

The subcommittee has realized that accusations and recriminations would not serve any purpose in 1981-82, but also that as soon as its recommendations were implemented in 1985 and 1987, we should not rest on our laurels but take stock of the situation and pursue an appropriate course of action.

The report has two basic comments to make. First of all, it criticizes the lack of a clear definition of our present targets and goals and how they are to be achieved in the eighties. Second, it refers to the lack of a concrete and practical mobilization plan. We are told that a number of studies are being made, but, in any case, they were started ten years too late and seem to be progressing at a snail's pace. We must do better than that.

[English]

There is an urgent need for a new, contemporary white paper on national defence for the 1980s and 1990s, and this is your subcommittee's first and most pressing recommendation. The last such statement of policy is already 12 years old. How the world has changed since!

We require, at least, a spelling-out of what we need, what we do, who does it, when and how; and which commitments we have and will accept or can accept in the future in terms of our armed forces. This clear statement, this white paper, is not a matter to be put on the drawing board for emergence in 1987 or 1990, but a matter to be brought forth to the people of this country no later than 12 months from now. I shall not go into what this white paper should deal with, because the report does that.

Everyone will appreciate, I am sure, how awkward it can be to establish defence requirements in the absence of well-defined mobilization plans. This case was made extensively and very well, to my mind, some weeks ago by the subcommittee of the other place on Canada's reserve forces. I fully agree with and support their recommendations on this point and will not add to them at this time.

● (1410)

May I also suggest, without sounding patronizing, that if, as it appears, the institution of the Subcommittee on National Defence of the Foreign Affairs Committee has provoked the other place into giving closer attention to basic Canadian defence matters, we should rejoice and encourage it.

Having completed this summary examination of manpower in the Canadian armed forces, your subcommittee now wishes to inquire into the equipment and installations aspects of our military establishments, starting with Maritime Command. I trust the Senate will permit us to do so.

Honourable senators, I commend this report to your consideration.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

QUESTION PERIOD

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DECORATION OF ROOM OCCUPIED BY CBC (CANADIAN PRESS)

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he, or will he, give me any information respecting the person or persons responsible for the use of the walls in the room which was formerly the ladies' rest room and which is no longer used for that purpose but has been converted into the quarters now occupied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? For his information, this room is at the far end of the corridor on the third floor of the building.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): They are doing it very noisily.

Senator Perrault: It is alleged that the CBC has moved into this former ladies' room?

Senator Donahoe: As a supplementary question, I would ask the honourable gentleman if he is aware of the nature of the decoration which is at present to be seen on the walls of that room.

Senator Perrault: I have never made it a practice to frequent that particular room. Would the honourable senator describe the mural for us?

An Hon. Senator: Don't ask!

Senator Donahoe: I would be happy to respond to the honourable gentleman's request and to tell him what is in the back of my mind in asking these questions. Before doing so, I would hasten to assure him that, during the time that room was furnished for the comfort and convenience of ladies, I was never in it, nor did I see any of the things which took place in that room.

Since the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been occupying that room, it has used it as a rest room for its personnel. They have formed the habit of leaving the door ajar so that any person passing along the corridor cannot fail to see that which I saw today on a wall of the room.

I might say in passing that this is a question I would much sooner direct to the Prime Minister of Canada than to a mere Leader of the Government in the Senate.

That which I could not fail to see in the room was the portrait of a head of state. You may wonder which head of state. You may ask, "Was it a portrait of the Prime Minister of Canada?" If that were the case, you would not have heard from me. You may wonder if it was a portrait of the Queen. If it were, you would not have heard from me. I would have deemed either of those portraits, and a considerable number of others, to be entirely appropriate as decoration for a wall of that room.

● (1415)

I want to say to those listening to me that the picture I saw gracing the wall—"gracing" is the wrong word—the picture I saw on the wall is a picture of a foreign head of state. Do you want to know which head of which state? I will tell you. The state is Russia.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Shame.

Senator Donahoe: The head of state in question is Leonid Brezhnev, and Leonid Brezhnev, as you might well know, is one of the strongest opponents and greatest enemies of this nation, and of the system under which we are governed, to be found anywhere in the world.

I am a poor Nova Scotian and I was sent to this chamber to represent the people of Nova Scotia. My heart is filled with pride when I enter this chamber. Today I can assure you that that pride plummeted to the depths.

I was not alone when I saw the picture; I was accompanied by my wife. My wife was more alert than I, and she asked, "What is that picture on the wall?" I said, "By God, I think it is Brezhnev." She said that I had better inquire before I said anything about it, so I entered the room and seated therein were four or five young men. I asked of whom it was a picture, and they said in chorus, "Brezhnev." I asked who owned the picture and, to a man, they made a sign with their thumbs indicating that the picture was the property of a young man who was busy talking on the telephone. No doubt he was talking on a government line. He was likely putting through a call which was being paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. They told me he was the owner of the picture that was on display in the Parliament Buildings.

My question to the Leader of the Government—

Senator Frith: Thank you for being so brief.

Senator Donahoe: I can assure honourable gentlemen opposite that I used not one word more than necessary in order for them to have a proper understanding of the matter about which I am complaining.

My question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does he approve of the display of a portrait of Leonid Brezhnev in a prominent place in these buildings that are devoted to the carrying-on of the Government of Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the displaying of a portrait of any head of state in lavatories, public areas, rest rooms or other offices does not constitute the official policy of this government, because this government is concerned with more important things.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government be good enough to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister of Canada the taste for decoration which is being displayed by those who are temporarily occupying the corridors of the Parliament Buildings of Canada? They are spreading propaganda. I will not say what kind of propaganda, but I leave it to your imagination as to whether there is any affinity between the nationality and politics of the head of state who is portrayed in that portrait and those things which are said in the media to which those gentlemen are devoted and for which they work.

ENERGY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—AWARD OF EXPLORATION PERMITS TO PETRO-CANADA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Did the federal government consult with the Province of British Columbia before the recent award of exploration permits for 5.8 million acres off British Columbia's coast to Petro-Canada, and if not why not?

● (1420)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He will likely have to take it as notice as well if he is unaware of the circumstances surrounding the previous question. Will he indicate whether or not he and the federal government are aware of the provincial government moratorium on the granting of oil exploration permits off its coasts?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. It can be said, of course, that this is an area in dispute involving the Province of British Columbia and the Government of Canada. The matter has not been entirely resolved as yet.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY—RESIDENTIAL CONSTRUCTION IN EAST MONTREAL

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for economic development. Following the letter sent by the ten Liberal members of Parliament to the Prime Minister asking that 50,000 new housing units be built in Montreal, has the minister taken action to meet their request? Will he be announcing soon a vast housing program for East Montreal to meet the wishes of these members?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): My honourable friend, Senator Asselin, knows that the minister responsible for housing has made a number of announcements from time to time that will lead to the enlargement and enrichment of the housing stock in Canada.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Can the minister tell us whether the minister responsible for housing and for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has discussed the matter with him so that such a program can be developed for the Montreal area?

[English]

Senator Olson: The minister in charge of CMHC has discussed housing programs for Canada with a lot of people, including me from time to time. If in his next question, as I suspect, he seeks to know what goes on in a cabinet meeting, I will reply that he had been in cabinet long enough to know that that is an improper question or, at least, a reply to that kind of question would be improper.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: My supplementary is as follows: Has the cabinet made a decision on what kind of announcement will it make to meet the wishes of these members, who have indicated that they speak for their constituents, and to promote recovery of the Quebec economy in view of the high level of unemployment in our province? There is a general feeling of frustration in Quebec because no one can find any employment.

Has the government decided, or will it decide, to meet the wishes of these members, in an effort to stimulate the economy in the Montreal area?

[English]

Senator Olson: There are some areas of Canada where unemployment levels are unacceptably high to the government. They are not only in Quebec but also in other places across the country. There are requests from members of Parliament representing all areas for the alleviation of these situations. These representations from all over the country are taken very seriously by the government.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Finally, could the minister tell us whether the Minister of Finance will accept the recommendations made by those ten members and will he make changes to his budget with a view to giving higher priority to the economy, in order to reduce unemployment in that particular area of Quebec?

[English]

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance has responded twice, I believe, very recently to a number of considerations that were involved in the budget. One thing he has consistently argued is that the government has a deeper responsibility to make sure that we do what we can to reduce the ravages of inflation, which is one of the problems in the housing area. That policy is supported by all senators on this side of the chamber, and, indeed, by all members who sit to the right of Madam Speaker in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

STATEMENT BY TEN MEMBERS OF FEDERAL LIBERAL CAUCUS—CABINET SOLIDARITY

Senator Asselin: I will tell the minister the theory he just expounded is not supported by the ten members who wrote to the Prime Minister. I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government. As a result of this divergent thinking on government economic policies, can the minister tell us whether the two ministers who take issue with the Minister of Finance and the government on economic policies intend to submit their resignations, according to precedent?

● (1425)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, some of us in this chamber find it odd indeed that the official opposition appears to be obsessed with the question of internal party dissidence. The official opposition—

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That does not apply to the opposition; it applies to the government. Answer the question.

Senator Perrault: The official opposition has been racked and ravaged by dissidence and division within its ranks.

An Hon. Senator: They want us to act like Tories.

Senator Perrault: Indeed, we on this side are not going to act like a group of Conservatives. We are going to act responsibly in efforts to develop even more effective economic policies for the country.

As for the two ministers, I do not know their intentions. Certainly, they remain part of the ministry. They are excellent ministers, who carry out their responsibilities well and ably on behalf of the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Are not those two ministers, by signing the letter, stating publicly their opposition to the economic policies of the government, as the Minister of State responsible for Economic Development has just said, since the purpose of the Minister of Finance is mainly to fight inflation and forget about unemployment? In this case, the two ministers are saying to the government that they want programs introduced to reduce unemployment in the Montreal area. Would you not agree this action means both men are opposed to the economic policies put forward by the Minister of Finance and the cabinet?

[English]

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator would be well advised to contact those ministers—

Senator Asselin: No, I won't.

Senator Perrault:—and ask the question directly of them. Certainly, nothing has appeared which indicates a lack of confidence on the part of those two ministers in the economic policies of this government. They have expressed some support for further employment initiatives and the enhancement of programs already under way; but there is nothing in any statement signed by them which calls for a reversal of economic policy or a change or alteration in policy.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It's just that it's no good.

Senator Perrault: They have stated that in their area—and, after all, they are members of Parliament and represent an important part of this country—they have a high degree of unemployment among the ranks of their constituents and they are prepared to support further measures to help them; and I can see no heinous offence in that.

Senator Flynn: Does the Leader of the Government share the views expressed by the two ministers and the eight members from Quebec?

Senator Perrault: There is no one on this side, in support of the government, who is not prepared to support additional constructive measures to help the people of this country, regardless of where they live.

Senator Flynn: I am speaking of the specific proposals contained in the letter. Do you share those views? You say they are not in contradiction of the views of the government. Just say, "Yes, I share them." Can you say that? You would never dare say anything against the government; you are subservient.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition is now asking for an opinion.

Senator Flynn: No, no; I am asking whether you share those views.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition is not engaged in an earnest quest for information; and I do not intend to offer either a legal or any other opinion.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether his colleagues, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Monique Bégin, and the Minister of State, the Honourable Serge Joyal, were speaking for the government in stating that an attack on the present problems of unemployment cannot await a resolution of the longer term problems supposedly attacked in the budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the honourable senator should read the letter and the news communiqué rather more carefully. In doing so, he will note that the letter contains some words which indicate that the action taken by the government to deal with these issues is appropriate. They focused on two that were of particular importance to them.

Senator Murray: The minister will recall—because I am sure he has seen the letter—that his two colleagues, Madame Bégin and Mr. Joyal, while indicating support for the long-term objectives of the government in fighting inflation, specifically said, together with their eight colleagues from Montreal, that resolution of the problems they raised could not await the longer term attack on those problems. That is why they were calling for immediate action. I am asking the question that is traditionally asked, and that it is proper to ask, of the government under these circumstances; that is, whether those two ministers were speaking for the government on that matter.

● (1430)

Senator Olson: Well, you know—

Senator Marshall: Yes or no?

Senator Asselin: Were they or were they not speaking for the government?

Senator Olson: Oh yes. You like those yes or no answers, when neither a yes nor a no gives the whole truth in answer to the question. I think I should recommend to my honourable friend to recall—I am sure he has already read it—that a question of a similar nature was addressed to the Prime Minister in the House of Commons yesterday, or the day before, to which the reply is just as valid today as it was at the time the question was put.

Senator Murray: Then we are to assume that the two ministers in question—and I am concentrating on them and not on the eight back-benchers who are not bound by the constitutional doctrine of collective, "collective," I repeat, cabinet responsibility—were not speaking for the government on this matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, you can take it that what the Prime Minister said in reply to the question of a similar nature to which I have just referred is the position of the government. I am sure my honourable friend has read that reply already, but I recommend that he read it again, this time a little more slowly, so that he will understand it better.

Senator Asselin: You refuse to answer.

Senator Flynn: It was suggested in the press that this was a distortion of the truth.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the interpretations that are made from time to time by the Leader of the Opposition in this house, and, indeed, sometimes by the people in the media—not all of them, but a few of them—really do qualify for the use of the word "distortion".

Hon. G. I. Smith: You are an expert at that.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. This also deals with the unemployment situation.

I am more concerned about the people who are in fact unemployed in the country now than with the two ministers who should be unemployed.

The minister is not unaware that a further 109,000 Canadians were added to the unemployment rolls in the month of December. The Canadian Manufacturers Association has predicted a further job loss of 175,000 people this month.

At what point will the minister and his committee, acting on behalf of the government, decide that additional measures will be announced and made available to help these poor, unfortunate people? I appreciate the minister's concern with inflation. I know that is a problem that has got to be handled, and that it has to be wrestled to the ground, if I may use an obscure point of historical data. What I would ask, however, on behalf of those people—over a million of them—who are not immediately concerned with inflation but with having a job is, can the minister offer them any hope?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators. Announcements are being made almost every week with regard to measures to deal with these problems. I am sure my honourable friend wants to be fair. It is a tragedy—and this has to be said over and over again—for any person to be unemployed or to be without an adequate level of income. There is no argument about that because everybody agrees on it. However, my honourable friend should take into account that, seasonally adjusted, there was a decline in the rate of unemployment from December to January, in terms of the figures that were released in those two months. He knows very well also that Canada has a winter every year, and that there is a downturn in employment opportunities during that period.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You don't have to tell me!

Senator Olson: No, but you act as if this is something new that happens every year. You know as well as I do that winter and January come every year.

Senator Doody: A supplementary, honourable senators. I find it difficult to rationalize the solace that the honourable the minister takes from the fact that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment has supposedly dropped. The actual number of people unemployed in Canada is greater today than it has been at any time in the past 34 years. That is a simple, straight fact of life. You can seasonally adjust anything you want to, but people are still out of work—over a million of them—and there are more and more being added to that number every day.

It is a fact that there is such widespread despair in the country now that some 68,000 Canadians withdrew themselves from the labour force in January to join hundreds of thousands of others who are not even listed in these statistics, seasonally adjusted or otherwise.

Will the minister depart from his stubbornness and tell us what plans the government has to help these people find work? Never mind telling us about announcements made last week or two weeks ago. They obviously have not dealt with the problem. What plans does the minister and his committee have to deal with the problem of unemployment?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, a few minutes ago the honourable senator asked me what plans we had and what announcements we were prepared to make to deal, or to help to deal, with this problem. I happen to have a fairly impressive list of such things with me here, if you would like me to read it. It is not new information, but sometimes you have to announce things three or four times before the members opposite seem to get the message.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is always the same list.

Senator Olson: We do not need to have an argument about problems connected with unemployment. I have already acknowledged that. There has been no government in history, however, that has been more sensitive to that problem than the one that is in office now. However, we also have to deal with the real world, and we have to deal with both sides of the equation. The Minister of Finance, over and over again, supported by the other ministers in the cabinet, has reminded us that the long-term problems associated with the erosion that can be caused by inflation, such as further unemployment and lack of confidence in making investments in the longer term, are worse by far than the very responsible action that the government is taking at this time.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Doody: A supplementary, honourable senators. The budget that the Minister of Finance brought down some months ago, and which he has been bringing down in bits and pieces every week since that time, anticipated an unemployment rate of 7.8 per cent. It has now been demonstrated in a report by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the new figure will be 8.7, or closer to 9 per cent. Surely, then, the figures that the budget was predicated on, and the premises which led the Minister of Finance to the conclusions that brought forth the budget, have been demonstrated to be incorrect.

Taking that as a fact, will the government not now acknowledge that the budget document is inadequate to handle the unemployment problem that we have in Canada, and come forth with new programs, new policies, new hope, for those hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are looking forward to nothing?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, after all the rhetoric, there was one question in there: Will the government acknowledge that the situation has changed somewhat from the predictions that were made on budget night, November 12, 1981? The answer is that the Minister of Finance has already acknowledged that the unemployment figures are now moving up a little more rapidly than he anticipated. He also gave reasons for this, however. One of the difficulties is that we are part of the western world, or the western economy, and it is a fact that there has been some additional downturn in that international trading activity, for one thing, and other factors related to that that take rather a long while to explain in detail.

I am sure my honourable friend is bright enough to understand the implications of those things as well.

Senator Doody: One final supplementary. If the minister can candidly rise in his place and say that the problems in Canada today are beyond the power of the government to provide cures for, and if the government is incapable of providing cures for this country's economic ills, then surely the minister and his colleagues should resign.

Senator Olson: I did not say that, and I do not like the honourable senator putting words in my mouth. He can try as much as he likes, but he will not get away with it. I do not accept his version of what I said.

Senator Asselin: You did admit that you cannot do anything, so why don't you resign?

Senator Olson: I did not say that.

EDUCATION

COMMITTEE TO STUDY GOVERNMENT POLICY ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. It concerns several items appearing in an article published in today's Le Devoir under the following headline: "Ottawa sets up mechanism for intervention in area of post-secondary education". The writer of this article first mentioned the existence of a standing committee formed early last fall at the Department of the Secretary of State, with responsibility for defining a federal policy on universities. The committee consisted of a dozen members but only one francophone professional member. It was directed by Mr. Peter Hicks, an officer from Treasury Board.

The article went on to say that according to a document drafted last December, this task force on post-secondary education would be responsible for proposing options for federal action regarding post-secondary education and human resources development for the eighties.

My question is as follows: Could the Leader of the Government confirm the existence of such a committee as of last September? Could he also confirm the existence of the document mentioned in the article which seems to define the committee's mandate?

If the answer to these questions is affirmative, I have an additional question: Would the Leader of the Government be willing to table in this house the documents confirming the existence of the committee and indicating its mandate and members?

Senator Perrault: The question is taken as notice.

Senator Tremblay: I have a supplementary. The same article also mentions a telegram sent by Mrs. Huguette Labelle, Under-Secretary of State in Ottawa, and, as such, responsible for the task force in question, directed by Mr. Hicks. The article says that yesterday Mrs. Labelle sent a telegram to her Quebec counterpart, Mr. Jacques Girard, Deputy Minister of Education, listing Ottawa's so-called concessions to the provinces to guarantee post-secondary financing. Mrs. Labelle sent the same information to the conference of Canadian education ministers, for consideration.

May I again ask the Leader of the Government whether he is in a position to confirm the existence of these telegrams, and if so, whether he is willing to table the telegrams in this chamber as well?

● (1440)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will soon be presenting a statement to this chamber regarding the matters raised by the honourable senator.

THE SENATE

QUESTION PERIOD—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Before I begin, I would like to say briefly that I am motivated in asking this question by the touching interest displayed by the minister on so many occasions to the effect that Question Period should be conducted within the rules of the house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Donahoe: My question, therefore, is this: In order that we on this side may properly play our part in the development of the usages of the house with respect to Question Period, would the honourable minister be kind enough to elaborate upon the impact of the mini-shuffle in the Trudeau cabinet by which new responsibilities were heaped upon him? Would he please tell us what effect that may have, if any, upon our duties with regard to asking questions in this house?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not think that it has any effect on your ability to ask questions.

Hon. C. William Doody: It has no effect on the answers either.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I will rephrase the question, if I may. Is there any area for which the minister in question has not previously been responsible which is now his responsibility and in respect of which it would be appropriate that we on this side should direct our questions to him during Question Period?

Senator Olson: The answer to the first part of the question is no. The answer to the second part of the question is that I believe I will be better prepared to answer your questions.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question, if I may. Can the minister inform us of the number of positions by which his bureaucracy has increased as a result of the shuffle?

Honourable senators, I should like to ask some further questions and, in the interests of time, I will ask them all together. How many of these are new positions? How many of those persons now under his control have been transferred to that control from other departments? Finally, is the bureaucracy expected to grow further during 1982?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that question really ought to be put on the Order Paper. A detailed answer will be given, but I can tell the honourable senator now that we do not believe there will be any increase in the total budget or the total number of person-years required as a result of the reshuffle.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear!

Senator Donahoe: I have one further supplementary question. I may say that I find it difficult to see how the minister will discharge the duties which have been assigned to him—

Senator Perrault: He is a good minister.

Senator Donahoe: —if his statement is to be taken at its face value, namely, that no increased costs will flow from the shuffle, nor will additional persons be employed. However, for the time being I will let that go and will ask my final question.

Senator Olson: Let us be sure that you understood what you asked.

Senator Donahoe: I understood my question perfectly, honourable senators. I understood that the question is comprised of a number of parts. I did not expect the minister to have the answers to all of those questions ready in his mind. I did explain to honourable senators that I asked the questions all together in the interests of time. However, if the minister chooses to take exception to that—if he chooses to scoff at me and say that I should have put those questions on the Order Paper instead of addressing them to him seriatim, as they are written on this sheet—that is his privilege.

My final question is: As regards the accommodations which are now available to the honourable senator with respect to his new responsibilities, does he have an office in each province? If so, what purpose are such offices established to serve?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development does not now have an office in each province. It has one office only, that being in the city of Ottawa. However, under the reorganization we intend to open an office in each province of Canada.

I should like to clarify one point, however, and I do not want to annoy my friend. I would like to be as informative and objective as possible—

Senator Perrault: As always.

Senator Olson: —but I believe that he did change his question. He initially asked me the result of the reorganization. In the second part of his question he asked whether or not there would be any increase in my present ministry or the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development. Those are two separate questions. There will be an increase in the total number of people in the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development. However, to go back to the first part of the question he asked, there will not be an increase in total in the government service, nor will there be an increase in the cost of delivering that service, as a result of the reorganization, including the person-years that have been assigned to my ministry.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I merely say that the question addressed to the minister referred to the bureaucracy under his control. There was no mention whatever made of departments or of the functions which would be served by those persons. Surely the persons who will man those offices in each province are properly called “the bureaucracy.”

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to table a document which was requested by Senator Balfour yesterday. It might be helpful. I believe that he asked for the parameters—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are we now on delayed answers?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Is this delayed answers?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is this related to the same question?

Senator Olson: This is related to the request made by Senator Balfour yesterday.

Senator Flynn: Well, wait a minute. I have a supplementary question.

You mentioned that you would be opening offices in each province. Do you suggest that you won't need additional personnel to man those offices?

[Senator Donahoe.]

Senator Olson: I did not say that we would not have additional personnel. There is no question that the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development will have additional personnel. We will need only a few people in each of the small offices established in each of the provinces because, although we are a small department, we want to keep it lean and highly efficient. Of course, of necessity, there will be a few more people in the head office to deal with all the provincial offices.

● (1450)

So that honourable senators will understand, what I said was that the total government service and the cost of it will not be increased as a result of the restructuring, and that includes the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and so on.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to explain what the relationship will be between the people of his department in the field and Michael Pitfield's people in the field who, as I understand it, will be assigned to each province as an agent of the office of Federal-Provincial Relations?

Senator Olson: There will be an officer from the Federal-Provincial Relations office in each one of the MSERD offices.

Senator Murray: Can the minister explain what Michael Pitfield's agents will be doing in these offices throughout the country?

Senator Marshall: Undercover work.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should realize—and I take exception to the connotation in the phrase “someone's agents”—that there will be an officer from FPRO in each of these offices because the government takes federal-provincial relations very seriously.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, indeed.

Senator Olson: We think that this matter is so important that we feel that there should be someone in each province who is particularly cognizant of the relations between the federal and provincial government. I am sure the honourable senator will not argue with that concept as being one that needs to be attended to.

Senator Murray: As the minister knows, the entire subject is one of seething discontent and rivalry throughout the government.

Senator Perrault: The Conservative Party.

Senator Murray: Will the minister tell us, if one of Michael Pitfield's agents will be in each of the MSERD offices across the country, who will be the senior person?

Senator Marshall: Mortimer Snerd.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not like to answer questions—

Senator Asselin: —that are embarrassing.

Senator Olson:—that are formulated on erroneous connotations. I do not think that there will be any of Mr. Pitfield's, Mr. Jones' or anybody else's agents in the MSERD offices. As I said before, there will be present an officer in Calgary and in each of the offices who will be in contact with the Federal-Provincial Relations office here.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Senator Murray asked whether the representative of the Federal-Provincial Relations office will be the senior officer in the field in each province. If I remember correctly—and the honourable senator can correct me if I am wrong—I read in the communiqué issued by the Prime Minister that there will be in each province a sort of consular committee on which all the departments in the field will be represented, and that the man representing the Federal-Provincial Relations office in Ottawa will be the chairman of the committee. Is that a senior position, or not?

Senator Olson: I shall have to take the question as notice, and check on it. I would like to see the communiqué, because if the honourable senator were to ask me if he was right or wrong, I would say that he was wrong.

Senator Tremblay: I can give you the document right now, if you need it.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister. What will be the relationship between these new people coming from MSERD and the present DREE staffs in each of the provinces? There are a very substantial number of DREE employees in the provinces, some of them holding very high positions in the public service such as regional directors, assistant deputy ministers, and so on. Will the MSERD people be additions to the DREE staffs presently in the provinces, or will they be complementary to those staffs? How will they fit into the FPRO?

Senator Oldon: The amalgamation that will be taking place between the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will go ahead as announced. The new department, the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion, will be considered by the MSERD office no differently from any other federal department that is in the provinces or the regions, such as the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Transport, or the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

Senator Asselin: So you stole Mr. de Bané's job.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, until we receive a document which, in summary, explains the roles of all these people, then it appears there will be an officer of the new Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion and an officer of the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development in a co-ordinating role, and then there will be an officer of the Federal-Provincial Relations office who will have one hand on each of their throats.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator may describe the situation as he pleases, but I do not agree with his description at all.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Who co-ordinates the co-ordinators?

Senator Asselin: You are the co-ordinator.

Senator Olson: The attempt by the federal government to co-ordinate the activities of all the federal departments in the provinces and in the regions, I think, is a laudable and useful exercise, and, indeed, we believe it will raise substantially the efficiency and effectiveness of the delivery of federal government services in these regions.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? I would like to ask the honourable minister whether this business which, obviously, will provide employment for a large number of people, has any relationship to the job creation machinery sought by the two dissident ministers?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can recall vividly answering this question twice, at least, but I will try a third time, and I will state my answer very slowly in the hope that Senator Donahoe and others will understand. I said that in our view there would be no increase at all in the total civil service required throughout the country as a result of the reorganization and restructuring of the departments involved.

Senator Flynn: That is not what you said.

Senator Olson: If that is not clear to my honourable friend, then I will send him a letter as well so that he can read it at his leisure. Certainly, if the honourable senator comes to understand what I have just said, he will not ask the question again.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, with regard to the questions raised by Senator Murray about the senior officer in the field, may I read the text of the communiqué issued by the Prime Minister? Subsequently, I shall ask a question. Unfortunately, my version of the communiqué is in French.

Senator Flynn: It is not unfortunate at all.

Senator Tremblay: It reads as follows:

[Translation]

The Federal-Provincial Relations Office will set up its own regional offices, under the direction of senior officials. The representative of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office will chair the regional council, made up of officials from all federal departments established in the area.

It is significant to know who is the senior official in the area for the following reason: In case the agreements between the federal and provincial governments—the press release is somewhat vague about this—which formerly came under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and which aimed at co-ordinating the efforts likely to have an impact on regional development, agreements some say would be streamlined and concerning which Mr. Joyal, the minister, threatened the Quebec government, when he said that if there were no Quebec representatives at these meetings, the amounts granted but unspent under previous agreements might be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and give rise to unilateral actions on the part of the federal government, which would be a very serious change of policy. As I said before, should these agreements be maintained, who, among the representatives of the various departments and the Federal-Provincial Relations office would negotiate with the province concerned? Would the negotiator at the table be responsible for the effective and practical co-ordination of the projects involving other departments? That is the meaning of this question, dealing with the change in administrative policy, as it was the DREE representative who used to negotiate?

● (1500)

[English]

Senator Asselin: That is too complicated for the minister.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend did not ask a question. I heard the translation very clearly.

Senator Asselin: He did.

Senator Olson: He was giving his view of what was behind the re-organization. He started out by asking who was going to be the senior officer in these provincial offices, and then he read a statement indicating that someone from the FPRO is going to be the chairman of a council of the federal departments in that area.

I will look at this matter carefully, but I do not think his reasoning necessarily comes to the conclusion he tried to draw in the last part of his comments.

Senator Asselin: You are the minister responsible.

Senator Tremblay: As the minister responsible for economic and regional development, will it be your representative or the chairman of that bureau representing federal and provincial relations who will negotiate with his counterpart in the provincial administration? This is a very basic point, and it is a question.

Senator Olson: The offices will be administered by the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. The senior officers and other employees will obviously be part of that department, but there will be an officer who reports to the Federal-Provincial Relations Office as well.

Senator Tremblay: Will he report as chairman?

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary question. Earlier the minister told us that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was being merged with another department to form a third department.

Senator Olson: A single department.

Senator Doody: My impression was that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was being split into two sections, one for trade and one for commerce. That may be an over-simplification, and I am sure nothing is as simple as that in a bureaucratic re-arrangement.

My question is: What will happen to the offices of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the various provinces? Will they remain intact as Industry, Trade and Commerce offices, or will they be merged into new offices with new employees doing the work?

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Olson: Those offices will be integrated with the DREE offices in those locations at the present time.

I do not think this will happen overnight, or in a week or so. The intention is that the DREE offices and what were the IT&C offices in the region will all come under one ministry. My honourable friend also knows that some legislation is required for that amalgamation.

Hon. Robert Muir: I have a supplementary question for the minister who has just taken his seat. I should like to approach this question from another angle. I am somewhat confused—and the minister may say that I am always confused—about the responses that the minister has given to questions asked by several senators regarding the Pitfield agents, the regional development agents, and some other group of agents. To my mind, his responses seem to be a lot of bafflelegab and gobbledygook.

Knowing that members of Parliament and senators are doing their utmost to promote industry, employment, and so on within the regions they represent, would the appointment of these agents, who are to be dispersed across this country, not be a reflection on those members of Parliament and senators? Does it not imply that they are not doing their jobs in bringing regional problems to the attention of the cabinet?

Frankly, honourable senators, after listening to the honourable gentleman with whom I served in the House of Commons and who is very knowledgeable, I think it would take the Great Architect of the Universe to try and fathom out what he really means.

Senator Donahoe: He alone.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sorry if that is the impression I left with the honourable senator because to me the intention and the structure are crystal clear.

I am as aware as anyone else in this chamber that there will be some uncertainty as the restructuring is carried out by a number of civil servants in these regions. I do not think there has ever been an amalgamation of two rather large departments such as IT&C and DREE where there has not been some tension and uncertainty as to where all the pieces of the structure will fall into place; I am not trying to deny that.

However, I do know that we have been admonished from time to time, not only by senators opposite but by Liberal senators who are conscientiously doing their jobs. We have also been admonished by provincial governments from time to time who say that the federal government in Ottawa has no regional capability to pick up regional sensitivities and to deal with regional problems, hopes and aspirations. It has been suggested that not all these matters ought to be settled in Ottawa, the location of the head office.

The Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development is not a department like the others in that it does not administer any programs. It is a co-ordinating body, and I think that it has done a pretty good job here in Ottawa with respect to head offices.

An "R" has been added to MSERD to make it MSERD. As a result, we hope to have a higher capability in first finding and then responding accurately to regional sensitivities. To me the objective is a good one. The structure we have put in place is clear, and we hope it will have the kind of success we anticipate.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary question. I fully agree with what the minister said about regional sensitivities of certain bureaucrats in Ottawa. We have a very good public service in Ottawa but, over the years, people within the various departments who have never been east of Montreal have tried to tell me what was best for the east coast. They knew nothing about dredging or wharves, and had never seen either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast.

Would the minister not agree that no one is more sensitive than senators from the different regions and members of Parliament who have to work to be elected and who, from time to time, go into every little nook and cranny of their constituencies? They should be most sensitive to what is required. Perhaps we could work in conjunction with those in the field in making representations to cabinet. I hope members of Parliament and senators will not be by-passed in this function.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what we are putting in place will give us a higher degree of capability to deliver, through federal government departments in the regions, the exact views expressed to us from those who come from those regions, regardless of whether they are in the Senate or the House of Commons.

It seems to me that over a long period of time one of the criticisms has been that we do not have an administrative structure that will deliver. We hope this will be remedied, and that we will have such an administrative structure. It is not intended in any way to interfere with the representations that are legitimately made to us by senators and members of Parliament from the regions.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, after listening to this discussion, I have a supplementary question. Perhaps the minister will take it as a request for information, and not one posed in order to quarrel with him.

I have listened very attentively to the questions and answers and have tried to recall the terms of the communiqué which was referred to and, having done so, I should now like to ask the minister a perfectly straightforward question. After this reorganization takes place which minister will be responsible for the functions which have heretofore been performed by DREE?

• (1510)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, "The Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion" is the precise answer to that question.

Senator Flynn: You are it.

Senator Olson: I have to add that—and I do not want to qualify it—MSERD will also be there to try to make sure that all other federal departments in the area assist in the delivery of programs that have been more or less handled by DREE.

Senator Smith: Have the responsibilities for those functions formerly performed by DREE yet been assigned to any particular ministry?

Senator Olson: Yes, they have. For the time being, the Honourable Herb Gray is the Minister of DREE, because that department has not been amalgamated, by statute, with IT&C. Therefore, he is performing those functions now.

Senator Asselin: You stole the manager.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

EXPOSURE TO NUCLEAR RADIATION OF FORMER SERVICE PERSONNEL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. My question has to do with the exposure of ex-servicemen to nuclear radiation.

Even though the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Veterans Affairs made statements on this subject, they were not definitive. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government could bring a statement to the Senate clearly setting out the action that either the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Veterans Affairs will take to find these veterans to ensure that they are treated or that they qualify for the pension that is due to them under the act.

I should like to point out that there is a precedent for this. Some 30 years ago, when the Department of Veterans Affairs established the Hermann Commission to investigate the results of the incarceration of Hong Kong prisoners of war, the department found that many veterans were still suffering ill effects and were deteriorating as a result of their incarceration, and they were given pensions as a result.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have some information before me with respect to this matter of ex-servicemen's exposure to nuclear radiation. Certainly additional information will be sought.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs is quoted in Hansard of the other place of February 8, 1982, as follows:

—any individual can receive through his physician the radiation levels to which he was exposed during his activity, specifically in relation to the two occasions in the Chalk River clean-ups and for those individuals who were involved in the Nevada testing. Their family physicians can request and receive the radiation levels as recorded by Atomic Energy of Canada on both occasions.

He went on to state:

—a study which was commissioned by AECL is presently taking place on approximately 10,000 of their employees involved in activities such as the Chalk River clean-up and the Nevada testing. . . . the study is progressing quite favourably and we anticipate the preliminary findings will be available some time in early April.

He further stated:

I am more than happy to pursue with my colleagues, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the question as to what further steps should be taken in this matter.

After being asked by Mr. Dan McKenzie, the M.P. for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, whether the minister would apply the same criteria as those applied to other cases, the Minister of Veterans Affairs replied:

Madam Speaker, I was not aware that different criteria have been applied by the Canadian Pension Commission in assessing all of those cases. As the hon. member can appreciate, the criteria being applied as to whether or not the present condition is associated with military service, and the rules, are applied consistently to all members who make application.

Hopefully, the minister's partial reply can be expanded and further information brought to the Senate.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—ANNUAL SEAL HUNT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, because the annual seal hunt will commence next month, will the Leader of the Government bring a statement to the Senate from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans respecting the action he will take to protect the seal-hunting season this year?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information about the Canadian hunt, but it answers only in part some of the concerns of Senator Marshall. There was a recent CBC news report to the effect that the European Parliament is considering banning the importation of Canadian seal pelts.

The government is concerned about the effects of the proposed ban on Canadian seal pelts on maritime fishermen and Canada's indigenous people who depend on the hunt for part of their livelihood. A team of officials has travelled to Europe to set the record straight and to correct a number of misconceptions contained in the resolution before the European Parliament. We have pointed out that, contrary to what is stated in the resolution, first, neither harp nor hooded seals are endangered species. North Atlantic Fisheries Organization scientists agree with our experts on this. Second, neither harp nor hooded seals qualify to be selected as an endangered species under the Convention on Endangered Species. Third, the hunt is conducted as humanely as possible under proper supervision and the harvesting method is similar to that used in abattoirs worldwide.

We have sent a detailed letter correcting these misconceptions to all members of the Environment Committee of the European Parliament, and Ambassador Tate has written directly to its chairman. It can be assumed, honourable senators, that we have been pressing, and are continuing to press, our case strongly in Brussels and in Strasbourg.

Senator Marshall: I am aware of most of that information, but the main point I was trying to make was with respect to the action the government will take to provide enough fisheries protection officers to ensure that the likes of Brian Davies and

Patrick Watson are also considered an endangered species and should not be allowed near the hunt.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that part of the question will be taken as notice. I thought this additional information regarding the disposition of seal pelts would be of interest to honourable senators.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government bring a statement to the Senate with respect to the recent news report regarding offshore oil resources in Newfoundland?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice.

ELECTRICITY AND GAS INSPECTION BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Bosa for the second reading of Bill C-11, relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I indicated yesterday there was only one point I wished to raise on that subject because Senator Muir aptly presented our point of view on the bill. It deals with a provision that will come up later on in Bill C-45 and that is found in section 2(4) of this bill, which reads:

This Act is binding on Her Majesty in Right of Canada or a province and any agent thereof.

I first asked myself why that clause had been put in. I know it is stated in the Interpretation Act that no legislation is binding on the Crown except only as therein mentioned, this under the principle of old which states:

[English]

The King can do no wrong.

[Translation]

But in this case there is the addition of:

—or a province—

If the legislation is squarely within this Parliament's jurisdiction, I can find no reason for stating:

—or a province—

I checked with authorities such as Peter Hogg, often quoted by the proponents of centralization, or of the Constitution as interpreted by Mr. Trudeau. I would simply like to quote from chapter 9, dealing with the Crown, of his book entitled "Constitutional Law of Canada":

● (1520)

[English]

Federal laws binding provincial Crown

Curiously, the courts have shown no hesitation in holding that federal laws apply to the provincial Crown. Thus, federal customs legislation has been held applicable to the Crown in right of British Columbia as an importer of Scotch whisky, federal railway legislation authorizing expropriation of "lands of the Crown" has been held applicable to provincial Crown lands, federal provision as to the litigation costs of "Her Majesty" has been held applicable to the costs of the provincial Crown, and federal railways regulation has been held applicable to the Crown in right of Ontario as operator of the "Go-Train" commuter service on C.N.R. tracks. These holdings appear to me to be sound, but they do not sit easily with the suggestions of federal immunity from provincial laws. If anything, the provinces have the stronger claim to judge-made immunity from federal law, because the provinces cannot protect themselves through the doctrine of paramountcy.

[Translation]

What concerns me is the fact that once again if this legislation deals only with an area clearly under federal jurisdiction, there is no need to mention that it is binding on a province. Under the provisions of the Interpretation Act, it must be specified that it is binding on the federal Crown, but not on the provincial Crown.

On the other hand, if this legislation concerns an area which comes not only under federal, but also under provincial jurisdiction, I do not believe that we can force it on the provincial Crown in this particular area of provincial jurisdiction by a simple statement in a federal act.

I shall want to raise the same point concerning Bill C-45 which will come up for discussion later on and about which I have other questions to ask, but if possible, I would like this matter to be clarified in committee. I know that, in the other case—and I shall come back to this later—the Deputy Leader of the Government has said that the provinces were in agreement. I like it when the provinces are in agreement. On the other hand, a simple verbal agreement on their part is not enough to bind them in my opinion. Provincial legislatures would have to pass concurrent legislation if we really wanted to apply to a province or the provincial Crown any federal legislation in an area which comes under their own jurisdiction.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly not resist referring it to committee. As a general rule we should refer a bill to committee if any honourable senator wishes to have it referred to committee.

To address the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, I appreciate that there is a constitutional dimension or aspect to the Interpretation Act section, but it seems to me that that dimension is not brought into play with reference to the two sections we are dealing with here. That does not remove the academic interest of the point raised. It does seem clear from the precedents that are cited in the Statute Citator under section 16, that, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, the provincial legislatures cannot bind the federal Crown but the federal Crown can bind the provinces. That has actually been held in a case cited there. The Leader of the Opposition is shaking his head, so perhaps I should refer to it specifically.

Senator Flynn: I do not think this is what the courts have said. They have said that you do not need to mention the province when it is a field of federal competence.

Senator Frith: I think there are two issues. Let us assume that there is constitutional validity in legislation by the federal government.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Frith: Notwithstanding that validity, the provisions of that statute, because of the Interpretation Act which is also a statute of the federal Parliament, do not apply to the Crown in right of the province—

Senator Flynn: No, no, no!

Senator Frith: —unless it is stated that they are or unless so by necessary implication. That is clearly the law, in my opinion.

Senator Flynn: No. It is the Crown in right of the federal government. We are speaking of the federal Interpretation Act.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: It cannot say that it does not apply to a province. It says it does not apply to the Crown in right of Canada. You are certainly mistaken there.

Senator Frith: I do not agree with that. Let me make one point at a time.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but make it.

Senator Frith: The first shaking of the head took place on the question of whether the province, by its enactments, has the power to bind the Crown in right of Canada. That was the statement that I made and which caused the shaking of the head. Just so that it is understood why I made that statement, it was so held in the case of Sinclair v. Hollinger (1946) 4 Dominion Law Reports that:

There is no power in the province, by any of its enactments, to bind the Crown in right of Canada,

That was the basis for my making that statement.

Hon. G. I. Smith: What court was that?

Senator Frith: The Ontario Court of Appeal, I believe.

Let us go back to the situation in which there is legislation that is clearly within the jurisdiction of the federal government. In that case that valid legislation will of course be binding on, for example, the private sector in any province, but it will not be binding on the Crown in right of Ontario, for example, or in right of any province because of section 16 of the Interpretation Act, an act of the federal Parliament, which says:

No enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner, except only as therein mentioned or referred to.

Senator Flynn: That is correct.

Senator Frith: But it can, of course, bind, as it has in some cases, even without the statutes saying so, because by necessary implication the act could not have any effect unless it did so bind.

I am saying that the point raised by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, and by Professor Hogg, is essentially a constitutional point which I say is not raised in this legislation but is raised by the provisions we are talking about, and it raises an interest the committee might like to look at. But it is not directly raised in these two pieces of legislation because the question of their constitutional validity is not in issue. That does not change the fact that the academic interest—I do not mean the word “academic” in any pejorative sense in the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition—does come to mind as a result of this, and we may want to use that as a reason or springboard for looking at that question in committee.

I do suggest with respect, honourable senators, that as far as the two pieces of legislation that are before us are concerned that contain this invocation of the provisions of section 16 of the Interpretation Act, they do not arise within the framework of these two pieces of legislation.

Senator Smith: I should like to explore for a moment with the deputy leader what he has just said. I thought he said, when he referred to the first case which he placed before us, that a court, which he believes was the Appeal Court of Ontario, had held that the federal Crown could not bind Her Majesty in right of the province. I may have misunderstood him. If I did, perhaps he could clear it up for me.

Senator Frith: Would Senator Smith mind repeating that?

Senator Smith: I thought the honourable gentleman said, in relation to that particular case, that it held that the Parliament of Canada could not bind Her Majesty in right of the province.

• (1530)

Senator Frith: No, it said the opposite—that there is no power in the province, by any of its enactments, to bind the Crown in right of Canada. That is a dimension of the unfairness that I believe Hogg was talking about.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I shall not ask that the bill be referred to committee. However, I suggest that third reading be postponed until we have a report on Bill C-45, which is the subject of Order No. 3 on Orders of the Day. I would suggest that Bill

[Senator Frith.]

C-45 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and then, when we have the committee's report, we can proceed with third reading of Senator Bosa's bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if we are to discuss this principle, it would seem more appropriate to do so with reference to the Pest Control Products Bill, because that is the only section that is affected. I believe that is the pith of the Leader of the Opposition's suggestion. There would appear to be no immediate urgency in connection with this matter and, therefore, I support the Leader of the Opposition's suggestion that we delay third reading of Bill C-11.

Senator Flynn: I suggest that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, but that the order stand tomorrow. Third reading can be moved next week.

Senator Frith: It would be better if the motion were in my name, since it is a government bill. I therefore move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: “An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act”.—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I had some procedural questions on this item, which I have presented more than once, and recently I discussed the matter with Senator Austin. One notes that this is not, in fact, a government bill but is the subject of a motion by the minister. I believe we should obtain some procedural purification as soon as possible.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I am not sure whether the Deputy Leader of the Government wishes to comment on what Senator Macquarrie has said. Bill S-11 is the subject of a motion by the Honourable Senator Austin. He moved his motion before he entered the cabinet. I am not certain whether he can proceed with a privately initiated bill since he is now a minister.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure what the correct procedure is. I asked that the matter stand until we could obtain clarification on that point. Clarification must and will be sought. As implied, it depends on what the position of the government will be on the substance of this bill, namely, the question of time zones and returns.

Order stands.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS ACTBILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perreault, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-45, intituled: "An Act to amend the Pest Control Products Act".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I have already explained, I have been asked to substitute for Senator Macdonald. The point in question is the one I raised previously. The bill contains only one clause, which adds to section 2 of the Pest Control Products Act the following:

"(2) This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province and any agent thereof."

My question, which is specific to this legislation, is: Why are we doing it at this time? Is there any problem? I can understand that Her Majesty in right of Canada would not refuse to be bound by the legislation, even if the act did not mention it. Has there been any problem with regard to Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province? Is it clear that this legislation is exclusively within the federal competence; and, if it is, why are we amending the act to say that it is applicable to the Crown in right of a province, since the jurisprudence that I quoted says that it does not necessarily apply to a province if the legislation is within the competence of Parliament? I would like that question clarified in committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a reasonable question. In my remarks in support of the bill on second reading, I pointed out that I was authorized to say that the act had been administered co-operatively between the federal and provincial governments and agencies. The Leader of the Opposition's question is understandable. I understood that it was necessary to add this subsection for the sake of clarity; but if we are seeking clarity, then let us obtain it in committee. It is purely a legal question, and I therefore suggest that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Flynn: If the legislation falls partially within the area of provincial competence, then I suggest that it would not be sufficient for us to say that it applies to the Crown in right of a province. Concurrent legislation would be required.

Senator Frith: I agree. As I pointed out earlier, it would appear that the constitutional question is not in dispute, on the facts before us, but only the principle. Clearly, there is need for this section only in respect of legislation within the federal competence. That matter can be discussed in committee. Experts from the Department of Justice and, if necessary, from the Department of Agriculture can explain why they need this legislation. I cannot see that anything adverse can come from referring this matter to committee. If we find that this subsection is necessary, and we are satisfied, we shall have learned something in the process.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOURREPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 25, 1981 the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, the report entitled "Child at Risk", a study on childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, was tabled in this chamber on October 16, 1980 by the chairman of the committee, Senator Bonnell.

Senator McGrand had identified the need for the study some five years earlier, but the mandate to undertake the study did not come until March 1977. The committee was authorized —to inquire into and report upon such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life and to consider and recommend such remedial and preventative measures relating thereto as may be reasonably expected to lead to a reduction in the incidence of crime and violence in society;

A dedicated, hard working subcommittee was selected. Countless hours of research, inquiries, travel, reading, organizing, writing and rewriting ensued. A draft copy was produced for the entire committee before the 1980 summer recess. Approval for printing was given and the title of the report was chosen, and that was where I came in. As previously mentioned, it was tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980. "Child at Risk" was well received and Senator McGrand and his committee received the thanks and congratulations that were their due. Honourable senators have spoken to the report very favourably and honourable senators who were on the committee brought added information on specific areas.

In his initial remarks, Senator Bonnell expressed the hope that:

—this report will be taken seriously by social scientists, sociologists, psychiatrists, criminologists, psychologists and anthropologists. We hope that it will be taken seriously by medical personnel and other university specialists such as philosophers and environmentalists. We hope that it will be taken seriously by those in the private sector such as industrial psychologists, land economists and other qualified citizens such as family physicians, family counsellors, teachers, social workers and others.

It is to those referred to as "others" that I relate most, namely the women of the child-bearing age group and women's organizations, and it is to them that I recommend the report. Over a hundred copies were distributed to organizations in every province and further individual copies were provided as requested. Comments and reactions to the recommendations were invited. Three provincial units have submitted their reports following studies and discussions. Other provincial units report ongoing studies among their membership.

Ivy McVicar, President of Saskatchewan Women's Institutes, says:

Child at Risk is a report worthy of study by members of Women's Institutes and other such organizations with a view to disseminating the fine quality of information it contains. We need to make people aware of what we as a society must do to protect our children from all preventable risks. I appreciate receiving "Child at Risk" and intend to publicize its contents, as I go about the province speaking to women's groups.

Lois Edie, President of the Manitoba Women's Institute, sent in the report of their committee composed of young mothers, with teaching experience, now at home full-time raising their families. This committee supports most of the recommendations and makes some positive suggestions. Education in schools with lifestyle programs is highly recommended, and people must consider as alternatives whether they want to have children or careers. With regard to recommendation 28, the comment was: "Action is required, not another committee for study."

After reading the report, a mother with four children aged one to 12 told me that during those 13 years she was attended by three different doctors in three different cities. At no time was she asked what her eating, smoking or drinking habits were. She polled other mothers of young children and received the same answers. Is it any wonder that people ask the question, "What happens to this report now?"

Alberta Women of Uniform undertook a study in three districts and reported to the entire membership. Without exception, all groups support recommendations 16 and 17 and have resolutions on their books expressing similar views.

Concern has been expressed across the nation on the problems associated with adolescent pregnancies dealt with in recommendation 19. The Federated Women's Institutes of Canada have compiled a study called "Challenge from a Changing Lifestyle" and have made copies available to all provincial units. This problem is escalating at an alarming rate.

I was sent a copy of a Canadian Press article appearing in the Calgary Herald of December 1, 1981. The article reads as follows:

Sarah is a 15-year-old high school student who likes designer jeans, hates math and quarrels with her mother about curfew hours.

She also is the mother of an eight-month-old son and one of an increasing number of adolescent mothers in Canada choosing to rear her own child rather than put it up for adoption.

Ten years ago, 30 per cent of teenage mothers opted to keep their children. Today, the figure has soared to 88 per cent.

"We consider all single adolescent mothers to be high-risk mothers," says social worker Nora Alexanian of the Montreal Children's Hospital.

"These girls are so vulnerable themselves. Their ability to tolerate stress is low and motherhood sometimes adds more stress than they can handle.

"In the worst cases, that could manifest itself in physical abuse of the baby."

Alexanian points to cases of young mothers visiting hospital emergency wards—"a cry for help if there ever was one"—and others indulging in self-abuse in the form of drugs and alcohol.

"Most of these girls are seen by a social worker just after the baby's birth, but if they appear to be going home to a good situation there may not be any follow-up," said Alexanian.

"Also many girls shy away from social workers fearing they'll lose their babies."

Whether they remain in the family home or strike out on their own, adds Alexanian, teenage moms are essentially children rearing children. They are struggling for emotional maturity while facing the economic and psychological difficulties of being a single mother.

Social Worker Jocelyn MacKay says many young women who remain with their families after their children are born, move out within months because they cannot handle the pressure of being both child and parent at the same time.

"Chances are she won't find a job and will opt for welfare," says MacKay. "If so, her welfare cheque is no more than $452 a month, plus a family allowance of $21.46 a month."

Only exceptionally-motivated teen mothers finish high school.

● (1550)

These are some of the sad situations. The women of the nation are concerned.

Upon receipt of any report, one naturally looks at the recommendations. What are they? To whom are they directed? Who will be responsible for their implementation? Where will the support for their implementation come from? Who will benefit from them?

Honourable senators, we know what the recommendations are. Approximately half of them are directed to governments—federal, provincial and municipal—either directly or jointly. Other recommendations are directed to the medical profession—medical specialists, health agencies, educators, social workers, pharmaceutical companies and hospital administrations and staff. In the recommendations only a passing mention is made of non-government agencies; namely, the people themselves, those referred to as "others."

It is my belief, honourable senators, that support for the implementation of the recommendations could and should come from those others—the public and non-governmental organizations and agencies. If the public is sufficiently informed, it can be involved in the decision-making process.

Honourable senators, I consider the recommendations, on the whole, to be excellent. I sometimes wonder about the practicality of some of them, however. I will say that I hope we will see the implementation of recommendation No. 28, in particular. I believe that it will benefit the country in the long term. I certainly hope that the Senate will see that the recommendations contained in this report are carefully considered and implemented where possible.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 16 1982, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the deputy leader whether he is certain that we can adjourn until Tuesday without disrupting our legislative program. Shall we be able to take care of everything that is waiting for us next week in three days? Can he give us some indication about this?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, I believe that we can do it. In any case, there is a risk that we might have to sit next Friday. However, on the basis of the information I now have I feel that this risk is minimal.

As for the order of business for next week, some legislation has been referred to Senate committees. This is why it is possible and even certain that the committees will be sitting next week to examine legislation and other matters since they met this week to decide about their future proceedings.

It is also possible that Bill C-78 concerning labour relations, will receive third reading on Friday in the other place; this is not certain, but it is possible. It is the only bill which we can expect to receive next week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if this can alleviate the fears of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, I can tell him that our rules give me the power to call back the Senate in an emergency if need be!

Senator Flynn: I understand. I simply wanted to avoid our making plans which would have to be changed later on.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DAY-CARE CENTRE—MEMORANDUM SIGNED BY SPEAKER OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am holding in my hand a memorandum on the letterhead of the House of Commons. The memorandum is directed to all members of Parliament, employees of the House of Commons and employees of the Library of Parliament. This memorandum is signed by Her Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons.

My question to the Leader of the Government, since under our rules I cannot direct a question to His Honour the Speaker, is this: Did the Leader of the Government have knowledge that this memorandum was addressed to all members of Parliament, and did he in any way authorize it or was he consulted about it? If not, would he consult with His Honour to see whether it was in any way authorized by an officer of the Senate, and determine why it was not signed by His Honour if it was so authorized?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, inquiries will go forward immediately.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

PURCHASE OF URBAN TRANSIT SYSTEM DEVELOPED IN ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If we are to believe newspaper accounts to the effect that there is a continuing dispute between the federal government and the provincial governments, it would appear that we are about to witness what has been suggested by some people to be a reneging on a commitment by the federal government to contribute $60 million to British Columbia for the Vancouver rapid transit system.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Why has the government now tied its promise to certain arrangements concerning Expo '86?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, those who make allegations of that kind know little of the project. Obviously, they have not spoken with anyone in a position of knowledge in either the Government of British Columbia or the Government of Canada. Allegations and concerns of the kind mentioned by Senator Nurgitz are not based on fact.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I take it, therefore, that the commitment of $60 million to the Vancouver rapid transit system is in place and is going forward.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there have been a number of meetings and conversations with representatives of the Government of British Columbia over the past few weeks. Indeed, a meeting was held shortly after the new year involving Senator Olson, other ministers and myself. That meeting took place in Victoria. It was an amicable and co-operative meeting. A discussion on a range of issues was held at that time, and since that time other discussions have been held with respect to the possible LRT federal contribution, Expo '86 and other matters.

Senator Nurgitz: If I may, honourable senators, I should like to say that back in December, 1980, the Leader of the Government in the Senate and Senator Olson confirmed this commitment without reference to anything else. I am not satisfied with the answer given by the Leader of the Government this afternoon. He has not confirmed that the $60 million commitment is going forward. Would he confirm that?

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, an announcement will be made at an appropriate time in the very near future with respect to the federal involvement in the LRT system. May I say, however, that Expo '86 which is to be a world's fair, has as its theme transportation in the 1980s, the 1990s and into the twenty-first century. It was thought by the Government of Canada that this would be an opportunity to demonstrate Canadian transportation technology in all its forms, such as rapid transit, aircraft, marine, and so forth.

The purpose of the fair is to "showcase" Canadian and world transportation technology. Canadians should be very proud of the fact that some of the most innovative technology in the area of light rapid transit exists in Canada. In Kingston, Ontario, there is an enterprise, involving Canadians from many provinces working in the development of this LRT technology.

At one point in the Expo '86 negotiations the federal government volunteered the view that if a world's transportation fair is to be held in Vancouver it would present a useful opportunity for the federal government to participate in helping to "showcase" Canadian light rapid transit technology. Subsequently, the Province of British Columbia has become rather concerned about the escalating costs of the proposed world's fair. The question has arisen whether or not a transportation fair is viable under present conditions. The decision with respect to the federal contribution to light rapid transit has been delayed as a result of the uncertainties surrounding the decision taken unilaterally by the Province of British Columbia to review its previous determination to have a fair in 1986, and to discuss with the federal government further federal involvement in the project. That is the only reason for the delay in the delivery of any cheque.

Senator Nurgitz: As a final supplementary, I take it, therefore, that in the event of any further problems with the exposition there will be no $60 million funding?

Senator Perrault: It cannot be assumed that under those circumstances the federal government's contribution to that light rapid transit demonstration project would not be made, but that would be a separate decision in itself. If the world's fair on transportation does not proceed, then another decision would have to be made whether, despite that decision, the economic return to Canada of an LRT demonstration project could be such that we should proceed with that federal contribution.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATUS OF LEGISLATION BEFORE BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have heard that the Prime Minister will be making an announcement in the other place relating to the adoption by Westminster of a bill respecting the Constitution. Can the leader tell us anything about that?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have been in contact with British officials in recent hours with respect to the possible second reading debate of that measure next week. No final date has yet been set for the possible passage by Westminster of the constitutional proposals. Therefore, it is not possible yet to announce any firm date for any ceremony to take place in Ottawa.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

TRADEMARK BILL

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On February 13, 1979, I moved second reading of a new trademark bill, and I said at the time:

In 1971—

Note that the year is 1971.

—the Trade Marks Act has been subjected to a thorough examination by the Economic Council of Canada in its report on Intellectual and Industrial Property.

This started the process of serious consideration being given to once again revising the Trade Marks Act. After careful consideration of the various commentaries that have been received by the government in response to the Economic Council's report, the government, in 1974—

Note that year.

—issued a working paper on the revision of the Trade Marks Act and invited comments thereon. Those comments, together with extensive consultation with the private sector and with the relevant government departments, have culminated in Bill S-11, which is before us tonight.

Towards the end of my speech I said:

Certain officials in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are holding a series of seminars across the country with persons interested in this bill. These seminars commence in Edmonton on February 20 and finish in Halifax on March 8. At these seminars there will be briefings on the contents of the bill, and the changes to the present act . . .

The real purpose in presenting this bill is so that it can go public, and so that everyone can have a reasonable length of time to consider its contents and make recommendations both to the department and to the Senate committee.

● (1415)

At that time it was not possible for the bill to be dealt with before the election was called. This coming Saturday we shall celebrate the third anniversary of my introduction of that bill in the Senate, and we still have not got the bill back. It is 11 years since the process began, and eight years since the government issued a working paper on revision of the Trade Marks Act.

My question is: How many more years do we have to wait? Can anything be done to instil a sense of urgency in the officials of the department who are looking after this matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when this legislation finally emerges into the light of day, the opposition will be in no position to attack the legislation for having been dealt with hastily and rushed through Parliament.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: They might not even be the opposition by then.

Senator Perrault: In that regard, may I suggest that during that period of delay alleged by Senator Godfrey there were several months when a Conservative government was in office. Let us keep that in mind. There were similar delays when they had the responsibility of government—perhaps for some of the reasons which have slowed its progress under our auspices. But let us hope that when the measure finally emerges it will be soundly drafted and well considered.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, is the leader going to take my question as notice and report back? It is obviously a bill for the Senate to study. It is a highly technical bill. We have the time, and we should get cracking on it.

Senator Perrault: Senator Godfrey makes a valid point. The question will be taken as notice and a report will be brought to the Senate as soon as possible.

[Senator Godfrey.]

THE BUDGET

OWNER-OCCUPIED HOMES—SUGGESTED TAXATION OF IMPUTED RENT AND CAPITAL GAINS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development on a matter arising from the budget. The Minister of Finance, in his budget address on November 12, said:

A study of selective tax preferences available to individual taxpayers, which I am tabling tonight, shows that the revenues lost through selective write-offs, exemptions and deferrals are massive. Over $47 billion of personal income escaped tax in 1979.

In the document that the Minister of Finance tabled that evening he listed, among the loopholes or tax expenditures, the imputed rent and capital gains on owner-occupied homes.

My question to the Minister of State for Economic Development is: In the judgment of the government, would a more equitable tax system be one in which imputed rent and capital gains on owner-occupied homes were taxed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The answer is no.

Senator Murray: In that case, may I ask the minister why, in the context of the statement of his colleague, the Minister of Finance, which I have just quoted, these so-called housing tax preferences are listed in the document tabled by the Minister of Finance?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should read it carefully, which I am sure he has. That was the information that was given to the house and to the public, all of which adds up, as the honourable senator has pointed out, to $47 billion of personal income and benefits that are not taxable because of a number of—Senator Murray: —loopholes. Is that a loophole?

Senator Olson: —incentives and other deductions. The opposition has continued to use the word “loopholes,” but we don’t. Many of them were legitimate incentives, that were designed for a specific purpose; and in many cases that purpose has been achieved. I could list some of them. They were incentives, but in keeping with the spirit of revealing as much information as possible, to have the opposition as well informed as possible, the Minister of Finance gave an explanation of the component parts of that amount of personal income and benefits that, for deduction purposes, however you want to describe it, are not taxed.

● (1420)

Senator Murray: Well, again I quote the minister’s colleague, the Minister of Finance, in the budget address:

Many Canadians find our tax systems unfair, and I agree with them. They realize that taxes are necessary to pay for important government services, but they feel that rates of tax are too high. They sense that others, the well-advised or the wealthy, very often pay less than their fair share.

The next paragraph is the one I cited earlier, in which the Minister of Finance said that there is $47 billion of personal income escaping tax. In the table he includes what he calls the housing tax preferences, the imputed rental income, and capital gains. Now, either the Minister of Finance feels, and the government feels, that a more equitable tax system would be one in which these things are taxed, or they have included these things simply to inflate the figure and give a totally false impression of the so-called loopholes that exist. Is it a loophole that the owner of a home, occupying that home, does not pay tax on the imputed rental?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators. What we are witnessing here is either the product of a simplistic approach—

Hon. R. James Balfour: It was a simplistic budget!

Senator Olson: —or, on the other hand, perhaps the convoluted structures that my honourable friend likes to put in place relating to some things directly, without putting in the qualifications that are implicit in them. Most people who have read the whole speech and understand it—and I am sure my honourable friend understands it, too—and, furthermore, want to understand it, without wanting to go through the convolutions that he is trying to lead us into, of course get the right perception of what the minister was saying.

TRANSPORT

CANADAIR LTD.—ALLEGED ACCUMULATED LOSS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for either the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Minister of State for Economic Development. My question concerns the affairs of Canadair Ltd.

Is there any substance to the report that Canadair Ltd. may expose the taxpayers of Canada to an accumulated loss in excess of $1 billion, in the form of a government guarantee?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not know that I can comment on that at this point, but I will look into it. It may be that there are a number of commitments that have been made for the rather significant and successful design and construction of the Challenger aircraft. I suppose you could go through the same sort of convolutions as Senator Murray did a few minutes ago, and assume that if we lost all those sales there might be some accumulated debt. Of course, we on this side of the house do not proceed on the basis of the worst possible scenario, because that is not the way it turns out so long as we are trying to manage the economy.

Senator Balfour: As a supplementary question, is it correct that the government has been asked to inject a further $300 million into this corporation's treasury in order to keep it afloat?

Senator Olson: I will have to check into that. I would expect, though, that if there has been a request for an additional injection of equity, it is on the basis of the prospect of some future development.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary and further to that matter, could my honourable friend tell me whether it is essential that the government provide that $300 million, which I am sure they will be asked to deal with, or whether it can be obtained by the company on the open market, as other companies in the system have to do? Will the minister let me know what the policy of the government is in that respect?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend will realize that the Government of Canada is either at or near 100 per cent ownership of the equity of that company, for a number of reasons that arose many years ago. When we talk about equity, unless we are prepared to move to sell that corporation off to the private sector, which does in fact bring up a whole new set of rules, terms and conditions under which the company would operate, we have to look at the situation in the light of the kind of rearrangement that obviously would have to be carried out. We have some examples of cases in which this has been done, and some of cases in which it has not. Therefore, you cannot make the argument that you can get equity from sources other than government until you have also made the other decision, that is, as to how this kind of crown corporation operates. Certainly, at this point in time the decision I am talking about—to change the rules, terms and conditions of investment in that company—has not been made.

Senator Roblin: May I remind my honourable friend that in the case of the Canadian National Railways there has been a move away from direct government injection of capital towards borrowing in the open market.

• (1425)

Senator Olson: That is, however, different from equity.

Senator Roblin: I am not talking about equity.

Senator Olson: That is what you were talking about a minute ago.

Senator Roblin: If I was, I apologize. I am really talking about debt capital, because it is money that this company wants. I gathered from the press report, which I suppose we have all read, that they were seeking debt capital and not equity capital. That is another question altogether; I am in entire agreement on that. Why, however, is this company not being urged to explore the possibilities of raising what it requires for debt capital in the open market?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a different question. I apologize if I misunderstood. I understood the Honourable Senator Roblin to inquire as to whether or not the government would consider allowing equity into that company outside of government investment in that company. I will take the other part of the question as notice. I do so because I would like to check, first of all, to ascertain whether there are not already debt provisions for the company provided outside of the federal treasury. I am not entirely sure about that at the moment.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—POSITION OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Without reading into the record the many statements that the minister has made in the past concerning the Crow rate, may I ask the minister—more in sorrow than in anger—how he reconciles his continuance in the cabinet—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Stop smiling when you say that!

Senator Murray:—with the course that is traditional and honourable under our constitution for ministers who have had their convictions and proposals denied by their colleagues?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not have any trouble answering that question. Over recent months I have taken part in many battles with regard to the Crow rate. I am pleased that the announcements which have been made show that a great many of the propositions that I have put forward in this important discussion have in fact been accepted.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: Yesterday I had the opportunity to address the Canadian Federation of Agriculture convention in Moncton, New Brunswick. In my speech I dealt at considerable length with the transportation policy. I might tell my honourable friends—and the record will so indicate—that I did not receive a single critical question or comment.

Senator Olson: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: That is the kind of vote of confidence that is really important in the operation I have. If the honourable senator wishes, I could go on and list all of the things contained in this policy that assure me that, when the discussions are taking place, the government will keep in mind the fact that the leaders of the organizations representing the bulk of the producers in the west have in fact asked for negotiations, and that the negotiations will be fair.

I hope I will be able to say, when the negotiations are completed, that the prospects by way of a statutory rate for the producers for the next 80 years will be just as favourable as the rates have been in the past 80 years.

Senator Olson: That is what pre-consultation—genuine consultation—delivers.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I pose a supplementary question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board which his colleague, the Minister of State for Economic Development, was either unable or unwilling to answer the other evening? It is simply this: The present Crow rate imposes a fee of approximately 14 to 15 cents a bushel on the producer of wheat for its transportation. Would the minister inform the chamber of the monetary parameters of the negotiation? That is to say, is the producer faced with an increase to 50 cents a bushel, to $1 a bushel, to 30 cents a bushel? What are the parameters within which the negotiation will take place?

Senator Argue: I can say to the Honourable Senator Balfour that his question reminds me of the forecast that was made by that transportation expert in the House of Commons, the Honourable Les Benjamin, who, when the policy was announced, said it would mean a fivefold increase in the Crow rate to the farmers. The announcement said nothing on that question at all. It is absolutely clear, from all of the statements that have been made, that it is in the process of negotiation.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: The outcome has not yet been determined by the government. It is clear from the statement of Mr. Pepin that, whatever happens, there will be contributions made by the railroads. I might add that even though the government is now pledging $3.2 billion for transportation—which is a lot of money—in the period of time from now until 1986, it is still willing to discuss further government contributions.

● (1430)

Mr. Pepin in his statement said:

Grain will always have, to use the language of Quebec, a special status in Canadian economics and the producers of western Canada should be able to count on that.

I am fully convinced that the negotiating process will result in a statutory rate that is eminently fair.

Senator Olson: That is the answer I gave him yesterday.

Senator Murray: I read the reports of the minister's speech and what I take to be a subsequent interview with the news media in Moncton, and there is a matter on which I would like some clarification. I would like to know whether any change in the statutory rate is subject to agreement as a result of these consultations that are now going on?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the government is operating on the firm hope and belief that the negotiator will be able to arrive at a conclusion that has the support of the main organizations in western Canada and that that kind of recommendation, based on a consensus, will be the type of recommendation that will be made to the government.

Senator Murray: I just want to confirm that there is no inconsistency between the statements made by the Minister of State for the Wheat Board in Moncton and the earlier statements made by his colleague, the Minister of Transport. Is it the government's intention to go ahead with changes in the rate, with or without agreement?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the honourable senator may interpret the government policies in any way he wishes.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: He is asking for information.

Senator Argue: If the ultimate agreement is based upon negotiations, then I am positive and confident that we will achieve a general consensus, and that on that basis the legislation will be brought in.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure that we can clear up this misunderstanding very quickly. Will the minister state whether the government is prepared to impose a change in the rate without agreement?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, my honourable friend can speculate in any way he wishes.

Senator Donahoe: What kind of an answer is that?

Senator Argue: I am sure that all honourable senators are aware that the track record of the government is pretty good.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: For example, in the case of the Constitution, the lamenters, wailers and cry-babies all said that there would never be agreement, but agreement was reached, even with the Tories. The same feeling was expressed with regard to agreements on oil pricing with the provinces.

Senator Murray: I am sorry I asked.

Senator Argue: Everybody was up in arms, there was almost a revolution, but then that near-separatist, Premier Lougheed, decided to come back into the fold, be a great Canadian and a great federalist once again, and he signed up. So honourable senators need not worry. I suggest that they have confidence—

Senator Doody: Sit down.

Senator Argue: —because I am sure the policy that will finally be put into effect will receive general approval.

Senator Frith: And thereby we have cleared up the misunderstanding.

THE ECONOMY

STIMULATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, in the interest of clarity and in the interest of not having to listen further to the greatest turnabout expert in the world, I address my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would the minister indicate whether the government intends to reject either a major or a minor stimulus of the economy beyond that which is provided for in the budget?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, first one must define the terms “major stimulus” and “minor stimulus.” The government has announced over and over again that it intends to continue the programs that it has implemented, and those programs could be interpreted as minor stimuli to the economy, if one likes, even though they are introduced as a matter of course. As a matter of fact, approximately $9 billion has been injected into the economic sphere through various programs this year. If one considers that in fiscal terms, it is a fairly significant stimulus when related to the size of the budget, even though it is reduced from what it was in past years. So the terms “minor” and “major” must be defined.

The Minister of Finance has said that he is not willing to enter into further major stimuli because they would be contrary to the monetary policy of the government and, indeed, the economic management policy whereby we are attempting to fight inflation by keeping costs down, simply because of the very serious consequences that further inflation will have on the health of this economy.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question I would like to address to the same minister. I have been challenged on a definition for the terms “major” and “minor”, and I, of course, in my limited knowledge, am unable to tender any such definition. However, there are men of much greater weight than I in this country who have defined these terms. One of them is no less a person than the Minister of Finance of this country. Mr. MacEachen is reported in the Globe and Mail of February 11, 1982 as saying:

I have talked about major fiscal stimulus, and I am not in favor of that.

Senator Olson: You know that.

Senator Donahoe: Well, certainly, neither I nor the minister are in favour of major stimulus. The article goes on:

When I talk about major stimulus, I'm talking about very big sums—five to ten billion dollars.

It seems to me that any amount less than $5 billion is to be qualified as a minor stimulus and that anything over $5 billion is to be qualified as a major stimulus. Therefore, my supplementary question to the minister is: Does the government intend to move in the direction of what, by the definition of the Minister of Finance—and keeping in mind that the other day we saw that ministers, regardless of their position in the government, on occasions when they take issue with the policies of the government, may speak for themselves, even though their consciences seem to allow them to remain as members of the government—would presumably be a minor stimulus of less than $5 billion in order to alleviate the critical unemployment situation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not know how to answer this question with all its generalities. I say that because the government is constantly giving minor stimuli to the economy through the private sector and, indeed, through the government itself. Some of these stimuli, whether they are by the honourable senator's definition or by the definition the honourable senator attributes to the Minister of Finance, may not add up to much, but taken together they are another matter entirely. For example, a program was recently announced to increase the funds available to the Federal Business Development Bank from $200 million to $475 million. By the honourable senator's standards this may be minor assistance, but if it is understood that the debt-to-equity ratio was increased from 10 to 1 to 15 to 1, then, of course, it is seen that there is $3.2 billion available to small businessmen through the FBDB.

Another example is the recent announcement that $43.9 million was allocated for the Panamax Dry Dock in Halifax. The National Harbours Board has put up $47 to $50 million to expand facilities for the Roberts Bank. The government recently announced a northeast British Columbia coal deal, the total investment in which is to be $2.5 billion, including a commitment from the federal government of about $275 million to improve loading facilities and another $275 million to strengthen the rail lines and to buy equipment for the development. Of course, an equal or a greater amount was put up by the Government of British Columbia and approximately $1.5 billion by the commercial companies involved. We have a long list of items. A very significant number of dollars will be and have already been spent on forestry sector strategy. There was a special increase of $42 million to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to introduce a variety of new initiatives for improved fishing management and marketing systems. Once the study has been completed, more money will be allocated to that endeavour.

● (1440)

Petro-Canada's budget has been substantially increased, from $900 million last year to $1.59 billion this year. The recently announced Norman Wells pipeline project will cost over $1 billion. When you add the development which will take place in the field to the cost of the pipeline itself, these amount to very substantial increases. The list is very long and amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars and, indeed, even to scores of billions of dollars if you add the private sector financing which will apply to all these items.

The answer to my honourable friend's question is that it is going on all the time.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, if I may, I will read what would have been the text of my supplementary question. I did not ask for or expect the minister to make specific announcements today, but I proposed to ask him if he would indicate the areas of the economy in which the government is likely to provide a stimulus. He has indicated projects which are in hand and which the government is now undertaking.

As a result, I am prompted to ask him this simple and single question, and I would greatly appreciate a definite yes or no answer: Is any one of the projects to which he has just referred, and which he says the government is undertaking, a remedial program designed to augment the failure of the budget and to provide employment to offset the difficulties that this country is undergoing?

Senator Olson: Of course, in order to answer that kind of question one would have to agree with the preamble to the question which, in my opinion, is absolutely false. We do not accept that there are any failures in the budget.

Some Hon. Senators: Ha, ha!

Senator Donahoe: There's none so blind as he who will not see.

Senator Olson: Or he who will not hear.

[Senator Olson.]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS DETERMINATION PROCESS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Would the Leader of the Government inform us of the changes the government has introduced, if any, to improve the refugee status determination process in view of the criticism from many concerned quarters about the disappointing decisions of the Refugee Status Committee?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Haidasz: Perhaps the Leader of the Government could try to answer this somewhat similar question, or take it as notice: Is he able to tell us today whether the Immigration Appeal Board will be expanded to include a special refugee panel to assist that board in its difficult work?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There have recently been reports of alleged disagreement among the western nations in relation to the adjournment of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe now being held in Madrid. Can the Leader of the Government throw any light on this subject?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had hoped to have an update, as of today, on this subject. However, it can be said that in a statement at the Madrid meeting of the CSCE the Secretary of State for External Affairs deplored the current situation in Poland, which calls into question the commitment of the Polish authorities to the principles of the Helsinki Final Act. He reiterated the Canadian government's call for national reconciliation in Poland.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs further stated:

In our view the actions of the military authorities in Poland and the pressure exerted by the Soviet Union to reverse the legitimate process of renewal and reform in Poland constitute serious violations of the Helsinki Final Act. As a signatory of the Final Act it is our right and obligation to call attention to these violations in the strongest terms. We place great value on the CSCE process but in light of developments in Poland do not consider it possible simply to return to "business as usual" in Madrid. In order to protect what has been achieved thus far and to preserve the CSCE process for the future it might be advisable to adjourn the Madrid Meeting for a period of time; such action however can only be decided in Madrid with the consensus of all participating states.

Further information will be sought on this question and an update brought to the Senate as soon as possible.

THE SENATE

OTTAWA WINTER CARNIVAL—PARLIAMENTARY HOCKEY MATCH

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Is he aware of the brilliant fashion in which the honour of the Senate was upheld last night? I understand that in a parliamentary hockey game on the Rideau Canal one of our members, Senator Graham, scored two goals in a rather lopsided 9-to-0 victory over the opposition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Lewis for bringing this information to the Senate in the spirit of the freedom-of-information approach of this government.

Indeed, a trophy-winning victory of notable and historic dimensions, 9 to 0, was scored by Liberal parliamentarians over a combined and very badly disorganized Progressive Conservative-NDP opposition.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Are we going to give them a new contract?

Senator Perrault: Senator Graham also scored two assists.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DECORATION OF ROOM OCCUPIED BY CANADIAN PRESS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked yesterday by Senator Donahoe. The allegations made by the honourable senator yesterday have been under intensive scrutiny during the past 24 hours.

He asked about the decoration of certain offices of the Parliamentary Press Gallery. He said that these offices were occupied by the CBC. This is not the case. These offices are occupied by Canadian Press, a co-operative news agency owned by private industry.

Senator Donahoe objected to a picture of the President of the U.S.S.R. in that office. I am advised by the office of the President of the Privy Council that perhaps Senator Donahoe did not notice the cartoon pasted on the President's forehead which read, "Blame it on the Press!" I am also informed that a staff member of Canadian Press, who is interested in the re-decoration of their recently enlarged offices, has asked the Privy Council Office for a picture of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada.

Incidentally, I am informed that the two young women who were present at the time of the senator's entry into their office resent that he mistook them for young men.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame! Resign!

ELECTRICITY AND GAS INSPECTION BILL

THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-11, intituled: "An Act relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that when consideration of this bill was adjourned yesterday I asked that it stand in order to give the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs an opportunity to study the implications of the Interpretation Act section which appears not only in this bill but also in the Pest Control Products Bill.

Since we may not receive a report from the committee on that subject matter for a week or so, I feel we should stand this matter for at least a week. Therefore, I recommend that this order stand until at least next Wednesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an interim report for Senator Macquarrie, Senator Murray and others who are interested in this subject matter.

Bill S-11 deals with the subject of what has come to be called "the electoral clock." Honourable senators will recall that there were two other bills before Parliament dealing with the electoral clock. One was a bill which at one time was known as Bill C-237, a private bill sponsored by Mr. Clarke—not the Leader of the Opposition in the other place; and there was also a private bill, Bill C-626. So, in all, on the electoral clock, we had Mr. Kilgour's Bill C-626, Mr. Clarke's Bill C-237, and Bill S-11. I understand that the House of Commons Committee on Privileges and Elections studied Bill C-237 and made a report. The government is studying that report. I hope we can come up with something dealing with the whole subject of the electoral clock.

● (1450)

Bill S-11 and Bill C-626 are almost identical, I believe. Bill C-237, while it deals with the electoral clock, does not make the same recommendations nor does it contain the same provisions.

Honourable senators, that is an interim report. We are continuing with our inquiries, and I hope that within a week or two I will have further news on the subject of the government's position.

Order stands.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am informed by Senator Bonnell that Senator Croll would like to speak on this order before it is considered to have been debated. It might be appropriate, therefore, to have this order adjourned in Senator Croll's name.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SECOND AND FIRST REPORTS OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—ORDERS STAND

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Second Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Guay, P.C.).

Consideration of the First Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad to see that Senator Murray is still in the chamber. Orders 7 and 8 both deal with reports of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages. The order concerning the second report stands in Senator Guay's name, and that concerning the first report stands in Senator Murray's name. Senator Guay tells me he and Senator Murray agree that it is more appropriate to have the debate on the first report first.

Senator Murray, I believe, may not be in the chamber next week. I suggest that these orders stand for a couple of weeks so that he and Senator Guay can sort out the chronology, and we might deal with both of them in the same week.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Lowell Murray: That would be completely satisfactory, and I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his suggestion.

Orders stand.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that I adjourned this matter many weeks ago simply to keep it open for any honourable senator who may wish to speak on the subject so that the events could be discussed as they unfold in that country. At this moment I do not have any personal intention of speaking to this order.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Honourable Senator Murray would consider now, or perhaps at some point in the future, treating this order as having been debated. I make the suggestion for this reason: Senator Macquarrie maintains a close interest in this subject. I think there are now questions on the Order Paper dealing with the position of the government in regard to observers at the proposed election in El Salvador, and so forth. I wonder whether that subject might better be dealt with in ongoing questions during Question Period. The matter would then always be up to date, and we could then consider this order as having been debated. Of course, we can always initiate another inquiry.

Senator Murray: I would like to consult with my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, at whose suggestion I adjourned this matter, before I agree to that request.

Order stands.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL SESSION, MUNICH, WEST GERMANY—DEBATE COMPLETED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-seventh Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Munich, Federal Republic of Germany, from 11th to 16th October, 1981, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the 27th Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Munich, Federal Republic of Germany, from October 11 to 16, 1981, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada is most deserving in my opinion. It gives us a chance to throw some light on some of the problems facing the members of this Assembly and to make Canadians more aware of the active participation of the Canadian delegation.

During his intervention on October 28, 1981, Senator Bonnell described in detail the makeup of the Canadian delegation and the composition of the various committees. He spoke eloquently about the work of the committee on which he sat, namely the Scientific and Technical Committee. I wish to congratulate him, not only for having developed his subject matter so ably, but also for having promptly informed the Senate of his own findings.

The next day, October 29, the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, who is here today, also spoke about the work of the Canadian delegation and stressed especially the important sessions of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People. I want to congratulate him also for having expressed his thoughts on this subcommittee very clearly. It is indeed unfortunate that his mandate should have expired since he has ably served the cause of international freedom and democracy.

I am pleased to associate myself with these honourable senators in congratulating Leonard D. Hopkins, M.P., Chairman of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association and leader of the Canadian delegation to this 27th annual session.

I had the privilege of sitting on the Political Committee, presided over by Mr. Robert McCrindle, member of the British Parliament, and I would like to take a few minutes to tell the Senate about the work of this committee. Those who represented Canada on this committee were, in alphabetical order, the Honourable Senators Hastings, Leblanc and Murray and Messrs. Harvie Andre and Leonard D. Hopkins, members of Parliament.

I do not intend to discuss all the work done by this committee in detail. However, I would like to give a brief summary of our main discussions.

The first speaker was Mr. Norman Bailey from the United States, Head of the Planning and Evaluation Department of the National Security Council. His conference was entitled "Problems and Outlooks of the Economic Policy of the United States and its International Impact". Mr. Bailey talked about the confusion surrounding the phenomenon of high interest rates. He also outlined the American policy on East-West economic relations. The position of the United States is that the Soviet bloc should not be given direct or indirect assistance to update or expand its military forces. According to Mr. Bailey, western nations should avoid becoming dependent upon Soviet resources. I will get back to that subject later on when referring to the establishment of the East-West economic relations subcommittee. Mr. Bailey's remarks did raise objections and questions on the part of many delegates from various countries and they were followed by a very interesting discussion.

After that we heard a statement by Uwe Jenisch of the Federal Republic of Germany on "The Worldwide Implications of the Law of the Sea Conference", followed by a discussion on the rights of nations to develop offshore resources, and we know that we also have that problem between Canada and the United States. Later, Mr. P. R. Odell of the Netherlands spoke on "The Future of Petroleum". Unlike others, Mr. Odell had a very optimistic outlook on worldwide energy resources and the choice of a world energy strategy.

Then we heard France's Senator Lacouret, chairman of a task force on Portugal, who tabled a draft resolution on "Portugal's Economic Situation and Need for Assistance". In the conclusion of that resolution they express the unanimous desire to see Portugal bolster her economic potential. Indeed, that task force was authorized to monitor and, if possible, lead the economic recovery of Portugal.

At a subsequent sitting, the commission reviewed the report of the economic commission general rapporteur, Senator Frans Uijen of the Netherlands, on "The Economic Aspects of Atlantic Safety". This prompted a very lively debate which eventually paved the way for certain amendments.

Our Canadian representative, Honourable Senator Hastings, general rapporteur on energy policy, presented to that commission a very exhaustive report on "The Atlantic Alliance and the Energy Challenges". I am pleased to extend to him my most sincere congratulations for the high quality of his report which raised many questions without leading into a controversy.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the setting up of a subcommittee on East-West economic relations, more especially since its proceedings began in December 1981. I had the privilege to be called to sit on that committee established as a result of the report presented by the general rapporteur, Senator Frans Uijen of the Netherlands, which, as I mentioned earlier, was discussed at length. The report mentions several times East-West exchanges and I will quote briefly a few relevant excerpts about the setting up of the subcommittee: On page 7 of the report, in clause 22, the following can be read:

—the economic relations between member countries of the Alliance and the COMECON countries have given rise to a growing controversy among allied Western countries and some political groups.

And on page 8, clause 23, we find the following, and I quote:

However, for some economic sectors, exports to Eastern countries are important in terms of employment and production.

On Page 9, clause 26, and I quote once more:

Undoubtedly East-West trade has much more interest for some member nations of the Alliance than for others. This is the case in particular of the F.R.G. and its geographic location.

Moreover, resolution 109 on the economic aspects of Atlantic security, passed by the North Atlantic Assembly, mentions in part, and I quote from clause 4 of the report on the resolution:

—to maintain and develop East-West trade relations in order to help improve the political climate between the two blocs;

Since the Federal Republic of Germany has the biggest stake in this matter, not surprisingly the first meetings in December were held in West Berlin, Cologne and Bonn. These were strictly information sessions for the following delegates: Mr. Pierre Bassetti, member of the Italian Parliament, chairman of the subcommittee; Dr. Ludolf Von Wartenberg, member of the Federal Republic of Germany's Parliament, rapporteur of the subcommittee; Mr. Peter Manning, M.P., Federal Republic of Germany; Mr. Robert McCrindle, M.P., United Kingdom, who is also chairman of the Economic Committee to which the subcommittee reports; Senator Frans Uijen, Netherlands, who is the general rapporteur of the Economic Commission and also a member of the subcommittee; Mr. Franz Klein, director of the economic commission, International Secretariat, Brussels; Miss Paula Rogness, Research Assistant, International Secretariat, Brussels.

During the delegates' first meeting, we established the following objectives: First, collecting all existing but not readily available data and statistics on East-West economic relations. Second, gathering various opinions on the matter, which, by the way, were obtained during the sessions of the Economic Commission hearings held in Munich. Thirdly, making recommendations to the economic commission and therefore to the North Atlantic Assembly.

As you can see, the aim is to study the problem in depth before making sound recommendations.

Our meetings and discussions during those two days dealt exclusively with those goals. Incidentally, I prepared a detailed report, which I shall not be reading here because it is too long, that was recently submitted to the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

I wish to commend the members of the subcommittee for their hard work and keen interest, in particular its devoted chairman, Mr. P. Bassetti, the delegate from Italy. Our thanks are extended to both representatives of the International Secretariat for their courtesy and co-operation.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, before the conclusion of the debate on this report, I should like to ask the Honourable Senator Leblanc whether, even in October 1981, there was any discussion during the assembly deliberations concerning the lack of unity in its stand with respect to the crisis in Poland.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: I am grateful to Senator Haidasz for his question. However, I do not think that this issue was raised before the Economic Committee I was sitting on. I am sure, though, that it was raised before the committee of the whole during the last two days. Member countries, of course, were trying to find solutions to the most critical problems.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 16, 1982, at 8 p.m.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER AND RUSSIAN CARGO VESSEL MEKHANIK TARASOV—MOTION EXPRESSING SYMPATHY TO BEREAVED FAMILIES AND FRIENDS

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, the Senate, in common with all of Canada and indeed the whole world, will have learned with shock, regret and grief of the terrible tragedy that has stricken Canada and, in particular, the province of Newfoundland during the past few days. The details are well known to all who have been following the developments as they have been given to us by the news media.

Disaster is, of course, common to all of Canada from time to time, but it has visited no part so often as it has visited what is now the province of Newfoundland. Ever since Newfoundland was populated by settlers from the British Isles and other parts of Europe we have known a disproportionate number of disasters. I recall that in my own lifetime there have been scores of vessels lost. At a time when 600 schooners a year were sent down that bleak and stormy coastline of Labrador, not a season passed without the loss of some ship. Indeed, in one storm 40 ships were wrecked. Our bank fishery has also suffered disasters. As those great banking schooners, which are comparable to the well-known schooner from Lunenburg, endeavoured to navigate the bank fishery, they, too, were subjected to the hazards of ice, both in the form of icebergs and, as may not be generally known, in the form of ice which coats a ship and which causes it to lose its stability. "Lost with all hands" is, of course, the result. Perhaps the most tragic disaster at sea was the loss of Southern Cross, which went down with 176 souls—none survived.

● (2005)

Honourable senators, we in Newfoundland had hoped that with the advent of new technology such losses would not recur. I am sad to say, though, that we still suffer them. It was only a few years ago this month—in fact, this very week—that Blue Foam was lost with all hands because of ice formation. A few years later Blue Mist was lost, again with all hands.

Those who carry on their livelihoods off the coast of Newfoundland do so with the full knowledge that they are subject to hazards of the most serious nature—fog, ice, blizzards and hurricanes such as we have experienced this past week. Often this type of disaster has been referred to as "an act of God." However, I can assure this honourable house that not all of these occurrences have been acts of God. Some of them, I regret to say, have occurred as a result of other characteristics exhibited by human beings.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h),

That this house extend its deepest sympathy to the families and friends of those who lost their lives on the Ocean Ranger drill rig operating off the coast of Newfoundland and assure them that our thoughts and prayers are with them in this time of deep personal tragedy.

● (2010)

At the same time, honourable senators, I should like to include a reference to the Russian ship which unfortunately sank in the vicinity of Ocean Ranger. It was an heroic action on the part of the crew of that Russian ship to change course and head towards the scene of the Ocean Ranger disaster with the intention of giving whatever help was possible, and it is to the great sorrow of everyone that that ship, too, became a victim of the tremendous blizzard, also involving a heavy loss of life.

I am sure my seconder, Senator Doody, and other honourable senators will want me to include in my motion a note of regret and grief to be extended to the families of those gallant Russians, our comrades in grief and suffering.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I say just a few words in addition to those sentiments expressed so well by Senator Rowe?

It is, indeed, a tragic day in St. John's, a city not unused to marine disaster. I grew up in that city and I remember well the grief that often overcame it. Indeed, that is true of most of the towns and villages of Newfoundland.

Senator Rowe has mentioned some of the more recent tragedies with which we are familiar, but in a maritime environment such as we live in, instant exposure to the sea, and perhaps too close an exposure to the sea, is a fact of life. People who make a living from the sea are expected to pay a high price for it. It is a price which many of us in other parts of Canada are not all that familiar with.

As I second this motion expressing sympathy to the bereaved, I should like to add a compliment, if I may, to the air-sea rescue people for their heroic work, once again, in conditions almost beyond imagination, taking their helicopters out to the scene of a wreck and, in the face of 50- to 60-foot waves, attempting to lower crew members to haul bodies from the water. Theirs was an incredible effort and one for which all Canadians should be grateful and proud.

I join Senator Rowe and other honourable senators in this expression of sympathy.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

DECORATION OF ROOM OCCUPIED BY CANADIAN PRESS— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I am intrigued by the brouhaha which my question concerning the propriety of hanging the portrait of Leonid Brezhnev in an office in Canada's Parliament Buildings has raised both in the press and in other media.

My question of privilege consists of three brief statements concerning the events which surrounded the incident. First, I stated that the office was occupied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That was in error. The office was occupied by Canadian Press.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Just as bad!

Senator Donahoe: Theirs is the sole responsibility. I regret the misunderstanding.

Second, I employed the words, "seated therein were four or five young men." It appears that some of the persons present were ladies. I apologize to those ladies, and I can only explain by saying that I looked directly at only two persons and spoke only to those two persons, both of whom wore heavy black beards and were obviously not ladies.

● (2015)

My third point deals with the fact that an explanation appeared in the press to the effect that the large portrait or photograph of Leonid Brezhnev bore the printed caption "Blame the press". I do not understand the caption, nor do I say that it was not there. I say only that I was never told by any person in the room, male or female, that the portrait about which I was complaining was hung on the wall as a joke. I had to read my newspaper in order to find that out.

I was told by the Leader of the Government in the Senate that there were pictures of animals involved, and I can only say that I did not see any. I say further that the only framed picture which I observed on the wall was a picture of Leonid Brezhnev.

As my final word on the matter, I neither suggested nor requested that a picture of the Queen of Canada be placed on the wall. I can only trust that a portrait of the Queen has not been hung on the wall beside the portrait of Leonid Brezhnev with the same derogatory intent.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e) I move:

[Senator Doody.]

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-90, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. The minister was quoted as having told student Liberals at the University of Victoria last Friday:

We're going to stop propping up mature industries that will never be competitive in this generation, like textiles, clothing, footwear and a number of others.

Would the minister confirm the accuracy of that quotation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is not accurate, and I underline the word "not."

Senator Charbonneau: Would the minister tell us exactly what he said?

Senator Olson: I would be glad to, although I do not have a manuscript. I said, "some industries like textiles."

Hon. Martial Asselin: You said it.

Senator Olson: Over 90 per cent of the textile industry in Canada is competitive now. That comment was included at the same time, but, for a purpose unknown to me, the reporter in his interpretation left it out.

I also talked about the need for emphasis on the competitive advantage of Canada's vast natural resources. I said very clearly that we would maximize the advantage that we have by upgrading our natural resources to the highest possible level. Those remarks are contained in some press releases and not in others. I have some copies of press releases here in which I was quoted accurately on that matter.

Senator Asselin: Table a copy.

Senator Olson: In other press releases that part of the comment was omitted. I do not like to complain about being misquoted but, in this case, I believe I was selectively underquoted to advertently or inadvertently leave a distorted whole interpretation of the message I was delivering.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Poor you—persecution.

Senator Olson: No, it is not persecution.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Poor, incompetent press.

Senator Asselin: Do you want to re-phrase your own speech?

Senator Olson: Everyone in this chamber knows that when he makes a speech the press may report remarks out of context. I do not usually complain. The Leader of the Opposition knows that very seldom do I complain about reporters.

Senator Charbonneau asked me for an explanation, and I am now telling this chamber what I actually said. Perhaps my honourable friend does not want me to answer the question.

Senator Charbonneau: I would ask the minister a supplementary question concerning the textile industry which, of course, is based largely in Quebec and is, therefore, of particular interest to senators from Quebec.

As I recall, the government instituted the Canadian Industrial Review Board to look into the situation regarding various Canadian industries. Is not the minister infringing upon the function of the board? What is the point of having such a board if the minister, before the board issues a report, comes out and says what is to be done?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that interpretation of the function of the board is not complete. The board has already been given the task of looking into the textile, clothing and footwear industries along with what we think is sufficient funding so that those industries which are not now capable of being competitive in the real world of the marketplace can be upgraded. The board is also charged with the duty of finding an alternative to those industries which it decides ought not to be upgraded. It is not just a matter of looking into the whole general question; the board has been given a term of reference along with $275 million to do the most effective possible job in the area I have just described.

THE CABINET

MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—USE OF PRIVATE RAILWAY CARS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I address my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Would the leader explain the jaunt taken by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, his family and staff, to Quebec City last weekend in two private railway cars with the services of a chef? Would the leader tell us how that is tied in with the Prime Minister's admonition to the people of Canada that they must tighten their belts?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. I have no information on that particular subject at this time.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATOR—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board with respect to the study to be conducted by Dr. Clay Gilson. I congratulate the minister and the government on securing the services of Clay Gilson because he is a man of probity, but is it true that the government has given instructions to him to the effect that the meetings he will conduct in the west are to be held in camera?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I can tell Senator Roblin that I have no knowledge of any such instructions. As a matter of fact, I had an opportunity to have a quite lengthy discussion with Dr. Gilson this afternoon, and there was nothing said during that discussion which would suggest to me that he was under instructions of that kind.

Perhaps I should not speculate on this, but I would imagine that he would make his own decision as to how he intends to conduct these negotiations, but that was not part of the conversation.

Senator Roblin: I hope I will not offend my friend's feelings if I say that I do not regard him as a reliable reporter on this subject, because the last time he was asked as to whether or not an announcement was going to be made with respect to the Crow rate—which was on a Thursday—he said that he had no knowledge of that announcement, although it was in the public print and it was made on the following Monday. I must tell him that the newspaper reports are quite clear that these meetings are to be held in camera.

Senator Argue: Are to be?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That was not your question.

Senator Argue: That was not your question. Your question was whether Dr. Gilson is under instructions, and my answer is that I have no knowledge of such instructions.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend inquire to determine whether Dr. Gilson is under instructions, because if he is under instructions to hold these meetings in camera I shall have more to say on the subject.

I now ask my honourable friend if it is also true—and he may not be able to answer this at once, although I shall be surprised, because he seems to know all about the wheat business and Crow, because he has been eating a lot of crow recently—that the Government of Canada has given instructions that the provincial administrations not be included in this round of consultations?

Senator Argue: No, I am not aware of that either. I am not sure whether Dr. Gilson will be interviewing the provincial governments or not, but if he does, I would think that it would be on the basis of not asking them to underwrite any part of the federal jurisdiction under the Constitution with regard to railways, the transportation of grain, and so forth.

While I am on my feet, perhaps I could refer to the reply I gave to Senator Roblin on the Thursday prior to the Monday announcement.

I said to him at that time—and I just paraphrase my own remarks—that I had no knowledge that there was definitely going to be a news conference slated for the Monday. As a matter of fact—and it is a matter of fact—the decision leading to that news conference was not taken until a cabinet meeting on Friday. On Thursday the decision had not been taken.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That is correct.

Senator Roblin: I would not accuse the minister of deliberately misleading the Senate. I do not intend to do that.

Senator Argue: You should not because that would not be true.

Senator Roblin: I think the minister gives us the best answers he can, but they are still not very good answers.

Senator Argue: It was an accurate answer and it was the truth.

Senator Roblin: It may have been the truth, but I want to ask my honourable friend why he did not attend the cabinet meeting at which this decision was made. He has been actively involved in the Crow rate business, and one would really expect that he would lose no opportunity to express his views.

● (2030)

Senator Argue: I had another engagement that I did not want to miss. As I understand it, although I was not here, the decision made at that meeting concerned the choice of the person who would do the negotiating. I knew that I would not be at the cabinet meeting, since I felt I should keep the engagement that I had already agreed to undertake.

Senator Roblin: The minister is entitled to his own views as to the priorities he adopts, but I must say that it is passing strange to some of us that he should find that sufficient excuse for being absent.

Coming back to the original point, namely, the discussions being held by Professor Clay Gilson, my third question is, what will be the status of his findings? In other words, this gentleman is being asked to try to negotiate a meeting of minds between the railways and the farmers, presumably not including the provincial governments. What will be the status of his findings when he reports to the federal government what he has been able to achieve during his consultations? Will they be binding or not?

Senator Argue: Is the question, will they be binding or not?

Senator Roblin: That is part of it.

Senator Argue: I do not think that Dr. Gilson, or anyone else, would expect that he has been clothed with the authority, in the discussions that he is undertaking, to make a settlement of the issues. As a government, we have a lot of faith in Dr. Gilson. His appointment was generally very well received, and I would think that when he does make recommendations to the Minister of Transport those recommendations will be taken very seriously indeed.

Senator Roblin: I am sure that is a correct statement, but it is going to be a rather tragic situation if the government does not accept the general purport and tenor of his findings. However, I am willing to wait—

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Are you suggesting otherwise?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend is willing to wait until I have finished my statement, I was saying that I am willing to wait until I hear what Professor Gilson has been able to achieve.

WHEAT—COST OF PRODUCTION—PROPOSED STUDY BY SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should now like to ask the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board a question with respect to wheat on a different level. He will remember that on October 23 and 24 of last year there was a meeting of the subcommittee of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary group in Washington with particular emphasis on wheat. One of the conclusions of that meeting was that Canadian parliamentarians should ask the government to consider the establishment of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons which might consider, first by themselves and then later in conjunction with the Americans, ways and means of getting the cost of production covered in the wheat pricing formula that we have in the world today.

I believe my honourable friend has been asked on several occasions what the attitude of the government is with respect to that request, and I do not believe he has answered. We will be meeting again soon, and I should like to be able to take them a message from the minister that, on the part of the Canadian government, we are prepared to proceed with the proposal.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I am not sure I understood the question correctly. Are you asking about a proposal to have a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to look into this question, or is it some other aspect of their findings?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend may recall a series of letters from Mr. Jack Murta, M.P., who was co-chairman of the Canadian section of the joint operation dealing with this matter, and it is on that point that I am raising my question which involves the advisability of a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to discuss this question in the first instance.

Senator Argue: No decision has been made on that request.

Senator Roblin: The Canada-United States subcommittee meets in the early part of March. Can my honourable friend give me any hope that after some five months of study he will be able to give us an answer in time for that meeting?

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Argue: I do not know that it has much to do with that meeting itself. I believe that meeting will proceed anyway. It is a continuing committee. The suggestion was that there should be an additional committee set up in Canada—a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate—and no decision has been made on that suggestion.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that that item is on the agenda, placed there by the Americans. I would like to give a constructive answer to them, and I wish my honourable friend would give me some help in providing one.

ENERGY

ALSANDS PROJECT—GOVERNMENT OFFER TO PARTICIPATING COMPANIES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I wish to pose a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister able to confirm the report in La Presse to the effect that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated that neither the Canadian nor the Alberta government intends to modify the offer to the companies participating in the Alsands project?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot do that this evening. I have not seen the article referred to. I have another problem with that question. I could take the question as notice and look into it, but under our rules it is clearly improper to ask for comment on the accuracy of newspaper reports.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: An escape clause if ever there was one.

OIL EXPLORATION—SAFETY OF MARINE DRILL RIGS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to the tragedy which has occurred in connection with the Ocean Ranger. In view of the frightening circumstances, has any thought been given to why an oil rig of that size could not withstand the heavy seas; and has any consideration been given to the effect of high seas on other oil rigs in the area, in order to give the personnel on them a sense of security? Evidently even the major scientists are unable to offer any constructive recommendations for coping with such conditions.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER AND RUSSIAN CARGO VESSEL MEKHANIK TARASOV

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have additional information regarding Ocean Ranger. The Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, have announced that the federal government will hold a formal inquiry to investigate all aspects of the loss of the drilling rig Ocean Ranger off Newfoundland early yesterday. It has been announced that Chief Justice Hickman of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland will conduct the inquiry. He will be relieved of his current responsibility with respect to the inquiry into Arctic Explorer because of the urgency of the present situation.

I have additional information regarding the disaster which befell Ocean Ranger. In sequence it is as follows: A report received by telephone at 9.30 this morning stated that seven offshore supply vessels were at the site and that an eighth vessel was en route. The fisheries vessel Hudson was reported to be proceeding to the site where Ocean Ranger had been stationed. The Coast Guard vessel Gilbert was at the Ocean Ranger site and had been sent to the Russian vessel Mekhanik Tarasov.

The Coast Guard vessel Barlett had at that time left St. John's for the Ocean Ranger site. The fixed wing Aurora and Buffalo aircraft were on patrol and helicopter aircraft were on stand-by at St. John's.

The weather report at 9.30 this morning indicated winds at 35 knots gusting to 50 knots and freezing spray, which confirmed the information provided by some honourable senators from Newfoundland with respect to possible icing conditions.

The Russian container vessel Mekhanik Tarasov had departed from Trois-Rivières. The estimated time of its sinking was 0500 hours Newfoundland time. There were 37 personnel on board, of which 23 have been accounted for and 14 are still missing. The Danish ship Sigurfari picked up five survivors and the Russian ship Dvorsky picked up four bodies.

It should be pointed out—and this confirms the statement made earlier by Senator Rowe—that at the time of the sinking, the Mekhanik Tarasov had diverted from its course and was speeding to the side of the Ocean Ranger disaster in an effort to save the Canadians and others who had been on board the drilling rig. A tragedy of this kind transcends all ideological, national or racial differences. All Canadians should be grateful for the great sacrifice made by those who served on that Russian ship in their efforts to aid those on Ocean Ranger.

● (2040)

With regard to the status of the disaster as of now, the following information should be put on the record. The rig is owned and operated by Ocean Drilling and Exploration Company of New Orleans, and was chartered and operated for drilling by Mobil Canada. The rig was inspected by the United States Coast Guard, classification society, American Bureau, and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Ocean Ranger had been stationed at the Hibernia site, well J-34, since November 29, 1981. This is 165 miles off the Newfoundland coast. It had been operating off eastern Newfoundland since November 5, 1980.

The first and only distress from the rig was relayed through the United States Coast Guard, New York, at 0112 Newfoundland time, February 15. The next distress, to the effect that the rig was being abandoned, was relayed by another rig, SEDCO 706, at 0155, Newfoundland time, February 15. Between the first distress call and the notice of abandonment 43 minutes elapsed.

The rig disappeared, and it is presumed—of course, it is known now—sunk. The position is marked by anchor buoys that are still visible. An extensive search and rescue operation has been mounted. The Ocean Ranger had 84 people on board. Only one body has been recovered so far from a lifeboat. Numerous bodies and debris have been sighted. The rig had three lifeboats and 10- 20-man life rafts. Three lifeboats have been observed, and several life rafts, but no sign of any survivors. No survivors are now expected. Weather conditions remain poor, but the search continues.

Three inquiries of a preliminary nature have started by the combined Canadian Coast Guard and Energy, Mines and Resources, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on behalf of the Newfoundland government, the United States Coast Guard, and now a fourth inquiry, announced today in both houses of Parliament, the Hickman inquiry, which is being instituted immediately. The federal and Newfoundland governments had announced earlier that they would hold public inquiries. The details of the federal announcement have now been made known.

ENERGY

OIL EXPLORATION—SAFETY OF MARINE DRILL RIGS— DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in spite of the comparatively short history of oil drilling and oil rigs, this area of activity has had more than its fair share of tragedies. I am concerned about what is going to happen in the future, with particular regard, for instance, to the effect of icebergs, which the scientists say the oil rigs can withstand, although it is quite obvious that there is something wrong in this area, whether they are stating this as the truth or not.

How can we make sure that there will be no more tragedies such as the one we have seen in the past few days? Might it not be wise to stop our greed and hold up oil drilling until we can assure the people of Canada and everybody else that it is safe to have these drilling rigs in the oceans where they are so dangerous?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Honourable Senator Jack Marshall raises concerns which are in the minds of many Canadians tonight. I will take his question as notice. I hope that a statement dealing with the questions which arise on the subject of oil rigs and their safety can be brought to the Senate as soon as possible.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, could I ask a supplementary question of the minister while we are on that subject?

[Senator Perrault.]

Several times the minister has mentioned the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as a body that has been involved in this matter. I presume that it is that federal government department that has the responsibility for the rigs. However, I am not quite sure of that; it may or may not be so. Perhaps the minister can confirm it for us.

Is it indeed the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or is it the Department of Transport that has this responsibility? It appears to me that the Canada Shipping Act and the various other acts which govern the regulation of ships at sea should have an involvement here.

There was discussion of life rafts and survival suits and of the various pieces of lifesaving equipment and techniques that are necessary at sea. Is this a Department of Energy, Mines and Resources responsibility, or is it a matter for the Department of Transport? These are the people who have the expertise and knowledge. It is their aircraft and their ships that are called on.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is more than one jurisdiction involved here. As far as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is concerned, there is an inspection procedure every two weeks; but as far as the rig itself is concerned, it is positioned outside the 12-mile limit, and its initial inspection and certification was received from United States authorities.

I have been informed that a certificate of seaworthiness is a United States certificate, but there is an involvement of both levels of government in establishing the various safety standards. One aspect, I understand, relates to the marine construction standards of the rig itself, and the other inspection—the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources inspection—relates to the method by which the energy resources are being extracted from the sea bottom, and the safety procedures relating to the extraction of those resources.

Honourable senators, I understand that the construction aspects of such rigs are not subject to Canada shipping inspection regulations, because the rigs are stationed outside the 12-mile zone. At this point, however, I do not wish to offer any random or unsubstantiated opinions. It is an important subject, and the disaster which has occurred is profoundly saddening, especially to the people of Newfoundland.

I think it would be in the interests of the Senate to have a complete statement prepared on the subject relating to inspection procedures, in as much detail as possible.

The information with respect to the involvement of United States authorities in the basic structural approvals given to the rig has this evening been received by me in brief form only, and it does not purport to be the final information on the point.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I appreciate the answer given by the honourable senator, and I understand that it is a complex issue. I wish it were not as complex as it appears to be, because with these various jurisdictions involved it would appear, on the surface, at least, that perhaps some of the fundamental aspects of safety at sea have not been assigned to any particular area of responsibility. I sincerely hope that I am wrong in that regard.

My understanding of the matter is that when a rig is in tow, or in motion, it is then considered a ship and is subject to the Canada Shipping Act and Regulations, when it is within the 12-mile limit of Canada. When it is stationary, offshore, then some other set of regulations comes into play.

If it is possible that the regulations of the United States Coast Guard are to govern the activities of these oil rigs off our shores, which are primarily populated by Canadians, then surely we have been very lax somewhere along the line in looking after the safety of these people. Perhaps the honourable leader could look into that aspect of it for me as well. It is a very important matter.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have before me a response given by the Minister of Transport in the other place this afternoon.

In response to a somewhat similar question he said:

Madam Speaker, under the Canada Shipping Act my department has no jurisdiction over foreign registered ships past the 12-mile zone; that is pretty fundamental. Thus, as Minister of Transport, I cannot go and inspect rigs or ships in that area.

With respect to seaworthiness of ships or rigs, the general principle in marine equipment as well as in air equipment is to accept the system of the foreign country involved. If my hon. friend wants to read the Dubin report, for example, Mr. Justice Dubin repeatedly said that we should not try to second guess the system of another country, particularly if it is one that is as involved as the United States of America is in this subject. The principle of reciprocity applies here in matters of marine transportation as well as in matters of air transportation.

• (2050)

Honourable senators, I suppose that there are unique characteristics to an oil rig; it is not precisely a ship and it is certainly not a plane. The fact is that many Canadians work on them; indeed, a disproportionately high percentage are thus working off our shores aboard a foreign-approved piece of equipment. I believe that the honourable senator raises an interesting point and further information will be obtained in that regard.

Senator Doody: If I may ask a supplementary question, honourable senators, without trying to monopolize the time of the Senate, there are other rigs working offshore at this time. There will be another eight or ten, perhaps, when the weather clears up and there are three or four off the coast of Labrador, all of which will be operating under two sets of Canadian regulations.

Can the minister undertake to try to see that some sort of safety regulations falling under some jurisdiction are put in place on these rigs while this investigation is being conducted? The fact that we have had one tragedy should not steer us away from providing protection for those people working off the coasts of Nova Scotia and Labrador and on the Grand Banks during the coming season.

Senator Perrault: I am sure that all honourable senators appreciate the great and special concern of Senator Doody. That question will be directed immediately to the Minister of Transport and other ministers whose departments are said to be involved in the inspection process, one being the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with reference to the same subject matter. I noticed, when he was referring to what might be considered life-saving equipment available to those aboard this drilling rig, that he made reference to a number of life rafts. I could not help but wonder how long life could be sustained by means of a life raft in this kind of weather. Is it really a substantial adjunct to the life-saving equipment aboard any such rig?

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Senator Smith raises a good point. In discussing this tragedy this afternoon, I was informed that in this Atlantic winter weather, with a standard lifebelt and without additional special cold weather survival gear, life expectancy is something in the order of six or seven minutes. With a life suit, which preserves certain additional thermal values, life expectancy is one hour at a maximum. In the reported 50-foot waves and hurricane-force winds which caused the rig to go down within 43 minutes, and under the impossible flying conditions for the helicopters and desperately bad conditions for the lifeboats, the odds may have been almost completely against the possibility of anyone surviving. The question of whether techniques can be developed which would provide a greater measure of protection for those who work aboard such rigs will, I am sure, command the attention of scientists and engineers in the weeks and months to come.

I repeat that the Honourable Senator Smith raises an excellent point. I am sure that he is more familiar with the conditions which can develop on the Atlantic at this time of year than are most other senators in this chamber. He may have other information about life expectancy under these drastic winter conditions. If so, I am certain that he will share his knowledge with all members of the chamber.

Senator Smith: I thank the Leader of the Government for his kind reference to my own knowledge of these matters, which I am afraid I cannot confirm except to say that I have, from experience, come to the conclusion that the usefulness of a life raft in winter weather on the Atlantic Ocean is limited to the extent that the honourable gentleman referred to in his answer. Therefore, it would seem to me that life rafts are indeed of less than great value in the attempt to have sufficient life-saving equipment available on such rigs.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have been further informed that, even should rigs be equipped with standby helicopters, icing conditions caused by freezing spray can be such that rotors freeze and it is simply impossible for helicopters to get aloft.

There are, therefore, all sorts of questions which arise from this tragedy. Certainly, the government will be forthcoming in its efforts to improve the safety margin on those rigs. All of the questions which have been asked this evening have been taken as notice, and a determined effort will be made to find answers to them.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: I wonder if I can direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government. With regard to the standards of seaworthiness in this case, where the owner or the lessee of a vessel or a rig is a Canadian individual or corporation, is the acceptance or otherwise of the standards of another nation affected in any way? Does the certification of seaworthiness of another nation—in this case, the United States—come into the equation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government? When he makes a report to us on the question of the safety equipment, could he also inform us whether there is a captain of such a rig when it is actually stationed? If so, is he a seagoing man who has actually had experience in the lowering of life rafts and in the giving of orders for abandoning ship?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Smith: I wonder, honourable senators, if I might presume upon the good nature of the Leader of the Government to ask another question with regard to jurisdiction. I am not sure of the jurisdiction under which licensing would fall at that particular distance from the coast of Newfoundland. However, if it is within some Canadian licensing jurisdiction, either federal or provincial, would it be possible to tie the licensing requirements to the provision of adequate safety measures in operating a drilling rig?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I may say that my question is not prompted by the minister's answers to the questions raised by my colleagues, Senator Marshall, Senator Doody, Senator Smith and others. I am in no position to comment upon the specific content of his answers, but I do compliment him for what I think is the attitudinal revelation contained in those answers. I am no expert on these matters. The closest I come to being a naval expert is the fact that my father served in the Canadian Navy in the Great War—a navy referred to by Conservatives, of which he was one, as the "tinpot navy," but one which I think did quite well.

[Senator Perrault.]

I am prompted to ask my question by the pertinent, concise, and, as always, appropriate questions posed by Senator Roblin with reference to certain Canadian and American organizations. The organization I have in mind is an extremely important one about which I have questioned the minister more than once in the past many months—the International Joint Commission. When I think of this vast country—from the Skagit, where the minister comes from, to the Garrison, through the problem of acid rain down to the Georges Bank dispute, where I come from, and many irritants in between—to use the current buzz word—I wonder why there has not been a completion of the Canadian side of the IJC. Why must we wait further to get this tremendously important, historic executive organization on the road? If I were as scriptural as I was a week ago, I would say, "How long, O Lord, how long are we to wait?"

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to state emphatically that I agree with the honourable senator that appointments to the International Joint Commission should be made just as soon as possible. It is of urgent importance to many provinces across this country.

GARRISON DAM PROJECT—MCCLUSKEY CANAL—WATER LEVEL

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I rise to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

• (2100)

On several occasions, including Tuesday, February 2, I have asked questions of the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the Garrison situation in Manitoba and southern Saskatchewan. I think we have to realize that while we are pondering the matter in the Senate from one week to the next the Garrison project is going relentlessly ahead. In fact, certain United States senators are asking for considerable amounts of money—not just a few millions of dollars but many millions of dollars—to proceed with the Garrison project.

The people of Manitoba and southern Saskatchewan are concerned at what could well be a disaster if the project is ever allowed to proceed to fruition.

I agree with Senator Macquarrie that the matter of the International Joint Commission appointment should be made as soon as possible, because the matter is urgent.

On top of that, the most recent development is that Senator Mark Andrews from North Dakota is asking for the removal of the plugs in the McCluskey Canal which keep the water out of the Hudson Bay basin. Surely that gives new urgency to the Manitoba government's proposal to set up an appropriate lobby in Washington. Apparently they have the blessing of the Canadian embassy in that particular regard.

Honourable senators, I feel I must emphasize that this is a matter on which the government must take some quick action. It is not sufficient for us to rise week after week merely to ask questions. Canada must express its concern in action.

Does the Leader of the Government have any favourable comment in that regard?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do have some information on the letter that is purported to be from Senator Andrews to the Department of the Interior.

As some honourable senators may be aware, it is reported that Senator Andrews of North Dakota has written to the U.S. Department of the Interior apparently proposing that water be allowed into an additional segment of the McCluskey Canal. That canal is now partly filled with water, and it is not clear why the senator put forward that proposal.

We are aware of recent reports regarding that letter. On preliminary examination, his proposal, if implemented, would not in itself appear to present any problem or direct risk to Canada. We are endeavouring to ascertain the contents of the letter and have already expressed our concern to the U.S. Department of the Interior regarding any proposals which could conceivably affect Canadian interests.

We have discussed this matter with Manitoba, and federal and provincial officials will take it up with United States authorities in Washington on February 24, when they meet to discuss the current status of Garrison, including recent developments. So there will be a key meeting, honourable senators, on February 24 in Washington.

Senator Guay: Very good.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ACQUISITION OF INTEREST IN SAVIN INC.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin, the minister responsible for the Canada Development Corporation. In the course of his discussions with the chairman, president, directors and the management of the corporation, as he outlined to us a couple of weeks ago, has the minister satisfied himself that CDC has made a good deal in paying $75 million in U.S. funds for approximately 57 per cent of Savin, a photocopier manufacturer which has a debt of some $216 million U.S., more than twice its sharehold equity of $93 million?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): I have not completed my own review of that transaction, but the board of directors is obviously satisfied with its decision. I have not discussed that decision with the board of directors.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. I take it that Senator Austin has not yet reviewed that decision. Do I take it as well that a review of such decision will be made?

Senator Austin: Senator Nurgitz, I propose to conduct myself in a way that allows me to understand the nature of the CDC, its assets and its business decisions, but it does not necessarily flow from that that I will hold myself open to make public comment on the course of business of a company which is not an agent of the Crown.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a further supplementary. Having regard to the purposes of the Canada Development Corporation, to help develop and maintain strong Canadian control and manage corporations in the private sector and to give Canadians greater opportunities to invest and participate in the economic development of Canada—I am reading from the announcement of the establishment of that corporation—I should like to know the minister's view on whether the purchase of that kind of company is consistent with CDC's mandate as defined in the act.

Senator Austin: I have heard no suggestion that the board of directors of the CDC is acting contrary to its statutory powers or objectives.

Senator Nurgitz: I appreciate the difficulty the minister is describing to me, but will he endeavour to find out, since the people of Canada have a substantial investment in the CDC and, accordingly, in Savin, and report to us on the employment benefits to Canada of this Savin purchase?

Senator Austin: I will consider whether it is within the proper scope of my role to comment on the business of the CDC in this chamber. I will advise Senator Nurgitz in due course.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for Senator Austin on the CDC purchase of Savin. Did I understand Senator Austin to say he did not know whether it was proper for him to discuss Savin in this chamber, and that he will make some inquiries to that effect?

Senator Austin: What I said, Senator Doody, was that I am not certain that it is my role or responsibility to comment in this house on the activities of the CDC in terms of the business judgments of its directors. The CDC is a private corporation. My responsibility is to hold shares of the government, and I certainly will answer questions about government purposes. But I do not know that it would be proper for me to answer questions that are properly directed to the board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation. I will look into the question.

I simply wanted to express to Senator Nurgitz my grave reservations that I would be acting properly to respond to the question he asked.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I certainly do not want to put the minister in any area of impropriety, so if my question tends in that direction I can well understand the minister's reluctance to answer it. I recognize the fact that the CDC is not a government-owned or taxpayer-owned corporation in the strict sense of the words, but my understanding of the matter is that the taxpayers do own almost 50 per cent of the shares—48 per cent or 49 per cent. That is close enough, really, for the Senate to have a reasonable interest in the activities of the company.

Perhaps I could deal with a matter of government policy rather than a matter of corporate business. I have heard the purchase being described as the second part of a knockout punch aimed at reducing Canada's $1.2 billion deficit in office and computer products. Could the minister describe how the purchase of a company with all its operations outside Canada will reduce the deficit? How is the purchase of a Canadian company with no operations in Canada going to help the Canadian economy?

• (2110)

Senator Austin: The honourable senator has taken the same line of questioning taken by Senator Nurgitz, and I can only repeat the answer I gave, which would not inform him any more fully than it informed Senator Nurgitz. However, I do find it interesting that a member of the opposition would suggest to me that I have a responsibility to report for the Canada Development Corporation in this chamber when a quite opposite view was taken by Senator Roblin and Senator Smith on February 2, both of whom had very grave apprehensions over my taking any interest whatever in the CDC. In any event, my answer will remain that I shall review the propriety of any line of answers which would in effect exposit the decisions of the board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation, which is not a crown corporation.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the minister explain why, since he rejected what he thinks were the implications of the questions asked by Senator Roblin and me about the propriety of his becoming engaged in this affair, he should now consider it strange that we should ask how he is carrying out or intends to carry out the duties which he then claimed were perfectly proper and desirable for him to carry out?

Senator Austin: What I said on February 2 was that I had become the representative for the principal shareholder, as is provided for in the legislation establishing the Canada Development Corporation. I believe it was expressed that I might do something which would interfere with the independence of the board of directors to conduct the business of the CDC. What I am doing in replying to Senator Nurgitz and Senator Doody is taking into account that sensitivity, and I do wish to examine very carefully my proper role with respect to the government as a shareholder in the CDC in terms of commenting on the conduct of the business of that corporation by its board of directors.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SERVICES—ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL FUNDS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. In view of the fact that the recurring interruption of hospital services, as is taking place in Alberta with the strike of the hospital nurses, and the withholding of medical services by many physicians and surgeons in Ontario on a rotating basis, is being blamed on underfunding, would he care to inform us whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Finance will allocate more federal funds to the hospital medical insurance programs so as to ensure the universal availability of high-standard health care to all Canadians?

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ASSERTIONS BY THE CANADIAN CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does the government accept the assertion of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association that, by failing to prosecute law-breaking by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, it runs the risk of undermining public respect for the law?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. While the Canadian Civil Liberties Association brief does not assert it, I certainly do not mind doing so myself. By according what is obviously special status to the RCMP, the government runs the risk of undermining public respect and support for the police force itself. Has the government decided unequivocally not to prosecute the outstanding cases of RCMP law-breaking which are currently pending?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice. In taking the question as notice, may I say that millions of Canadians over the years have been very grateful for the outstanding service performed on their behalf by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Senator Nurgitz: And so am I, honourable senators, but not when they break the law.

THE ECONOMY

ALBERTA—CANADIAN FORCES—IMPACT OF COST OF LIVING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on November 26, 1981 concerning the impact of the cost of living on members of the Canadian Forces stationed in Alberta.

The government, through the Treasury Board, recently approved a three-part increase in the pay and benefits for the Canadian Forces which should alleviate the hardships to the lower-ranking servicemen posted to high cost-of-living areas such as Alberta.

The three-part increase consists of a pay increase averaging 3 per cent, effective October 1, 1981. This is in addition to the pay increase averaging 12 per cent granted last April 1. It also consists of an accommodation assistance allowance for personnel in rented accommodation, to be paid on a monthly basis effective November 1, 1981, to those posted in areas where rental costs exceed the national average by more than 12.5 per cent. This allowance is in recognition of unique conditions of service for military personnel and, more particularly, for those who are ordered to serve in areas of high costs of accommodation. The third portion consists of a posting allowance of up to one month's pay when a member is transferred from one duty assignment to another. This allowance is granted in partial recognition of the personal and social disruption created by postings of military personnel. Payment of posting allowance will take effect next April 1.

Before these latest increases in pay and benefits were granted, it was possible that a few servicemen and their families would have qualified for welfare under the Alberta system. These would certainly be exceptions that could not be verified and ascertained through National Defence records, a request for welfare payments being a private matter between individuals and the appropriate provincial authorities. A likely scenario for such an exception could be the case of a private or corporal with few years of service, married with more than one child, just posted to a high-cost area where married quarters were not available, and who had to accept whatever costly civilian accommodation was available at the time—or any combination of the above factors.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATION OF FISHERMEN ON EAST COAST FISHERIES TASK FORCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on February 3 concerning the representation of fishermen on the special task force on the Atlantic fisheries.

When we announced the appointment of a special task force on the Atlantic fisheries just over a month ago, the Prime Minister said that in carrying out its work the task force would consult with all those who have a role to play in the fishing industry. The task force is to recommend how to achieve and maintain a viable Atlantic fishing industry, with due consideration for the overall economic and social development of Canada's eastern provinces.

This small group of highly experienced individuals will ensure that every sector of the industry is heard from, that every aspect of the industry's fundamental problems is examined, and that the views of anyone who wishes to make a meaningful contribution to the search for long-term solutions will be most welcome and will be given full consideration.

The Atlantic fishery includes a large number of interest groups: part-time fishermen, full-time fishermen, inshore fishermen, offshore fishermen, labour organizations, large processing companies, small processing companies, financial institutions—to enumerate only the obvious ones. As well, there are provincial governments which also have a role to play in the future of the fishing industry. The task force is aware of the many different voices that this encompasses, and its members will do their utmost to make certain that all are heard.

Members of the task force are actively considering all possible mechanisms of consultation, so that the complete magnitude of the fishery's inherent problems are accurately understood, and that every viable option and alternative for long-term economic health is explored. One of these mechanisms could take the form of some type of advisory committee with representation from each of the five eastern provinces.

The Honourable Senator Muir asked why there is no one on the task force serving as a co-chairman to represent the fishermen. He based that complaint on his incorrect assumption that Mr. Peter John Nicholson, an economist who recently resigned his position as an executive of a large processing company, is serving as a co-chairman representing the corporate sector.

Honourable senators, there is no co-chairman of the task force. Furthermore, no one on the task force has been engaged to act as a lobbyist or to represent the vested interests of any single group.

DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMATION TO SENATORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Marshall on February 3 concerning the distribution of material from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to the Senate.

Sufficient copies of all Department of Fisheries and Oceans reports tabled in the House of Commons, press releases and public speeches made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans are delivered to the distribution centre at the House of Commons for distribution to all members of Parliament and senators.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Macquarrie on February 9 regarding whether or not Canada will be sending observers to the elections in El Salvador.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs informs me that no decision has yet been taken and the government is still studying the situation.

ENERGY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—AWARD OF EXPLORATION PERMITS TO PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked on February 10 by Senator Balfour regarding the awarding of exploration permits to Petro-Canada for 5.8 million acres off British Columbia's coast.

The federal government did not consult with the province of British Columbia on this matter because the leases were issued for exploration to be carried out solely on Canada lands. Otherwise, Petro-Canada is adhering to the exploration moratorium ordered by the British Columbia government for carrying out environmental studies in its own areas of jurisdiction.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—ANNUAL SEAL HUNT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to another question asked by Senator Marshall, this time on February 10, 1982. It concerns the action that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will take to protect this year's seal hunt.

Honourable senators, I am assured by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans that appropriate physical and human resources will be made available to ensure compliance with the seal protection regulations.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on February 11, 1982 concerning alleged disagreement among the western nations in relation to the adjournment of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Canada is presently consulting with like-minded countries about how to proceed from this point. Canada's objective is to maintain unity between like-minded countries on this matter.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on February 10 last regarding the government's position respecting offshore resources, I would quote a statement made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on February 12:

For some 14 years now we have been setting aside the question of ownership and not referring the matter to the Supreme Court because we hoped to reach a political, negotiated solution which would be to the advantage of the people of Newfoundland and of the people of Canada. This has been our position since I have been in office, but years go by and the offshore is in a state of uncertainty as to the regulations which prevail. There was a case brought before the courts by the Seafarers' International Union. Apparently Newfoundland is still unable to reach a decision to negotiate with us in good faith while the ownership question is held in abeyance. This has been the situation for 12 or 14 years. The hon. member should not ask why we are not prepared to set ownership aside. We have done nothing but that in order to try to reach a negotiated agreement.

Sometime last July I wrote to the Premier of Newfoundland saying, "We cannot wait any longer, beyond the next six months, but let us try to reach a negotiated agreement by the end of February. I am just telling you that if we cannot, we will certainly take a reference on our own. We have been trying for years to obtain a negotiated agreement with you or, alternatively, to obtain a joint reference. You have been unable to do either. Newfoundland did not want to join the other maritime provinces when we signed an agreement in 1977. Please let us try to do it before the end of February".

Now, three weeks before the deadline, Premier Peckford is apparently waking up to I do not know what new reality, but he sent a telegram which indicated what I have been saying for 14 years—let us reach an agreement without going to the courts. I am not saying that it is a matter that the courts will never determine. It may be determined, for all we know, in the SIU case. What we are saying is that if we negotiate in good faith we can reach an agreement without knowing who really is owner under the Constitution, because the courts will not have decided by the end of February.

Honourable senators, I also have the text of a telex sent by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to Premier Brian Peckford concerning negotiations on the same subject. I would ask that this telex be printed as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate.

The Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of telex see appendix p. 3629.)

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, may I say a word on a procedural matter? Regrettably, the Deputy Leader of the Government picked one of the very rare days when I was absent from this chamber to make a comment regarding this order. I noticed his remarks, and I read them with great care. All I can say in reference thereto, now that about 15 weeks have passed, is that I think it is time for the government to decide whether it is behind this measure, because I cannot deliver my pearly, eloquent speech without knowing whether the measure upon which I am making my remarks is, in fact, a government bill.

As long as this bill is before us in the name of Senator Austin, it looks as though it is a government bill. The honourable members of the government—and there are four illustrious ones in this great chamber—will have to decide whether this is to be a government bill, and we will all proceed accordingly, or whether some procedures must be put in force whereby it becomes what it was at the beginning—to use an unusable expression—"a private senator's bill." After that, I shall elocute to my heart's content and, I am sure, to the delight of my colleagues.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, motivated by an impatience to hear Senator Macquarrie, which is, I am sure, equal to his impatience to deliver his speech on the subject, I have made further inquiries.

I understand that a bill dealing with the subject matter of Bill S-11 is under active consideration by the government. I agree with the position taken by Senator Macquarrie that, if the bill is to proceed as a private member's bill, it should not stand in the name of a minister of the Crown and that we should know, as soon as possible, whether we are going to proceed with the subject matter of this bill in the form of a private member's bill or in the form of a government bill.

I would ask the honourable senator to give me two more weeks to ascertain the situation in this regard. If by that time the government has not made up its mind, I see no reason why it would not be useful to proceed to debate the bill in the form of a private member's bill since I am sure the subject matter of the study in government and the subject matter of this bill are so similar that we can deal with it one way or another.

It seems to me that the issue, as the honourable senator has suggested, is a procedural one. I should like to clarify this matter, and I would ask the honourable senator to allow me two more weeks in order to do so.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am a very agreeable man, especially on Tuesday nights. However, I do have in mind the danger of wine changing from the mellow to something else if it is delayed for too many weeks. Having already given the honourable senator 15 weeks, I shall be delighted to give him another fortnight.

Order stands.

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order, which stands in my name, is for the resumption of the debate on Senator Murray's motion. It will be remembered that I have been trying to persuade Senator Murray that the subject matter of his motion has already been partially dealt with in some parts of the legislation pertaining to the National Energy Program and that other items will be coming forward, all of which relate to the inquiry and to his motion.

However, I understand that Senator Murray is away on parliamentary business for at least the balance of this week. Of course, I would not want to deal with this matter while he is not present. Therefore, I suggest that this order stand for one week.

Order stands.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am in the same position Senator Frith was in regarding the third order. After consulting with my admirable and erudite colleague, Senator Murray, I would ask that this order stand.

Noting what Senator Frith said on Thursday, I am prepared to speak on this matter tomorrow and close the debate.

Order stands.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "They Served—We Care", tabled in the Senate on 20th October, 1981.—(Honourable Senator Thompson).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I spoke with Senator Thompson about this order earlier today. He advised me that he was in the process of consultation in preparation for his speech in this debate and, therefore, I would suggest that the order stand for one week.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 18, 1981, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Lamontagne calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution," tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1980.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, unfortunately you cannot go home just yet. At the outset, I would apologize for the delay in responding to the inquiry of Senator Lamontagne calling the attention of the Senate to certain aspects of constitutional reform.

Since it is so long ago that the report of the Legal and Constitutional Committee was tabled and discussed in this chamber, I feel that I should remind honourable senators of the two subjects that were addressed. Part I is entitled "Toward a Renewed Federation", and deals with current proposals concerning alternative institutional arrangements to the present Senate that would enable provincial governments to have a more effective input in the exercise, by the federal government, of its overriding constitutional powers.

Part II is entitled "Toward a Renewed Senate," and it rejects proposals favouring a unicameral Parliament, and puts forward proposals for reform of the present Senate as an appointed and genuinely federal institution.

May I also take this opportunity to pay a deserved tribute to both Senator Goldenberg and Senator Lamontagne and, indeed, to all members of the subcommittee for the comprehensive analysis which they made, and to commend them for their efforts and understanding of the various issues which have been the basis of controversy for so long. I would also commend them for their initiative and for their final recommendations, most of which are worthy of support.

Much of what I have to say, honourable senators, will be repetitive. As you are all no doubt aware, there is no political subject that provokes more public comment than the Senate of Canada. There is no better subject for the media to fall back on. When it has nothing better to write about it takes another crack at the Senate. It is very rare that more than a few days pass before some self-appointed constitutional expert is advocating reform of this chamber or its abolition so that, in his or her view, Parliament will be a better place.

I have gathered more articles from papers on reform of the Senate than on any other subject. They all say the same thing, but in a different manner. The only good I can see that comes out of it is that it helps to keep the paper industry in production. We have had more task forces, committees and commissions appointed to investigate reform of the Senate than any other matter, and the result only reflects the futility of the exercise and the lack of understanding of what is real. I wonder when and how it will all end.

There have been many articles introduced in this chamber with titles such as "Structural Reform of the Senate;" "To End or Mend the Senate;" "New Initiatives in Canadian Senate Procedure;" "Should Canada Abolish the Senate?" and others too numerous to mention.

● (2130)

Besides these experts we have the copycats, those who suggest that we should copy the systems of other countries, such as the Federal Republic of Germany and its Bundesrat, Australia or the many other countries mentioned. Then there are the new experts who have come out of the woodwork in the last months, those who wish to change "The Senate" to such ridiculous names as "The House of the Provinces" or "The House of the Federation," as if changing the name of the Senate is suddenly going to produce answers to the problems facing the country.

More recently, a new style of learned reformist has reared its head in the form of members of the other place getting into the act by proposing private members' bills on the reform of the Senate. One of those members does not even know what party he belongs to. They seem to have all the answers about what is wrong elsewhere, instead of looking in their own backyard and clearing out the mess that exists there.

Dealing with Part I of the report, which addresses concerns to give the provincial governments a more effective input, it is difficult for me to understand where the problem lies when the report specifically points out what the Fathers of Confederation intended—that is, that senators were to represent regions and provinces, not provincial governments. They were not intended to play any significant part in protecting the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, because the courts would do that. Our responsibility was to protect the individual and collective rights of the citizens of the province, which are too often left unprotected and ignored by all levels of government. Unfortunately, the committee did not have the time to deal with that important aspect, but I cannot for the life of me see how it can be determined that the provincial governments do not have more effective input. They just have a stubborn federal government which will not listen.

Certainly, honourable senators, hardly a day goes by when a federal minister and his provincial counterpart do not meet, either here in Ottawa or in a particular province, to discuss the problems of one or the other in their relationship on a particular issue, or to sound out one another on proposed legislation. How many meetings are there in a year when provincial ministers from across the country meet on mutual problems having to do with national issues? In most cases, the appropriate federal minister is in attendance.

The recent constitutional debate was a good example of provincial input and allowed both levels to come up with a package which was at least satisfactory to nine of the provinces, but while it satisfied the provincial governments to a point it certainly is debatable whether or not it satisfied the people of Canada whom they represent.

Even though the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution did such excellent work on the proposed Constitution, its recommendations were downgraded by the first ministers because of political trade-offs rather than for the good of the country. Those failures were admitted by the Prime Minister himself and many of the premiers. So, insofar as the title reflects our concern over changing the Senate to give the provinces more effective input, it is certainly not valid and reflects the fact that they are ignoring the real changes that are evolving in the governing of our country, without even realizing it. The country is now being governed by those in the Langevin Block and the PMO.

While some people feel that the present Senate is not representing the provinces, let me say that insofar as Newfoundland is concerned there are six senators from that province who I am sure would be ready, willing and able to help give regional representation to the 561,000 Newfoundlanders if someone, including the provincial government, recognized that we are here and knew why we are here and showed one bit of recognition of the role we could play on behalf of our province or region. Certainly, more could be done to achieve regional representation, but they should recognize that it is a two-way street.

From the opposition point of view, as Newfoundlanders, I am sure that Senator Doody—who has a vast knowledge of current provincial problems, having held at least six portfolios in the Government of Newfoundland, notably Mines and Energy, Finance, and President of the Executive Council—and others with experience in the other place could contribute something to regional representation if we were not completely ignored. I am equally sure that Senator Rowe—who was one of the first ministers in the provincial government at the time of its entry into Confederation and who held many portfolios—could be a source of knowledge and representation of the province of Newfoundland. So could Senator Cook, the champion of Newfoundland's rights, and Senators Petten and Lewis, despite their support of the other party in this chamber. I am sure that they would work, regardless of partisan politics, for the good of the province.

How anyone can say that there is no representation of the provinces is beyond imagination.

Taking, again, the province of Newfoundland as an example, with its population of 561,000, there is one representative for every 44,000 Newfoundlanders. Again, if we take into consideration that there are 52 members of the provincial government, there is a government representative for every 12,000 citizens of Newfoundland. That is pretty good representation, honourable senators. I only wish I had the figures for the number of municipal elected officials across the province, because they have access to both levels of government, and the figures for the decentralized personnel of federal and provincial departments who are spread across the province. I dare say that if we counted all of them and divided their number into 561,000, the representation by appointed, elected and hired government officials to whom the citizens of Newfoundland have access, or should have access, would be staggering to the mind.

With apologies to Senator Macquarrie, if we were to take the 121,000 citizens of the province of Prince Edward Island and divided their number by the number of officials, I am sure it would almost be on a one-to-one basis.

There are more government officials travelling back and forth across the country, falling all over themselves, holding meetings and seminars, creating new bureaucracies, supposedly to help the people and provide input to government, but in most cases they are causing confusion rather than helping, and yet some are concerned that the provinces and regions are not represented and they say that is the fault of the Senate.

I do not know about my colleagues, but I will have been here for four years next month, and not once have I received a phone call, a letter or any kind of message to seek support on any issue or any problem on behalf of the Government of Newfoundland. Any letters I have received have been in reply to ones I have sent myself. There have been many visits by ministers of the Government of Newfoundland to Ottawa, and on not a single occasion have I been asked for support on a provincial issue. The premier of the province himself has not contacted me for support on a provincial issue. The only contact I have with my province is from individual citizens who seek representation or assistance through me only because they do not know who else to turn to.

Honourable senators, I have probably said too much already, but moving to Part II of the report entitled "Toward a Renewed Senate," it is difficult for me to understand, first of all, those who suggest that senators should be elected rather than appointed. Despite the fact that I have tried to follow their reasoning, I still cannot see how, if all the senators in this chamber ran in the various sectors of the country and won, that would inject a new spirit of wisdom into their blood that would straighten out the country, or, from the point of view of those who advocate different appointments by the provinces, how a defeated candidate in some provincial election who was appointed to the Senate, or some new suggested formations such as the House of the Provinces, can suddenly be stricken from the heavens with a magical knowledge that could reduce unemployment to zero, or provide a home for every Canadian as a gift, or balance the budget, or ensure that Canada would become a Shangri-la for every one of its citizens.

Far be it from me to compare my abilities with those of the appointed members of the executive branch of the United States government, but everyone is aware that the President reaches into all sectors of society to choose members of the administration which governs the United States. Despite the fact that they make mistakes of judgment and are not infallible, I do not hear anyone in the United States yapping and barking in the wind that if they were elected they would be any better or worse.

The other question that I address, honourable senators, is against those proponents of Senate reform who say things in Parliament would be better if we change the Senate makeup. I take issue with their reasoning. I should like to give one example having to do with the legislative process and the influence on legislation by the government in power.

It is certainly obvious that a good deal of the legislation passed by Parliament over the years has not been the best in the world. It should also be obvious that legislation evolves as a result of influence, not from advice of the government or the government or opposition members of Parliament, but from the lobby of such organizations as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Federation of Independent Business, the labour unions and the powerful corporations and social organizations, and as a result of discussions with the first ministers of the provinces at their conferences, which are becoming more numerous.

Legislation is introduced in the house and goes through various stages. I know that little attention is paid to protests by the opposition, and amendments are rarely accepted. Filibusters are thwarted by the introduction of rule 75, and, unless there is a minority government, there is not much the opposition can do to stop bad legislation. There are many able debaters in the other place—many wise and capable Canadians—but for some reason or other, despite the points they score in debate and despite the embarrassment they cause to the government in power, they have little or no influence over legislation. But we do have, honourable senators, or we can have, depending on what happens when the Constitution arrives back in Canada. We could have stopped that legislation if we had exercised our veto power and not allowed ourselves to be called “toothless tigers” and other such names.

Unfortunately, we have been exploited by the government in power to the point of non-effectiveness as relates to our effect on the legislation which comes before us. Instead of giving us the time to ensure that the legislation is beneficial to Canadians in all walks of life, it is sent to us under demand, duress or threat that it be given royal assent and, in most cases, within set time limits. This is for political gain rather than for the benefit it provides the people of the country.

The only way this can be changed for the better is by our declaring independence, or as Sir John A. Macdonald so aptly stated:

There would be no use of an Upper House if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing or amending or postponing the legislation of the Lower House.

He also said:

It must be an independent house, having a free action of its own.

Further, he related:

The Upper House is only valuable as a regulating body to consider legislation and to prevent any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that lower body, but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people of Canada.

Honourable senators, I can accept change in the Senate that will make it a better place and will allow us to perform our duties, as the Fathers of Confederation laid down. I can agree that through the passage of years, and as changing conditions dictate, changes are required to meet those new conditions.

I can agree with many of the conclusions reached by the committee, primarily the one that relates to the pre-study of bills and, particularly, the conclusion that the internal operation could be improved. But I will not accept, on the other hand, the ridiculous declarations by the government which state that the Senate has failed in its function as the voice of the regions when they themselves are the cause of the democratic system's not working.

When referring to representations, I ask one question: What kind of government is it when two cabinet ministers, one of whom is fairly senior, have to write a letter to the Prime Minister to make a suggestion or to make representation? That same Prime Minister stated quite emphatically that the Senate has failed to provide regional representation. The person of whom I am talking is one of the best ministers I have ever known, the Honourable Monique Bégin. It seems to me ridiculous that she, as a top member of the cabinet, cannot go up to the Prime Minister and say “I would like to discuss with you the problems in Quebec.”

Honourable senators, after the recent Economic Summit Conference of First Ministers, the Prime Minister, in summing up, said:

So true political leadership I believe consists in solving problems well before they turn into emergencies. It also consists of more than pointing a finger at the other guy, in this case the federal government, and saying, “It is all his fault.”

With the greatest respect to that Prime Minister, we can say, “Neither does true political leadership point the finger at another guy,” the Senate, and to say, without just cause, that what is wrong with the parliamentary system of government is all the fault of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—TEXT OF TELEX
FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

February 12, 1982

The Honourable Brian Peckford
Premier of Newfoundland
St. John's, Newfoundland

I have reviewed your telex of February 10, 1982, regarding the negotiations we are currently conducting on the subject of offshore resource management and revenue sharing.

I would like first to deal with what appears to be a misunderstanding on your part of the basis on which we have been negotiating.

The federal government's offer to negotiate the offshore issues of resource management and revenue sharing was contained in my telex to you of July 27, 1981. In that telex, I clearly and explicitly set out the federal position on ownership as follows:

The legal position of the federal government is predicated upon the 1967 judgment of the Supreme Court to the effect that rights to offshore resources on the West Coast belonged to the federal government. It has always been our position that this judgment applies as well to the East Coast offshore. Our divergence of views on ownership has introduced an element of uncertainty which would eventually impinge adversely on an orderly development of these resources. We are both aware that the ownership issue cannot remain unresolved much longer. This leaves the federal government with no alternative but to see that this matter is resolved by one means or another through the legal process.

You will also recall my position that if we failed to reach an agreement on resource management and revenue sharing by this month of February, "we should await the outcome of the legal process, which would of course mean that any future negotiations would start from a different base." The federal government has in the past proposed to the Newfoundland government that a direct joint reference to the Supreme Court, with wording agreeable to both of us, is one method of obtaining a clear legal judgment. This proposal was never accepted.

I also referred in the telex to the appeal by the Seafarers' International Union to the Federal Court of Appeal in the following terms:

If I understand you correctly, you suggest that the federal government not present its arguments on the jurisdiction issues raised by that case. I would like to point out that it is not the federal government that has raised the ownership and jurisdiction question in the context of the SIU case.

The federal government, like the Newfoundland government, is only an intervenor in the case and does not control the issue on which the court is asked to decide. It is the principal parties in the case which placed this issue before the Federal Court for decision, partly in response to an earlier decision by the Newfoundland Labour Relations Board which dealt with the matter of ownership and jurisdiction.

In any event, the issue will be heard by the Court regardless of the position taken by the federal government or for that matter, the Newfoundland government.

I took particular care to reaffirm the federal government's position on ownership and to respond to your concerns over the SIU case in order that there would be absolutely no misunderstanding of the nature of our offer to negotiate the issues of resource management and revenue sharing.

From the fact that you accepted the invitation to negotiate contained in my telex of July 27, 1981, I could only conclude that you understood my position and were willing to negotiate in that context the issues of offshore resource management and revenue sharing.

Nevertheless, as Mr. Lalonde has pointed out in his recent discussions and correspondence with Mr. Marshall on February 9, the federal government was prepared to remain neutral on the Newfoundland government's motion to delay proceeding with the SIU case. As you know, the Court denied that motion this week.

The history of negotiations and agreements on the offshore has been quite different in Canada than is suggested by the Australian experience you use in your telex. In the Canadian case, there was no legal resolution of the ownership issue, (which we believe would provide the most secure and enduring basis for any agreement on resource management and revenue sharing), and successive governments at both the federal and provincial levels, have changed their positions; in one case—concerning the 1977 Memorandum provincial government walked away from an arrangement which had been signed in good faith by a previous government.

I should note that from the moment the current negotiations began, federal officials have made it abundantly clear that this government viewed the resolution of our offshore dispute as one that would proceed on three tracks. On one track, the ownership question would be resolved by the courts. But more importantly, on the second track we would aim in our talks to reach—by February 28, 1982—a pragmatic agreement on a long-term, stable, resource management and revenue sharing arrangement to which both parties would commit themselves regardless of any court decision on ownership. A third track was discussed as well, that of ensuring that Newfoundland captures as many of the economic benefits as possible from the development of the offshore. Mr. Lalonde articulated this view again with Mr. Marshall during their meeting on January 8.

In other words, in view of the possibility of third-party actions (like the SIU case), the challenge was to arrive at a fair settlement regardless of ownership, but to ensure that that settlement would stick, if and when ownership was eventually decided by whatever means in favour of one side or the other.

Consequently, we must ensure that any settlement we reach contains enough safeguards to prevent its abrogation by either party. I hope that our teams of negotiators can devise such safeguards to ensure that each party remains committed to implementation of the agreement. It has always been my position that we could reach a long term agreement without determining ownership. I continue to believe that in the next two weeks we can achieve such an agreement which would survive any decision on ownership by the courts.

As you are aware, the details of our proposal require further elaboration. The appropriate way to pursue these matters is to resume discussions at the level of Ministers and senior officials. Mr. Lalonde is prepared to continue to meet with Mr. Marshall on an urgent basis over the next two weeks.

Finally, I would simply like to reiterate a point made in my July 27th telex to you. I wrote then that "the jurisdiction issue should not be allowed to obscure the requirement to find a solution that best meets the needs of the people of Newfoundland and all Canada". That solution, of course, encompasses a cooperative approach to both managing the resource and sharing the revenues it generates. In many areas, such as forestry, our two governments have in recent years cooperated to encourage resource development regardless of who owns the resource.

I am sure that you share my hope that we shall arrive this month at a settlement which will reflect the interests and responsibilities of both governments. More than that, it must respond to the pressing energy security and economic development needs of Newfoundlanders and all Canadians.

I am confident that, even with the short time remaining, we can build the framework for cooperation which will ensure the best possible development of our rich offshore oil and gas resources.

THE SENATE

REFORM—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I draw to the attention of honourable senators an article that appeared in the Citizen today. The article begins by saying:

An internal reform movement aimed at introducing elections and proportional representation to the Senate is taking shape in the cloisters outside Canada's upper chamber.

In the body of the article, Senator Frith, as Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, is quoted. For the benefit of other senators, who do not have the privilege of being included in what might be called an elitist group, would he explain the purpose and the objectives of the reform referred to in the article? I ask this question particularly because there appear on the Order Paper recommendations for Senate reform which contradict those contained in the press report, if indeed that report is true.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to what is said in the article, which I read only a few minutes ago. I do not know of any elitist group within the Senate. The article has quoted my views and the facts correctly. I would not be surprised if the fact that the Senate is debating the inquiry referred to by Senator Marshall is one of the things that caught the attention of the press. I do not understand debate on that inquiry to mean that nobody is allowed to disagree with what is in the report, particularly when we are debating a report that does not agree with what some senators appear to believe. I do not think there was anything by way of surprising news to senators there. Senator Roblin was, I am sure, correctly quoted and we know at least some of his views.

For those reasons I do not think it is a matter of an elitist group, nor do I think there is anything I can add to what was said in the article. From what I read, it seemed to be quite accurate.

I hope that all senators will feel free in the debate to disagree with what the report says. I, apparently along with some reporters, am looking forward to hearing what senators have to say on the subject of Senate reform, using the inquiry as the springboard for doing so.

Senator Marshall: It seems obvious to me, senator, that you are falling into the same trap the media fall into, that when they have nothing better to do they pick on the Senate and start printing ridiculous things.

I just want to know what is going on. It is obvious that things are happening in the Senate that all are not privy to. However, I accept the deputy leader's explanation and I will leave the matter for the time being.

Senator Frith: Incidentally, I did not think that the article was at all unfavourable to either the Senate or senators. However, that is an opinion which may or may not be shared.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I be allowed to follow up on the question, albeit not strictly in accordance with the rules? In the statement that appeared in the press the Deputy Leader of the Government has been quoted as saying:

The time has come for the Senate to lead, not follow, the debate on its future.

I ask him now whether it is his intention, therefore, to take part in the debate we have engaged in so that he may have an opportunity to give us either his or the government's views on the matter.

Senator Marshall: A good point.

Senator Frith: The answer is, yes. I should, however, say that the views I express will quite likely be my views. If I am able to find out the views of the government and am given the authority to express them, I will do that as well.

I should also like to add that in my view we might advance the procedure to consider Senate reform by not just letting it peter out at the end of this inquiry. However, that is something we would have to discuss. Because I believe that if, for example, we were to attempt to have a resolution of the Senate, without establishing in advance any agreement on the result of the resolution, the procedural form it should take, if it takes any form beyond what it has now, should be on a bipartisan basis, and we should agree on what procedural device or form we will use.

At the moment I think we should leave it that we will bring forward our views on the subject of the inquiry now before us, and I do hope to engage in that debate myself.

Senator Roblin: May I assume from what my honourable friend has said that it is his intention to place before the house the resolution on the future of the Senate, for which he might hope to get bipartisan support?

Senator Frith: That is not quite accurate. It is my opinion that it would be desirable for the Senate to introduce a resolution on what the Senate thinks is the best direction for its reform. In this way the Senate could lead the debate on its reform. At the moment, however, I have no intention of bringing in such a resolution without the agreement of both sides of the chamber as to the form of the resolution and the procedure we should follow.

Senator Roblin: Now my honourable friend has me thoroughly confused because he seems to be speaking for the government, as Deputy Leader of the Government, when making the statement about seeking the agreement of both sides of the house. Yet he previously said that he would probably be speaking in his own capacity on the matter, rather than dealing with it as Deputy Leader of the Government. I wish he would clear up this discrepancy, because it is very important to me.

I respect my honourable friend's opinion as a member of the house, and he has a perfect right to give it, whatever it might be. But in view of his capacity, under normal circumstances one has to link what the honourable senator says with government policy, and I think that this is something we should have clarified.

Senator Frith: I agree, honourable senators. I want to make it very clear that what I have said on this subject today and what I have been reported in the press and elsewhere as saying on the matter up until now has been my own opinion. I am not speaking for the government. As I said earlier, when I can speak for the government I shall do so, and I shall make it very clear that I am speaking for the government. Otherwise, it can be taken for granted that I am speaking as a senator and am expressing my own views.

Let me also clarify the question of procedure. My personal objective is to have the Senate lead the debate and to have introduced a resolution or statement which puts forward, either by resolution or otherwise, the Senate's recommendations on Senate reform. Of course, we will not know whether this is possible until we attempt it, but if the Senate is to introduce a resolution, then it seems to me that it must take a form other than the form that is before us now, namely, that of an inquiry on a report. As we all know, our procedure on inquiries is that when everyone who wishes to has spoken on the topic it is treated as debated and that is the end of the matter. So, in terms of the procedure we should follow, my concern is as to where we would go from that point, and that is what I wish to discuss with my honourable friends.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, on the same point, I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether there has been any indication that we are coming to the end of the session and that we will therefore be beginning a new session with the usual Speech from the Throne?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there have been many such indications, but as far as I am aware, through my discussions with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, no decision has been made on the matter.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I take it from what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said that he considers the item on the Order Paper now a matter of inquiry. Frequently, following an inquiry a motion is moved that the subject matter be sent to a special committee. Has the deputy leader any procedure like that in mind, or, if this inquiry is considered as having been debated, are we precluded from having another inquiry on the same subject until a new session?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the question raised by Senator Benidickson is relevant to the procedural matter we were discussing. Of course, we will take his observation into account in the discussions. There are many dimensions to the procedural aspect. At the moment, I think that the objective of having the country hear the views of honourable senators on Senate reform is well served by the procedure we are now following, namely, the inquiry on the report of the subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

OIL EXPLORATION—DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER— SAFETY-INSPECTION REPORTS

On the tabling of:

Safety-Inspection Reports on Offshore Drilling Operations, dated January 6, January 21 and February 3-4, 1982, relating to the drill rig Ocean Ranger (English Text).

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, these reports are rather interesting. In their present form it may be difficult to include them as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate, but there may be merit in that procedure if honourable senators wish it. However, they may be obtained from the Table in the usual way.

I would depart from the usual practice to say that the most recent report concerning Ocean Ranger, dated February 3-4, contains such references as "Housekeeping on drill floor: Good;" and "Moonpool area: Very good." Comments on potential hazards call for the installation of a proper rail around the diving winch control balcony and repair of the burn basket.

I am sure that those interested in the whole enigma of Ocean Ranger will find these reports of interest.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—VISIT BY COMMONS SUBCOMMITTEE—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION BY SENATORS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It seems that yesterday the House of Commons decided to send a group of members to examine the situation in El Salvador. I wonder whether it has occurred to the Leader of the Government that perhaps one or two senators could join the members of the house on this mission.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the idea is a good one. I was in conversation this morning on precisely that point. I suggested that, if possible, senators be included on that mission.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government should inform the Senate of the decision as quickly as possible since I understand that the members of the House of Commons will be leaving on Saturday or Sunday. If senators are to participate, we should have at least 48 hours' notice before being invited to do so.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER AND RUSSIAN CARGO VESSEL MEKHANIK TARASOV

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question relates to what was said yesterday concerning the tragic events involving the drill rig Ocean Ranger and the Russian ship.

Has the Leader of the Government checked the allegation that the Russian ship changed course in order to assist the crew on board Ocean Ranger? We have heard a different story indicating that the Russian ship had begun to list long before there was any sign of danger on board Ocean Ranger.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I can assure honourable senators that prior to Question Period yesterday evening I was visited by a representative of the Ministry of Transport who provided me with the information contained in my answer. The information he had received indicated that the Russian ship had changed its course toward the scene of the Ocean Ranger tragedy and, in the course of so doing, had begun to list. I can only refer again to the official information received from the Ministry of Transport.

Senator Flynn: I would ask the Leader of the Government to ascertain whether that was the situation because, according to the press, it was somewhat different.

[Translation]

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. For the last year and a half I have been questioning the Leader of the Government about the future of Nordair and about the possibility that Nordair might go into partnership with Quebecair. The media have been struggling to get specific information on this subject from the Minister of Transport. The Leader of the Government has, from time to time, answered my questions by saying that the minister was still considering the matter and that no decision had been made.

On February 11, in a letter to the president of Air Canada, the minister gave the president the assurance that Nordair would remain the property of Air Canada. In the same letter, the minister also said that if the Government of Quebec dropped its $15 million investment in Quebecair, perhaps it would be possible to arrange for Nordair and Quebecair to go into partnership.

My question is: What is the basis, what is the rationale for the Minister of Transport's objection, namely, that since Quebec had invested $15 million in Quebecair, the minister could not allow Quebecair to go into partnership with Nordair and thus achieve a better balance of air transport in eastern Canada?

● (1415)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the proposal made by Senator Asselin will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport and other members of the cabinet. The balance of the question will be taken as notice.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. Can the Leader of the Government inform us whether the decision to maintain Air Canada's ownership of Nordair is a final decision by cabinet or whether there is still hope that negotiations will continue between Nordair, Quebecair and another Ontario airline, so that the present Minister of Transport will be able to keep the promise made by his predecessor, the Honourable Otto Lang? Mr. Lang told Air Canada that it would retain ownership of Nordair for one year only, and that at the end of that year the shares held by Air Canada would have to be transferred to another air carrier in the private sector.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a statement on the situation will be made to the Senate, and that question will be addressed at that time.

ENERGY

ALSANDS PROJECT—GOVERNMENT OFFER TO PARTICIPATING COMPANIES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister in a position today to state whether or not it is correct that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated that neither the Government of Canada nor the Alberta government intends to modify the offer to the companies participating in the Alsands project?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think it is known that there is an important meeting taking place today respecting that matter. In any event, I will refer the question to the minister and ask him whether or not he has made that assertion. Hopefully, there will be an agreement reached very shortly.

Indeed, today would be a good day for reaching that agreement.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Recently, considerable attention has been given to the mega-projects. There has been some confusion arising out of the attention being given to that subject. Are the mega-projects in the conceptual stage? Have they been initiated? When can we see something real in connection with those projects?

Would the minister advise the Senate as to whether any of the mega-projects are in the main stream at the present time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think I read a short list of projects that came within the definition of "mega-projects" a few days ago. The financing for a number of others has also been committed. At the present time, regarding the mega-projects identified by the major task force committee, of which over 22 are under way, I believe that all of the financing has been committed to those projects. If honourable senators are interested, I will try to find a list of those projects for you.

● (1420)

Senator Bosa: I have a supplementary question. Would the minister please list those projects?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in the private sector the following mega-projects have been committed: The synthetic crude oil refinery and benzene plant at Scotford, Alberta, an investment estimated at $600 million; TQ&M Pipeline, an investment estimated at $861 million.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not true.

Senator Olson: There is the Alaska Highway gas pipeline, an investment estimated at $5.1 billion; Beaufort Sea drilling for this year and part of next year, an investment estimated at $700 million; the Revelstoke hydro project in British Columbia, an investment estimated at $1.1 billion; the Cheekye Dunsmuir transmission project in British Columbia, an investment estimated at $576 million; the Sheerness thermal plant in Alberta, an investment estimated at $607 million; the Genesee thermal generating station in Alberta, which is under way, an investment estimated at $595 million; the Darlington generating station in Ontario, an investment estimated at $2.5 billion; the Bruce "B" generating station in Ontario, an investment estimated at $2.2 billion.

Hon. C. William Doody: Would you move farther east?

Senator Olson: We are moving in that direction.

There is the Atikokan generating station in Ontario, an investment estimated at $563 million; the La Grande, Phase I, in Quebec, an investment estimated at $9 billion; the James Bay transmission networks, an investment estimated at $3.719 billion; the Point Lepreau generating station No. 1, which is in the advanced stage, an investment estimated at $1.3 billion; the modernization and expansion program, Cominco Ltd., in British Columbia, an investment estimated at $700 million; the Quintette coal development, an investment estimated at $700 million to $800 million; the Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan rehabilitation and expansion program, an investment estimated at $2 billion; and the Grande Baie aluminum smelter in Quebec, an investment estimated at $500 million.

There are a number of others, but those mentioned involve the private sector and crown corporations. We also have another long list of commitments that have been made by the federal government. If honourable senators would like me to list those I would be glad to do so.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a list here of lost jobs.

Senator Flynn: It would be superfluous because it is all the same.

An Hon. Senator: Let's hear it.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Let's hear the good news.

Senator Flynn: The news is not new!

Senator Olson: The news is not new because it has been announced before, but—

Senator Flynn: Some of them have been announced for ten years.

Senator Olson: —if you would like a compilation of the list of major projects, I would be glad to provide it to you.

An Hon. Senator: Go ahead.

Senator Olson: For example, all honourable senators will know that we made an allocation of $267 million to modernize the textile, clothing and shoe industry.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That's old stuff, too.

Senator Olson: They will know that we increased the funding to $276 million for pulp and paper modernization.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That is old stuff, too.

Senator Olson: There is an additional contribution to the Space Program to bring it to more than $475 million.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: There is allocated $900 million over three years—that is, $300 million a year or so—to match the "credit mixte" terms offered by foreign governments.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: There is increased funding to $128 million for the Defence Industry Productivity Program—that is the DIP Program—which is extremely useful for this country. There is an additional $27.5 million allocation to Telidon, and $12.5 million to the Office of the Future program. We have extended the Special Electronics Fund to $93 million. We have approved a $350 million ILAP program. We have approved the construction of a $1 billion oil pipeline and oil field development for Norman Wells. We have extended Petro-Canada's capital spending program to $1.6 billion from $900 million, and we have guaranteed 80 per cent or $184 million of the capital requirements for the northeast British Columbia coal development. We have approved $47.7 million to increase the handling capacity of the Roberts Bank port facility. We have contributed $43.9 million to the construction of the Panamax dry dock in Halifax. Incidentally, a large part of that will be built in Quebec.

● (1425)

Senator Flynn: That is three years old.

Senator Olson: No, it is not three years old. The employment associated with that is not yet under way. We have also increased allocated funds to the Federal Business Development Bank to $475 million in order to assist small business.

Those are some of the highlights. If honourable senators wish a more complete list, I will be glad to read it out or to bring to the Senate a copy of the list.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The Conservatives accept good news only on division.

Senator Flynn: Most of them were decided when we were in office.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, might I ask the minister when we can get $15,000 to fix up the tunnel between the Centre Block and the East Block?

Senator Perrault: That is on page 3!

Senator Flynn: I am surprised that the minister did not mention that.

Senator Perrault: He is only on page 1; that's why.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, can the Minister of State for Economic Development advise whether there has been any progress so far on the financing of the Alaska Highway pipeline on the American side?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give specific details of the financing package that has been put together, but I have held a number of meetings recently, including one with the Federal Inspector in the United States, Mr. Jack Rhett. Indeed, we have heard from a number of people, without their being identified, in the financial community, advising us that progress to date is ahead of the targets that were anticipated when they started to put together that very large package.

I might also say that some of the speculation in the press about the cost of this has been exaggerated. The estimated cost in Alaska has been reported to be going up to $27 billion, $30 billion—and $40 billion; and sometimes we even hear $50 billion. The latest figure that has been made available to me is $24 billion, which is in line with what has happened in connection with the prebuild in the southern part of Canada and all through the sections that were built in the United States, namely, that each one of those sections has been built ahead of schedule and under budget.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): More glad tidings.

EDUCATION

UNIVERSITIES—POSSIBILITY OF DIRECT FEDERAL AID

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, after listening to Senator Olson's bulletin, I feel buried in bucks and smothered in simoleons. I am going to ask a question which also has to do with expenditure.

● (1430)

I read with much surprise an item in the Globe and Mail which was based upon information supplied by the Honourable Gerald Regan, Secretary of State, and Mr. Phil Bryden, an officer of the Department of the Secretary of State, and is to the effect that the Government of Canada is now studying a plan to pay directly to the universities more than $3 billion in yearly revenue for post-secondary education, thereby removing the provinces as a factor in this movement of funds.

Honourable senators, the area of education has, since the time of Confederation, been a provincial jurisdiction. The reason given for this change is that more credit will be given to the federal government. As well, the federal government will thus be able to keep a closer tab on the use of the transferred money.

I submit that this is much more than a little alteration on a balance sheet: this is a fundamental change in functioning federalism. It occurs at a time when the frail fabric of federation is pretty tatty. I hope, honourable senators, that this is not an accurate reflection of the minister, nor of the officials, and certainly not of the government. I hope that the Leader of the Government can assure me that my view is not ill-formed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the federal government maintains its active, lively and concerned interest in the promotion of higher education in this country. A number of avenues are being studied whereby we may achieve the highest possible standards in this country.

The question will be taken as notice, however, and perhaps a statement can be brought to the Senate which will reassure the honourable senator.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT POLICY RE SELF-SUFFICIENCY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development—and what?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development):—Economic and Regional Development.

Senator Roblin: Economic and Regional Development, thank you. I will try to get that into my head a little more firmly, though I must say that I liked his old title better.

When I listened to the recital of mega-projects that has just been given to the chamber, it crossed my mind that it is rather a pity that the million unemployed of this country are not on the Senate Hansard distribution list. They would no doubt feel a lot better after hearing the minister's statement. I should like, however, to ask him a question about the energy situation in the country. I wonder whether it is still the policy of the government to secure self-sufficiency in oil by 1990.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, first of all I will make one or two comments regarding the preamble to the question. I want to say that I like the term MSERD. I prefer the insertion of the word "Regional" because it imparts to the people of this country an indication that the federal government intends to co-ordinate its activities throughout the nation. I believe that this change is meaningful and relevant, and I am very pleased with it.

I will say, also, that I agree with Senator Roblin's view that many people in this country ought to hear facts such as those I read out to this chamber a few moments ago. If they did, they would have more confidence in the future of this country. As was pointed out, there are billions of dollars in the private sector that are already committed to going ahead with the mega-projects, and some indication of what the national government is doing. Anything that my honourable friend could do to spread that encouraging word to the people of this country would be appreciated.

With regard to the last part of the question, which is whether the government still has the objective of being self-sufficient in oil by the end of this decade, the answer is yes.

Senator Roblin: I quite agree with my honourable friend when he says that the private sector is doing quite a job in Canada these days.

Senator Olson: A good job.

Senator Roblin: My point, however, is that it could do a much better job if that were made possible by means of budgets that were directed toward development, savings, investment and productivity, instead of toward goals that the government sets for itself and, of course, inflation. I have a question on that subject as well, if I have time to get around to it.

If my honourable friend wants to secure energy self-sufficiency by 1990, I then ask, does he regard the stalled projects in Alberta and Saskatchewan as being essential for the achievement of that goal?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if self-sufficiency is to be reached and if there is a projection of additional supplies that will be required by the end of this decade, it seems perfectly obvious to me that it is necessary to bring on more production. More production is necessary, not only for the increased consumption resulting from the growth in our economy but also to offset the decline in some of the traditional fields that are in existence. I do not think that a great deal of rationalization is needed to agree that we must have some of the projects on stream by the end of this decade if we are to achieve our goal. We have confidence that this will happen.

We on this side of the chamber understand just as well as senators opposite that problems were encountered until an energy agreement was reached between the producing provinces and the national government. That, however, has now been achieved. I believe that a great deal of exploratory work will take place in the sedimentary basin in western Canada during both the coming summer and the one following that.

I would point out that the self-sufficiency objective did include some of the major projects that have not been fully committed. My friend opposite likes to use the term "stalled." I am certain, honourable senators, that anyone making a commitment on multiple billions of dollars would like to consider the situation rather carefully. We certainly intend to do our part, without giving away the shop, to see that those projects go forward.

I might make one further comment, which is that my honourable friend made some allusion to the role that the private sector is playing in this country. I believe that the statement I read out to you a few moments ago indicates that there is some confidence on the part of the private sector in the economic development in Canada.

Senator Roblin: I agree; the more people who hold that view, the better. It seems to me, however, that the government does its best from time to time to foster a contrary opinion.

Senator Olson: The record shows exactly the opposite of that.

Senator Roblin: The record does not show exactly the opposite of that. The record shows an entire chapter of misused opportunities. I am telling my honourable friend that he is well on the way to missing the opportunity with those mega-projects in Alberta that I spoke about, because he knows—although he may not be willing to admit it to this chamber—that the trend in oil prices today, when added to the trend in interest costs today, makes it quite unlikely that anyone will go ahead on those projects without some substantial re-engineering of the terms and conditions that have been played down by the governments concerned.

My question is devoted to encouraging my honourable friend to apply his undoubted talents to producing a formula that will enable these projects to go ahead.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should simply look at the record and at the terms and conditions, for example, of the new energy agreement which was signed last September 1. The basic price for new oil at January 1, 1980 was slightly under $20, and rose to $45.92. If he does not agree that that change in the basic price constitutes an incentive, then I do not know what he requires. If my honourable friend looks at the netback to the company, which occurs after all of the taxes and other levies have been paid, he will notice that it has doubled from what it was before, which was slightly less than $9 a barrel on conventional oil. If my honourable friend cannot understand that that is a significant incentive to the private sector, I suppose I do not know what would persuade him otherwise.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has very nicely succeeded in mixing up two questions. One question has to do with the price of new discoveries of conventional oil in Alberta, with regard to which he gave the price schedule. The other question has to do with the price to be established for the unconventional production of oil in the tar sands and in the heavy oil sites in western Canada. Those are two quite different questions requiring different price schedules and involving different economic problems, and he knows that perfectly well. He also knows perfectly well that nobody is going to get his $42 a barrel—

● (1440)

Senator Olson: I didn't say $42 a barrel.

Senator Roblin: Well, whatever it is—in new oil discovered, unless they are able to find some, and that brings up the question of cash flow. We debated that before. But I tell my honourable friend that he cannot confuse everybody in this country with his rather ingenious—I won't say "misleading"—statement on that particular topic.

I want to ask my honourable friend another question. The other day the Minister of Finance admitted that the deficit would be larger than the one planned for in his budget. Will my honourable friend give me some reasons why the Minister of Finance made such a statement?

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance made such a statement for a very clear, logical reason, one that I am sure is well known; indeed, I would venture to say that Senator Roblin could remember that from what he read. The Minister of Finance said that when the economy takes a downturn—and that has happened—government revenues go down a bit too; in some cases costs do not. There does not seem to be any mystery to that. That is what the Minister of Finance said.

Let me make one other comment here. My honourable friend seems to want to claim that I am trying to confuse him.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, no, not him; the public.

Senator Olson: Well, I guess that is what happens—

Senator Flynn: You may confuse the public in general, but you will not confuse us; don't worry about that.

Senator Olson: That is what happens, if you cannot follow the completely logical, reasonable scenario with respect to our incentives and what is involved in the development of oil discoveries and oil production programs—and that brings us to his original question, whether it is our objective to achieve self-sufficiency.

It seems to me that he should understand, as I understand very clearly, that that self-sufficiency depends on several components or parts, including further discoveries in the sedimentary basin in western Canada and other places, part of the frontier oil being brought on stream, and also the larger projects in both heavy oil and oil sands. Those have been in the program all along.

I think my honourable friend ought to be a little bit careful when he tries to make the claim that new discoveries, exploration and so on, in Canada are not favourable areas to operate in or make those investments in. Almost everybody who understands the geological data available agrees that the chance of finding oil from exploratory work in Canada is five times greater than in the United States.

Senator Roblin: Of course, my honourable friend forgets that we originally started out by talking about the oil sands in Alberta.

Senator Olson: You talked about oil self-sufficiency.

Senator Roblin: That is right, and I asked whether those oil sands in Alberta were part of the government's program. Then the minister is the one who expanded the terms of the debate.

Senator Flynn: As usual.

Senator Roblin: Yes. No one is saying that it is not profitable or not interesting to invest in oil exploration in Canada. With a 92 per cent government refund in the Canada lands, how could it fail to be interesting? The only question is that in the provincial lands it is only good if you have the money. The argument there is the question of cash flow.

Senator Olson: That is just not the right statement at all. There is what is called the Petroleum Incentive Program in Alberta, which is being administered and paid for by the Province of Alberta. He knows that. He also knows that new oil discoveries in Alberta or Saskatchewan or Manitoba—and there are some in Manitoba, too—come on at a price that is now the new oil price, which is double what it was previous to the agreement, and that the netback to the oil companies is more than double what it was then. Why doesn't he admit those things?

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: They are pretty important incentives.

Senator Flynn: You never admitted during the campaign that you would do that.

Senator Roblin: Well, my honourable friend can make his case, but I will come back to these oil sands in Alberta, because they are the ones that attracted my notice as to whether or not they are part of the campaign, and whether or not they will come on stream in time to enable the government to reach its goal. So we will wait and see what happens at this meeting on Alsands in the next day or two, and we will certainly be asking my honourable friend to give some explanation of what transpires on that occasion.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE EXPORTS TO IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I want now to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development another economic question having to do with the policy of the government with respect to exports of Canadian products of various kinds to countries behind the Iron Curtain.

I want to know what the policy of the government is with respect to subsidies of Canadian exports to these countries, either in terms of the Export Development Corporation's allowing less than market rates of interest or in terms of direct government subsidies, which have already been referred to in another connection. I want to know with respect to future transactions with the Iron Curtain countries whether the government's policy of subsidized exports of one kind or another is to be modified.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, my friend is asking whether or not we will have a hard and fast policy against any calculation that would appear to be a subsidy to the so-called iron curtain countries. He ought to know that there are certain competitive factors out there. One of them is what is commonly referred to as concessional financing. Even though you may have the right product and the capability of delivering it, and so on, one of the fiercest aspects of international competition at the moment is the kind of financing involved. In the list I gave I mentioned the $900 million added to credit mixte so that we can, indeed, be competitive. I am not suggesting that there will be any different policy with respect to that, except that I do know that Canadian exporters, who are trying to make the kinds of deals they have made before, have required us to respond to the situation with respect to concessional financing. I can also tell my honourable friend that there has been a measure of agreement among a number of countries with respect to this concessional financing, so that in terms of lowering rates the competition will not be quite as vigorous as we have experienced in the past.

Senator Roblin: Well, of course, it is much more than a question of these concessional rates that is at issue here, as my honourable friend knows perfectly well. The question is whether or not the government will facilitate the conduct of trade with eastern bloc countries by using economic inducements from the west.

My honourable friend knows perfectly well that the EEC and NATO are at the present time discussing this whole question of the extension of credit to eastern bloc countries. He says that the Canadian policy is vague. I ask him what it is and he says that, well, he doesn't know what it is.

Senator Olson: No, I did not say that.

Senator Roblin: Well, whatever it is, he will have a chance to tell me again what he thinks it is.

I want to know from him whether Canada is taking any part in these discussions within NATO, or in consultation with the EEC or with the United States, concerning this problem of credit in transactions with the eastern bloc countries.

Senator Olson: Yes, Canada is an interested participant in all the NATO discussions, as my honourable friend knows. I hope he does not suggest that I should announce what those

[Senator Roblin.]

NATO countries are going to decide before they have made their decision.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on mega-projects for the minister. He has given us quite an exhaustive reply.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It was just a partial answer.

Senator Flynn: That suits me fine.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You found his reply exhausting, but not exhaustive?

Senator Flynn: I don't think so. The reply was rather exhaustive, but let's say it is incomplete. I suppose the reply to my question will be the same—not exhaustive but just partial.

The minister mentioned a number of major or important projects in both the private and public sectors. Most of them have been announced over the years. Some of them go back ten years now.

Senator Olson: Oh, no.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, certainly. For example, the James Bay project has been on the books for a long time. At any rate, I am asking him now if he will provide the Senate with a list of those important projects, in both the private and public sectors, that have been abandoned or stalled during the last year, for instance, as a result of the high interest policy of the government.

Senator Olson: I think it would be a rather short list.

Senator Flynn: Well, don't decide in advance. Give it to me.

Senator Olson: I could try to look that up, but the other problem—

Senator Flynn: It is important.

Senator Olson: No, no. The problem that the Leader of the Opposition has is, of course, that he says "stalled." Well, what does that mean?

Senator Flynn: I said "abandoned or stalled," and you can start with the Alsands project.

● (1450)

Senator Olson: That matter is under active negotiation. In any event, I like to respond to a question accurately. Senator Bosa asked me for a list of the mega-projects that were under way, and that is what I gave him.

Senator Flynn: But I am asking the minister to provide me with the list for which I have asked. After all, if the object of the government in maintaining high interest rates is to fight inflation, it is only logical to think that some projects will be abandoned, otherwise the policy will have no effect at all. The government speaks of restraint in the public sector, so it accepts that unemployment will rise. But I do not understand how the minister can reconcile what he is saying with the policy of the government with regard to high interest rates. He cannot have it both ways. In any event, will the minister assure me that he will produce the list I have asked for?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that some of the truth is now coming out—

Senator Flynn: And it is coming from me, not you.

Senator Olson: —as to the interpretation and attitude of the opposition to the government's policy. The Leader of the Opposition does not seem to understand that the fight against inflation is to keep prices from rising as rapidly as they have, to dampen the price increases. The only thing in the mind of the honourable senator is that this fight can only be carried on with high levels of unemployment, and so on.

Senator Flynn: That is what you are saying.

Senator Olson: That is the basic difference between the philosophy of the opposition and ours.

Senator Flynn: That is what you are saying.

Senator Olson: I did not say that. That is your interpretation.

Senator Flynn: The government is saying that.

Senator Olson: It would be very difficult for me to do my honourable friend's homework for him—

Senator Flynn: You can't do your own, so how can you do mine?

Senator Olson: —and to try and find out from every company in the country whether they are stalling or abandoning certain projects. I suppose we could make some inquiries, but I know that the Leader of the Opposition has his own interpretation of the matter, and he can probably do his own homework better than I.

Senator Flynn: But how can the honourable senator reconcile the government's policy on high interest rates with unemployment? If everything is going so well as this exhaustive, or, perhaps, better yet, this not-so-exhaustive, list of mega-projects would seem to indicate, how can the minister explain the fact that there are one million Canadians unemployed? For goodness sake, he seems to be satisfied with a very poor situation.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He laughs at the people who are unemployed.

Hon. R. James Balfour: You joke.

Senator Olson: No, I do not. We do not even smile. In fact, we spend our time trying to find solutions to these kinds of problems. We do not sit there like the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: You have had your smile.

Senator Olson: —and come up with the kind of logic of which he and his party are capable, namely, that the only way to fight inflation is with high unemployment, and so on.

Senator Flynn: That is what you say.

Senator Olson: That is not what I said. That is your interpretation.

Senator Asselin: That is the philosophy of the Minister of Finance.

Senator Flynn: The minister should read what the Prime Minister has been saying.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Face up to the facts.

Senator Olson: It is our wish to maximize the job opportunities in this country while, at the same time, slowing down the rate of price increases.

Senator Flynn: But the basis for your job opportunity program is one million unemployed.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Would the Minister of State for Economic Development advise me whether in his list of mega-projects—if, indeed, they can be called mega-projects—there is any money available for the development of the Lower Churchill River, which is so vital in the area of alternative energy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, $200 million has been allocated for the Lower Churchill River hydro development. As my honourable friend knows, there are two prospective sites for development, one at Gull Island and the other at Muskrat Falls, which represent a generating capacity in the order of 2,300 megawatts. Planning is apparently under way, but my honourable friends opposite also know that, first, we must reach some kind of agreement with the Province of Newfoundland with regard to this project.

Senator Marshall: Is the minister saying that subject to agreement the money will be available, or that it is available now?

Senator Olson: I said that $200 million had been provided in the energy budget last fall for that project. If the honourable senator would like more detail as to the state of the negotiations, then I shall have to refer the matter to the minister directly responsible for those discussions.

Senator Marshall: When the minister is ready to sign the agreement, will he follow the same procedure as the Minister of Transport and sign it in a hotel room or with the premier in the House of Assembly?

Senator Olson: I am not sure where the agreement will be signed. Perhaps they will go to the site.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): That is a very important question.

Senator Olson: Perhaps the honourable senator's question has for him some comical overtones, but to me it is very important that the government is acting in a relevant and meaningful way for the economic well-being of Canadians throughout the country. When there are people who would get in the way of the federal government's demonstrating that it is interested and involved in the economic enhancement of this country, then I think we have a responsibility to carry out our job properly.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I hope the minister will entertain a supplementary question on this subject.

Senator Flynn: He is quite entertaining.

Senator Doody: This subject is one of great interest to the Province of Newfoundland. If the $200 million is indeed available for the development of the Gull Island and Muskrat Falls sites on the Churchill River, would the minister inform honourable senators as to the conditions under which this money is available so that we may convey the message to the provincial government and perhaps urge it to co-operate? It is my impression that the Newfoundland government is most anxious to get either project under way and that the problem is one of funding and of transmission. Perhaps the minister could elaborate on the subject.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend has just raised a number of matters which must be negotiated with respect to Newfoundland, and there is also the matter of the transmission line. It seems to me that if the honourable senator already knows as much as he does, then he would also know that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is the minister involved in these discussions and negotiations, is, in fact, carrying on these discussions. I am afraid that I cannot accommodate the honourable senator when he asks that we let all the senators know, because I do not think that he was serious when he suggested that senators be the intermediaries in this matter.

Senator Smith: What's wrong with that?

Senator Marshall: What's wrong with that? That is the whole bloody trouble with regional representation.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, if the Senate is not to be informed of the status of the project, if the representatives of the provinces in the Senate are not to be informed of the status of the project, and if there are so many obstacles to overcome before the project even becomes a project of any size, then why put $200 million in the envelope? Why does the government not put in $500 million and really make a big show, or put $1 billion in and flood the entire outfit? What I mean is, the government obviously does not have anything in sight.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, here again I think we have a difference of philosophy.

Senator Flynn: Are you going to use that one again?

Senator Olson: The $200 million allocation was arrived at after following the usual serious procedures. It was not allocated merely for show, as senators opposite might have done.

Senator Flynn: You are only saying that to convince yourself.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to explore the minister's extraordinary comment that he did not think it was a good idea to let senators know what is going on with regard to the Churchill River project.

Senator Olson: I did not say that.

Senator Smith: Of course you did. It is on the record. The trouble is you do not know what you say most of the time.

Senator Olson: My memory is far more accurate than yours most of the time.

Senator Smith: In any event, if that is the minister's philosophy, then I would like to know the reasoning behind it. I thought that senators were entitled to know all the confidential information, and that it was their duty to find it out, and the minister's duty to pass it out if he can get it.

Senator Olson: And there goes my honourable friend, Senator Smith, again—completely misunderstanding what Senator Doody said and, even worse, my response, which I gave with absolute clarity. I did not say that senators should not make inquiries or seek to be informed. What Senator Doody asked was that senators be the intermediaries. I do not believe that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources needs a senator or anyone else as an intermediary between him and the Government of Newfoundland.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources needs an awful lot of intermediaries if he is going to get these projects going. The honourable gentleman and I can look at Hansard tomorrow and determine which one of us is right, but I say to him again that I think that he will find that he said exactly what I said he said, namely, that it was not a good thing to give information to senators.

● (1500)

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, I said that I said what I said.

Senator Frith: Well said!

Senator Marshall: That is not what you said you said.

Senator Doody: I would ask for clarification.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no—what an optimist.

Senator Doody: Not being absolutely certain about what was said, but if it were said, I am sure that it would have been better said in another forum.

Apparently, $200 million is available for the development for either or both of the Lower Churchill sites. Under what conditions is the $200 million of financing available for the development of these sites and, indeed, is the $200 million a concrete amount? If it is not, I would suggest that a figure of $500 million or $1 billion would be more appropriate. If it is a real figure, under what conditions will that $200 million be made available?

I may not be entitled to convey any information I receive from the minister to the Newfoundland government. Perhaps the honourable ministers opposite have a better rapport with the administration in St. John's than I do, although there are those who might feel that that is not necessarily so.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that amount of $200 million was provided in the Energy envelope and assigned to the development of the Lower Churchill Falls.

I could refer the portion of the question dealing with terms and conditions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I suppose the answer we would receive would be a realistic one, and I like to deal with the real world.

Senator Flynn: Occasionally.

Senator Olson: The answer most likely would be that the terms and conditions under which that funding will be made available will depend on the negotiations which take place between the two levels of government.

Senator Doody: Presumably the terms and conditions will be made known to someone somewhere along the line.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Sometime.

Senator Doody: They may even be attached to the cheque, and that is fine. If the minister or his associate goes to Newfoundland with that $200 million cheque with all the terms and conditions attached, I think I can arrange a meeting at the Hotel Newfoundland, the Confederation Building or anywhere else the minister may choose, because the people of Newfoundland are most anxious to have that or any other project go ahead.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I hope Senator Doody realizes what he has just said. He wants to know the terms and conditions now, and have us announce them unilaterally without negotiation with the Newfoundland government, the owners and future operators of this energy source. I think the honourable senator is not serious in making that request.

Senator Doody: I was very serious. If the honourable minister will now state the terms and conditions under which the government is prepared to spend $200 million, the people of Newfoundland would very much like to know what those terms and conditions are. My comment was certainly not made lightly. My question was: Can he tell us what the $200 million offer entails? It was posed in complete sincerity and in good faith.

It is easy to say that $200 million is available. As I said earlier, why not make the amount $500 million or $1 billion, which, in my opinion, would be a more appropriate figure?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the reply I gave several moments ago completely answers that point.

Senator Doody: I believe I have taken the levity out of the conversation.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development but, before so doing, I would join my honourable friend, Senator Roblin, in commenting on the revised Ministry of Economic and Regional Development.

Those of us who come from that part of Canada which benefited most from DREE realize that, although a lot of good was done industrially and in providing an infrastructure, there seemed to be a lack of cohesion and co-ordination as between the various federal departments. Some line departments that should have been assisting in the development of the Atlantic area were saying, "Leave it to DREE," and were not carrying out their own responsibilities. One hand did not know what the other was doing.

I am delighted to see that there may now be some co-ordination and that our colleague, the Honourable Bud Olson, will be exercising a good deal of influence in pulling it all together.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: He will do it.

Senator Doody: He might look for a transfer.

Senator McElman: My question to the minister has to do with a mega-project which affects the Atlantic provinces and, more particularly, the maritime provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—the TQ&M pipeline.

In the news last night, and again this morning, it was reported that the same type of radical and renegade unions whose blackmail and gangsterism drove up the cost of the Olympics to such an extravagant degree are now exercising their untoward influences upon the workers on the TQ&M pipeline in Quebec. Although the construction of that pipeline very much affects Quebec, it also affects my own province greatly and that of our colleagues from Nova Scotia.

The eventual cost of the gas to be delivered through that pipeline is dreadfully important to the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and, although not so directly, Prince Edward Island.

I am sure that other senators from the maritime provinces share my concern that this gangsterism, which also had a great effect on the costs of the James Bay project, would be permitted. It must not be allowed to destroy the benefits of this mega-project to an area of Canada that desperately needs help and assistance in energy as well as in other areas.

Since this project affects a number of provinces, what action can or will be taken by the Government of Canada, perhaps in concert with the Government of Quebec, to ensure that these people do not get away with their gangsterism which would drive these costs out of sight?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will refer the question to the Minister of Labour for his reply.

The project comes under federal jurisdiction because it crosses provincial borders, thereby making it an interprovincial project. I believe that the labour unions involved are, for the most part, within provincial jurisdictions. They have various sub-contracts and that sort of thing.

Senator Flynn: It is not a question of labour unions coming under a particular jurisdiction; it is a question of whether the work comes under federal or provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Roblin: The work is federal.

Senator Flynn: The work is federal. It does not affect the status of the union.

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary question. The reports which I saw last night and this morning indicate that the union's actions of threatening workers on the job and their families surely fall within the scope of the Criminal Code. It seems to me that this should raise the interest of the federal authority in concert with the provinces to ensure that this action be immediately discontinued.

Senator Olson: I will also take that supplementary question as notice and refer it to the appropriate ministers for their comments and any other more substantive reply, if available.

ENERGY

CONSERVATION PROGRAM—DELAY IN PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Marshall on December 10. At that time he asked about urea formaldehyde insulation. He asked for an investigation into the delays in processing applications under the Energy Conservation Program instituted in the Atlantic provinces.

In September, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, announced the official launching of the Atlantic Energy Conservation Investment Program (AECIP) which is aimed at accelerating energy conservation by private enterprise in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. In Nova Scotia, a similar program is already in existence under DREE through the Canada-Nova Scotia Subsidiary Agreement for Energy Conservation.

AECIP will provide, over a five-year period, a total of $42 million in taxable grants for eligible energy conservation projects proposed by industry, business and private institutions.

According to Energy, Mines and Resources officials in the eastern region, in December 1981, when Senator Marshall posed his question, a backlog of 25 AECIP applications existed. This backlog was directly attributable to difficulties encountered in staffing some of the professional positions in the EMR regional office. Vacant positions are currently in the process of being staffed and this should result in the expeditious processing of applications in future.

OIL EXPLORATION—SAFETY OF MARINE DRILL RIGS—EFFECT OF LOSS OF OCEAN RANGER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some further information on the Ocean Ranger disaster.

A Globe and Mail news item of February 16, under the heading "Rig Accident is a Set-Back for East Coast," draws attention to the delays that the loss of the drilling rig Ocean Ranger will cause in the east coast offshore development program. Drilling rigs of this type are in short supply because of the recent surge in exploration world wide.

[Senator Flynn.]

The $50-million Ocean Ranger was the biggest rig of its kind in the world. It was owned and operated by Odeco Drilling of Canada, an affiliate of Ocean Drilling and Exploration Co. of New Orleans, and built by Mitsubishi Heavy Industries Ltd. of Hiroshima, Japan in 1976. It was designed to operate in water depths of 1,500 feet and to drilling depths of 25,000 feet. It had worked off Alaska and the United States east coast before moving to Newfoundland 14 months ago. It was supposed to be capable of withstanding winds of up to 170 kilometres an hour and 110-foot waves, although the storm at the time was reported to be of considerably less force, 125-kilometre winds and 50-foot waves.

The numerous media reports on the accident do not refer to another factor relative to the matter of a possible setback for east coast oil development. This is the question of year-round operations. This was posed yesterday by one of the honourable senators. Up until 1980, drilling was stopped for four months during the winter season. The question may now be raised as to whether the reduced drilling season should now be reinstated.

The accident also raises a question about Mobil's proposal that production could be based on floating platforms. Ocean Ranger, being a semi-submersible rig, was in effect a floating platform. The plan would be to store oil on floating production platforms at well sites and remove it by tanker to land transportation facilities rather than by sea bottom pipelines. The Ocean Ranger accident therefore raises both exploration and production questions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government with respect to questions on the Order Paper. I should like to ask when I might expect an answer to Question No. 59, which has been on the Order Paper since April 1, 1981. That question has to do with President Reagan's visit. I am wondering if I can have an answer to that question before Her Majesty the Queen visits Canada, because I might have some questions to put on the Order Paper regarding her official visit.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Is the honourable senator suggesting that the answer might be forthcoming on the first anniversary of its being put on the Order Paper? We hope to have it before then.

Senator Marshall: I would like to have it tomorrow.

ELECTRICITY AND GAS INSPECTION BILL

THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-11, intituled: "An Act relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in my name because we suspended debate on it while the point on the Interpretation Act is being considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs with respect to Bill C-45. That committee will meet tomorrow. There might be a chance of having a report from that committee on Tuesday, but not before then. I suggest that this order stand until at least next Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the inquiry of Senator Lamontagne calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution," tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1980.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, in November 1980 Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, tabled a report entitled "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution". That report was prepared by a subcommittee of that standing Senate committee, which subcommittee was chaired by Senator Lamontagne. Senator Lamontagne spoke brilliantly at that time and gave us an overview of the report. He dealt briefly with Part I, entitled "Toward a Renewed Federation: A New Federal-Provincial Council," and Part II, "Toward a Renewed Senate". Senators Everett and Marshall spoke on this and did an excellent job of drawing attention to various aspects of the report.

I had the honour of leading the group which prepared Part II, and it is my purpose now to speak to you concerning that part of the report entitled "Toward a Renewed Senate". I suspect that announcing that intention is tantamount to administering a sleeping potion not only to you, honourable senators, but—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We don't need it here.

Senator Stanbury: —to the people in the public galleries, if any; and I notice that my good wife and secretary have at least swelled the ranks!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stanbury: One has to bring one's own fan club. It is also tantamount to administering a sleeping potion to those in the press gallery, if any—and there is none—

Senator Flynn: As usual. At least you won't be misquoted.

Senator Stanbury: —and, indeed, tantamount to administering a sleeping potion to the people of Canada.

As Senator Marshall asked last evening, how many speeches have been spoken, how many articles have been written, how many committees have been struck and how many political promises have been made since Confederation dedicated to this important purpose? Yet here we are, largely unreformed, talking about it again.

Why do I think that we and the Canadian people might take it more seriously this time? True, those who grace this chamber have demonstrated their devotion to Canada, both before their appointment to the Senate and since. They respect themselves and the parliamentary process in which they are privileged to participate, and want to do the best and the most they can for their country during their parliamentary career. So, they want this chamber to be constructive and organized so as to allow them to make the greatest possible contribution. But so did their predecessors, and the reforms they accomplished were not very impressive.

I think there is a difference now. Much as we hated being forced to think about our Constitution, our civil rights and parliamentary institutions, we have finally begun to understand that they are the foundation upon which we must build our nation. We cannot live together in peace until we decide what the rules are. We cannot build a strong society without knowing our respective rights. We cannot build a vigorous economic base until we decide who owns what, the areas of responsibility, and how we can make it all work. We will be able to do none of those things until we have democratic institutions which reflect the aspirations of the people and provide inspired leadership.

This is a proud time for Canadians. It is the greening of Canada. It is our adolescence as a nation, and we have all the painful symptoms of that, but we are determined to mature, and mature we will.

Senator Lamontagne has shown us how our first ministers must mature from a caterwauling bunch of scrappy kids into a responsible and constructive federal-provincial council. We must have that institution. The first ministers will never abdicate their power in favour of any other institution. I believe that anyone who thinks otherwise is hopelessly naive. They need the publicity; they need the association in the public media with other first ministers; and, to be fair, they must retain the responsibility for the resolution of the national issues which mean the most to their electorate. In any event, those are not issues which can be dealt with in any kind of legislative body: they are for executive negotiation, followed by legislative implementation.

● (1520)

Assuming that sooner or later our leaders will accept the need for a federal-provincial council, what kind of Senate is required, if any?

Let us answer the first implied concern immediately. Do we need a Senate at all? Can a single parliamentary chamber, elected on a modified rep-by-pop basis, as in Canada, do everything that needs to be done in a legislative sense for the people of Canada? Can it do justice to the policy considerations in proposed legislation, and, at the same time, see that the law works well mechanically? Can it take the time to investigate the operation of government and the large and long-term issues? Does it have the manpower to handle all of the international and national parliamentary responsibilities and fulfil all the requirements of public leadership? Can it keep track of the propriety of regulations and the other acquisitive proclivities of the executive and the public service? Can it safeguard the implementation of human and language rights?

Even if it could do all those things, would it be wise? Perhaps the best answer is to say that every federal democracy in the world, even the newest of them, has felt that the course of wisdom requires two legislative chambers.

It may have something to do with our aversion to putting all our eggs in one basket, or it may just be our feeling that the public should never find itself entirely in the hands of one group of people, no matter how conscientious and responsible, who make all the rules, have responsibility for administering them, reviewing them, revising them, and then determining how much information is dispensed to allow the public to judge their work and their behaviour. Somehow, two seem better than one.

Why, then, is there not unanimous praise for the role played by the Senate in Canada? E. D. Briggs, in The Senate: Reform or Reconstruction, said:

The truth, of course, is that the Senate has long been badly misrepresented by both the general public and by many political scientists.

F. A. Kunz says that the vast majority of criticisms of the Senate have been based on misunderstandings of what the Senate is or was intended to be, of the nature of the political process in Canada, or of the contribution which the upper house has made to government.

It would be maudlin and foolish of us to take comfort in such statements. If we intend to respond to the need for vigorous institutions to serve Canadians during the vigorous future which faces us, then we must recognize that we can indeed make this chamber more vital and more useful to our people.

As McGregor Dawson said:

—the Senate can be improved in so many ways that the multitude of alternatives smothers any particular measure of reform which may be advanced.

It was the task of our committee to identify the handicaps under which the Senate now operates and to choose, from among the alternatives, reforms which could overcome those handicaps. McGregor Dawson helped us to identify the handicaps. He said:

The first great handicap which was placed on the Senate at Confederation was the system under which its members were appointed.

Since we are all products of "the system," it may be comforting, even if a little self-serving, to note that most authors hasten to state that—in the view of the author, of course—some appointments have been excellent, some have furnished the Senate with certain expertise, with representation of ethnic and religious minorities, with spokesmen for the provinces with certain qualifications, with members with a municipal background, with certain individuals of high intellect and political experience, and so on. Since I am sure that each of us feels that he falls within one of these apparently attractive categories—

An Hon. Senator: All of them!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Just one?

Senator Stanbury: —it makes one wonder just who are the appointees about whom the journalists and political scientists complain. They certainly are not journalists and political scientists, and clearly not us.

However, the question of the method of appointment persists. It is a natural question in a society which sees itself as the paragon of freedom and democracy. How else does one explain the insistence by some that we do not need a charter of rights? Some honourable senators have called for an elected Senate. Senator Everett came down on the side of a Senate elected on a proportional basis. I am not sure that everyone understands just what is meant by a proportional vote. The classic system, as used in Europe, requires each party to put forward a list of its candidates, chosen by the party, not by the people. The percentage of the vote gained by the party then determines the number of those named on the list, from the top down, to be elected to office. It is not a direct election of candidates known to the electorate. It is the indirect election of those who form the establishment of the party, with the assurance that, as long as they can maintain that position, they will continue to be the candidate at the top of the list.

Even in the European nations which have had many years of experience with this system of election, there is great unhappiness with the result. One of the causes of the attempted coup in Spain, I am told, was the fact that the members of Congress were not answerable directly to the electors. No matter how the people vote, they cannot get rid of the people at the top of each party list.

In my opinion, that is not a system that will be useful in our Canadian system of democracy. It will be at least as frustrating and as lacking in credibility as is appointment to the Senate at the present time. If we can improve the method of appointment and get public understanding of the complementary nature of a senator's role, we will arouse fewer false expectations and give better service to the Canadian people in the areas of competence of the Senate.

As a matter of fact, my own inclination, and that expressed by a number of other honourable senators, is to call for an elected Senate just to stop all the carping criticism based upon our appointed status. There are two problems. First, of course, it will not stop the carping criticism. Election has not stopped the complaints about the House of Commons. Secondly, I have come to the conclusion that such a radical change in our system would do much more harm and much less good than a thoughtful and properly motivated reform of this body. Any more radical step would certainly have to be taken after, or at least in lock-step with substantial reform in the House of Commons and other governmental institutions.

The committee came to the conclusion that, to the extent that we continue to be committed to the pattern of the British parliamentary system, an elected Senate would be frustrated and frustrating unless it were a replica of the House of Commons, with similar roles and powers; and, in that event, a very different kind of governmental structure would have to be envisioned. Radical change in the Senate is not, by itself, going to do much to improve our parliamentary system.

We opted for substantial reform of an appointed Senate. In proposing those reforms, we accepted, as fundamental and unchangeable, certain principles upon which the Senate must operate:

1. The clear supremacy of the House of Commons.
2. The impossibility of radically changing the method of distributing the seats in the Senate.
3. The complementary role of the Senate: Legislative revision; delay rather than rejection of legislation to permit the development of public consensus; the investigation of major questions; the monitoring of executive and bureaucratic behaviour; acting as one of the forums for focusing federal attention on regional and minority interests; and providing continuing surveillance of the way in which human and language rights are being observed.

In recognition of the supremacy of the House of Commons, the committee recommended that the power of the Senate be limited to that of a suspensive veto, which would be overcome only on the expiry of six months, the reintroduction of the legislation in the House of Commons and its passage there. During such a period of suspension, the government, the House of Commons and the people would have the opportunity to develop a consensus so that the Senate would no longer be, in that respect, the chamber of sober second thought but, rather, the vehicle through which our democratic processes could be made more effective by creating the opportunity for sober second thought by the electorate.

● (1530)

The committee also suggested other ways in which the working relationship between the House of Commons and the Senate might be improved, such as the extension of the conference system, the broadening of the use of the Hayden formula, the narrower definition of money bills to allow initiation of legislation in the Senate to become more common.

We accepted the proposition that the present method of distribution of the seats of the Senate is difficult, if not impossible, to change. That does not mean that it cannot be modified. But anyone who now suggests that we follow the American model and go to equal representation in the Senate from each province and territory included in the federation does not understand the history and make-up of Canada.

Quebec must always have a substantial representation in the Senate. So must the maritimes and Newfoundland. The fact that the western provinces and the territories have been unfairly treated is a matter to be remedied. The growth of population and economic power in the west entitles that region to much greater representation. We would provide for it by increasing the membership of the Senate to 126 from the present 104, with a doubling of the representation from Alberta and British Columbia and an increase of two-thirds in the representation from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. We have proposed an upward adjustment of the representation from Newfoundland and we should envision a further increase in numbers from the territories as their status progresses.

We have accepted the fact that the Senate must play a complementary role. It must continue to perform its function of legislative revision and review, using its right of delay to ensure correction and consideration. Its investigative role should be expanded and enlivened at the initiative of honourable senators. The standing committees of the Senate should ordinarily institute and carry on investigations in the fields assigned to them by the Rules of the Senate, as already do the Standing Committees on National Finance, on Agriculture and on Foreign Affairs.

The committee drew attention to a number of ways in which the Senate, contrary to its image, has given special emphasis to regional concerns and problems. We also recognized that it does not lie within the province of the Senate to resolve all regional difficulties. It can only play its part in concert with the performance of other players.

However, more systematic attempts must be made to reconcile the national interest with regional aspirations. The federal-provincial council proposed in Part I of our report would no doubt make the most significant contribution in this respect. The assignment to the Senate of a specific role in the Constitution would allow it to look, on a systematic basis, at the regional impact of federal policies and to supply a forum where regional grievances would be heard. To begin that process even now, we could form ourselves into all-party regional caucuses acting as sounding boards, identifying the changing aspirations, needs and grievances of the Canadian regions and monitoring the attitudes of provincial governments and legislatures toward federal legislation and programs. A new standing committee on regional affairs, of which the nucleus would be the chairmen of the various regional caucuses, would give substance to these considerations and would create a forum for their discussion in public.

The feeling of the committee was that the Senate could do much more than it has done for the protection of minority rights—

Senator Flynn: You can say that again.

Senator Stanbury: —and, more particularly, linguistic minorities. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms will not solve all the problems of these minorities. Moreover, the federal linguistic policies and programs require a more systematic parliamentary review than they have received in the past.

There is at the moment a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Official Languages, but the Senate could exercise a watch-dog role on a continuing basis if honourable senators were to accept the recommendation of the committee to establish a standing committee on official languages made up of equal numbers of French-speaking and English-speaking senators.

In much the same way, the Senate should have a standing committee on human rights, with a specified procedure for dealing efficiently with those issues. Perhaps the most important and, at the same time, most neglected danger to our democratic processes comes from the unsupervised activities of our executive and public service. An enormous amount of legislation, and important legislation, is really made by regulation or other statutory instruments of the Governor in Council under authority supposedly granted by Parliament. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has lately begun to subject them to meticulous scrutiny according to a comprehensive list of specific criteria. But its only power is to report, and even if the committee reports that in its opinion a regulation or other statutory instrument is completely invalid, nothing happens. The instrument remains in force unless and until it is successfully challenged in the courts.

Your committee believes that the Senate could be a powerful instrument for the protection of the rights of the citizen whenever those rights are invaded by any form of subordinate legislation. The protection of such rights ought to be a major activity of a reformed Senate and it should be given the power to make such protection effective. If the Senate is to be expected to perform its present duties in a more effective way and add to its responsibilities the exacting tasks which the committee recommends, it will have to consist of a body of men and women who have not only the capability but also the experience, the desire and the dedication to the well-being of the Canadian people to accept and perform these duties.

That brings us back to the method of appointment. We rejected the idea of the West German Bundesrat, which is made up entirely of the ministers of the provincial governments, because there is no similarity between the division of powers in Germany and in Canada. A Senate constructed like the Bundesrat would simply become a tool for provincial disallowance of federal legislation at a time when there is general agreement that there should no longer be federal disallowance of provincial legislation. In Canada the provinces are powerful units with their own clear areas of jurisdiction. In Germany almost all legislative power resides in the federal government.

We rejected the idea of a House of the Provinces, which would destroy the complementary role of the upper chamber as part of the federal legislative process. The Bill C-60 proposal would have made it a paper tiger, and that of the Government of British Columbia, a predatory lion. We recognized, however, that, if the Senate is to be given a role defined in the Constitution, calling upon it to deal effectively with regional and provincial concerns, and if we are going to organize ourselves on the basis of all-party regional caucuses and operate effectively a standing committee on regional affairs, then we need a close tie to, and the goodwill of, the provincial governments.

As a result, we recommend that all appointments to the Senate should continue to be made by the federal government, but that every second appointment should be made from a list of names submitted by the government of the province or territory concerned, and that consideration be given to filling a due proportion of the early vacancies from such lists.

To make sure that the procedure for evening-up the representation does not take too long, we propose that specific measures should be taken to encourage the retirement of the few senators who still have life tenure and who have reached age 75, and of others below that age under certain conditions. New appointments should be made for a 10-year term but renewable for further terms of five years on the recommendation, by secret ballot, of a special committee of the Senate—the purpose, of course, being to retain our independence and, at the same time, to develop a certain incentive in senators to impress their colleagues with their useful expenditure of energy.

For similar purposes, but also in pursuit of fairness, we propose that the retirement provisions applying to judges be implemented for members of the Senate. Any senator who has attained the age of 65 years and has been serving for at least 15 years, or who has attained the age of 70 years and has been a senator for at least 10 years, should be entitled to resign on full pension with the usual pension for his widow or her widower. A further incentive to attend would be that any senator who fails for two successive years to attend at least one-third of the sittings of the Senate in each of those years should forfeit his or her seat. That is a considerably different provision from the one under which we now operate, which provides that a senator forfeits his seat only if he fails to attend at all for two consecutive sessions.

If you adopt the recommendations of the committee, the property qualification for membership in the Senate would be dropped. There would no longer be a division of Quebec into senatorial districts, and the requirement that Quebec senators have their residence in a particular district would disappear.

Honourable senators, that deals with most of the reforms mentioned in the report. Senator Marshall pointed out last night that many of the reforms could be carried out by honourable senators without any action on the part of others. Immediate action should be taken in this house to implement those reforms.

There is no good reason why we should not take suspensive action on legislation where we cannot get satisfactory action or undertakings from the government. If we can reject legislation, it should not be beyond our genius or our jurisdiction to suspend it.

We can enter into negotiations with the government and the House of Commons to develop the system of conferences between the two houses, to extend the operation of the Hayden formula, to get a narrower definition of money bills and to initiate more legislation in the Senate.

We can certainly extend our investigative activities. We can organize ourselves into all-party regional caucuses and begin the process of setting up the new standing committees on regional affairs, official languages, and human rights. The first step would be to initiate a study of the possible terms of reference for such structures.

We could survey our need for various types of expertise to allow us to carry on our work in the Senate, and urge the Prime Minister to have those requirements in mind when filling existing vacancies. We could request that he seek proposals for appointments from provincial premiers.

We could request legislation to change our retirement provisions to accord with those of the judges and make other provisions to encourage the retirement of those unable to participate fully in the work of the Senate.

With an enlarged Senate, with a new rationale for appointment, with new challenges in terms of responsibilities, with fresh opportunities for contact with and service to the public, your committee believes that the renewed Senate, conscious of the limitations under which it operates but determined to play an important role in the burgeoning growth of a new and independent Canada, will earn and keep the confidence of the people of Canada.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

MUNICIPALITY OF SOURIS—PRONUNCIATION

On the tabling of:

Memoranda of Agreement between the Government of Canada and (1) the Government of the Province of Alberta; (2) the Government of the Province of Manitoba; (3) the Municipality of Digby in the Province of Nova Scotia; (4) the Municipality of Souris in the Province of Prince Edward Island; and (5) the Government of Saskatchewan and certain municipalities in the Province of Saskatchewan, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, Chapter R-9, R.S.C. 1970.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, as a total non-expert in the French language, may I say that in Prince Edward Island, the word "Souris" is, for some reason pronounced "Source" while in Manitoba, where I used to live, it is pronounced "Souriss".

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I betrayed my western background there.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 18, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill C-45, intituled: An Act to amend the Pest Control Products Act, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, February 10, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H. Carl Goldenberg,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Bird be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator McIlraith on the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I inquire of the Leader of the Government whether we in the chamber will be deprived today of the presence of his three colleagues in the ministry? What shall we do without them?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, one may still nurture the hope that our distinguished colleagues will be here before our deliberations have ceased this afternoon.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What about Question Period?

Senator Flynn: We might as well adjourn the house now.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MCCRACKEN REPORT—STATUS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it deals with the McCracken report which was initiated by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Mr. McCracken was commissioned to look into the reasons for delay in the processing of pension applications, and the report was due a few days ago. I would ask that the Leader of the Government inquire as to its status and let us know, so that we of the very industrious Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science may take the necessary action.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROJECTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it the policy of the federal government to offer to expend new money, particularly on job creation projects, in provinces which agree to impose public service wage guidelines?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the recent meeting of first ministers, the Prime Minister suggested to his provincial counterparts that all levels of government exercise restraint in respect to those wage and salary areas under their jurisdiction—the public service, crown corporations and so on. The Prime Minister suggested to the premiers that this effort by both levels of government would free up additional amounts of money which could be used productively and beneficially to alleviate unemployment in the country and to stimulate the economy.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You have not answered the question.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. There is some speculation in the Leader of the Government's home province of British Columbia that an announcement may be made tonight by the premier of his province indicating the imposition of public sector wage guidelines in British Columbia. As I understand it, the premier is also to announce some other programs forthcoming from the federal government as a result of the imposition of those guidelines. Would the Leader of the Government please elaborate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, no specific arrangement has been made with the Province of British Columbia of the type described by the honourable senator. No package deal of the kind described has been offered to British Columbia or to any other province. However, I can report that last Thursday the Minister of Employment and Immigration sent telex messages to all the provinces urging them to participate in an employment-creating program which would see unemployment insurance payments to certain workers who are unemployed bonused, improved, or increased through the co-operation of provincial governments engaging in parallel action. In this way, a substantial number of unemployed workers could be put back to work on projects relating primarily to resource industries in the provinces.

To date, responses have not been received from a number of provinces. Some interest has been expressed by the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba and Ontario, which, of course, had entered into an agreement with the federal government. There has been no response from the other provinces.

Senator Nurgitz: I take it, then, that in the telex sent to the various ministers across the country there was no indication of the imposition of public sector guidelines?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no reference in the telex to the conditions described by Senator Nurgitz. Indeed, I would be pleased to table the telex message sent to the premiers.

• (1415)

Senator Roblin: If the Province of British Columbia does announce wage guidelines for its civil servants, is it the intention of the Government of Canada to follow suit?

Senator Perrault: As Senator Roblin, with his experience in provincial government, is aware, it would be highly desirable to have united action on the part of both federal and provincial governments. The provincial budgets combined and in aggregate, together with municipal budgets, are larger than the total federal budget. A really effective economic policy would see a common thrust to meet some of these problems.

If there were that type of reaction from the Province of British Columbia and from other provinces, there would be a very positive response on the part of the federal government.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend care to expand a little on that answer and tell us what would constitute sufficient inducement for the federal government to consider imposing on itself the policy that it recommends for others? How many provinces would have to adopt wage and price guidelines before the Prime Minister would be induced to follow suit and take his own advice?

Senator Perrault: I reject the notion that the Government of Canada has not exercised restraint in the areas under its responsibility. When one bears in mind that the total federal budget amounts to about $50 billion, with total federal discretion applying to something like 14 per cent of that amount, it is obvious that the task cannot be done by the federal government alone. Programs such as this must enjoy the co-operation of the provincial governments. However, I will be prepared to make a statement on government policy to the Senate on this point.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for that assurance because, surely, the wages paid to federal civil servants is an area which does come under the control of the federal government. In view of the lead given by the Prime Minister at the recent conference in inviting the leaders of the provinces to impose such a set of guidelines, one is curious to know under what circumstances he might consider doing it himself.

Senator Perrault: That question will be dealt with in the statement I will bring to the Senate.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, perhaps I am leading to and expecting another statement from the Leader of the Government in the Senate when I allude to an issue that has troubled me for a long time and on which I have been asking questions for a long time. I refer, of course, to federal government financing of the educational institutions in our country.

I note with great anxiety, as the leader must, that university heads are quite disturbed about the prospects for the future. In the face of all the controversy concerning which level of government gets credit for doing what and the more important issue as to the grim or glum future for our university students, would the minister, who has no specific departmental responsibilities—nor should he have, since he has a very important role in representing this house in government—bring to the attention of his cabinet colleagues the concept that, before it is too late, there might be put in place in this country a meeting of federal, provincial and university people to look at the present situation and what is contemplated in reference to Established Programs Financing? Would he also bring to their attention all the other aspects of the budget which are frightening university students, and, I think, rightly so?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The views of Senator Macquarrie will be brought to the attention of my colleagues in government. He has advanced an interesting and, perhaps, useful idea.

Senator Macquarrie: As a supplementary question, and to add further to the consideration given by the minister, and in the spirit of a comment in my old school book that one good turn deserves another, among his colleagues, it is my view that, considering the contradictory jurisdictions, our own leader may be the man to deal with the provinces and the universities. He may very well be the man to offer leadership in this matter and to preside over the conference.

[Senator Perrault.]

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CAPITAL OUTFLOW

Hon. R. James Balfour: Would the Minister of State for Economic Development explain, if he can, why the outflow of Canadian capital in 1981 was six times greater than the average outflow of Canadian capital during the entire decade of the 1970s?

• (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will take that question as notice. It seems to me that the honourable senator is asking for some technical reason, and perhaps more than that, so I will take the question as notice because of the manner in which it was asked.

Senator Balfour: Contrary to what the Minister of State for Economic Development has said, this is a fundamental economic indicator for the Canadian economy. Surely the Minister of State for Economic Development would have at his fingertips both the statistics and some information as to why this phenomenon occurred.

Senator Olson: That may be, but the honourable senator has given me some figures, and usually one would like to check to see if it is six times greater than some other figure. He wants me to give reasons before I have even seen the analysis. That is why I have taken the question as notice.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question concerns the recent tragic loss of Ocean Ranger. In view of the claims of the Province of Newfoundland to jurisdiction in the offshore area and its imposing regulations therefor, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us what, if any, Newfoundland provincial regulations exist with respect to the inspection and certification of seaworthiness of offshore oil drilling rigs; and whether, the province in fact, carried out any such inspections to certify Ocean Ranger.

I should also like to ask him what, if any, search and rescue facilities the Province of Newfoundland maintains; and, if it does, what part those facilities played following the loss of Ocean Ranger.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had intended to provide further information on the Ocean Ranger tragedy by way of a delayed answer later this day. If I may have the indulgence of honourable senators, I will provide information on that at that time.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATOR—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin. It is rather lengthy, so perhaps it may be taken as read.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows):

Dr. Gilson's terms of reference will be tabled by the Minister of Transport in the House of Commons as soon as possible. They are now being drawn up.

My response in the Senate to Senator Roblin was quite proper. The government has issued no instructions to Dr. Gilson to conduct the meetings with various interest groups in camera. The response being used by the Department of Transport is that Dr. Gilson and the other participants in the process who have been canvassed favoured holding the meetings in private. They felt closed meetings would provide a positive and constructive atmosphere in which to conduct the talks and avoid the posturing that so often accompanies television cameras.

Similarly with Senator Roblin's questions on the provinces, there were no instructions issued by the federal government to Dr. Gilson to exclude the provinces. Rather, when the process was devised it was decided that although grain handling and transportation is a federal jurisdiction, the Government of Canada will consult with the provinces.

It is clearly stated in the policy statement that "the Government of Canada will explain to the provincial governments the essential elements of the initiative it is taking."

Mr. Pepin has already met with two Manitoba ministers, the Hon. Bill Uruski, Minister of Agriculture, and the Hon. Sam Uskiw, Minister of Highways, and their officials to discuss the matter. He met with Alberta's Minister of Economic Development, the Hon. Hugh Planché, days before the announcement to explain its general thrust. The Deputy Minister of Transport met with Marj Benson, Associate Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and with officials associated with the Government of Saskatchewan, as well as Gerry Gartner, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Howard Leeson, Deputy Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, and a representative of the Premier's office after the announcement to explain its essential elements.

It is also clear in the policy statement that as the process proceeds, the government will wish to discuss with the provincial governments "possible complementary measures in their own spheres of jurisdiction". Such items, if any, will evolve as the talks continue.

As to whether Dr. Gilson's findings are binding, obviously he will make recommendations to cabinet which is charged with the final decision. That is the way the democratic process works in this country. Therefore, my response in Hansard of February 16 was entirely appropriate.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as the Ocean Ranger situation is concerned, on the basis of preliminary inquiries, may I say that apparently Newfoundland has its own regulations with respect to the certification and inspection of the seaworthiness of offshore oil drilling rigs. The Province of Newfoundland claims to have carried out such inspection necessary for the granting of licences.

As far as officials at Transport Canada can determine, the Province of Newfoundland does not maintain its own search and rescue facilities.

It should be emphasized that both of these questions will probably be covered by the Commission of Inquiry to be chaired by Chief Justice Hickman, but certainly, honourable senators, the questions are very interesting and important.

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Asselin on February 17 concerning the proposed sale of Nordair to Quebecair. It may be informative for honourable senators to see the letter from the Minister of Transport to Mr. Claude Taylor, President of Air Canada. I ask that it be incorporated into today's record as an appendix.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of letter see Appendix "A", p. 3657.)

• (1425)

I believe it is self-explanatory in response to Senator Asselin's questions on the subject. If that is satisfactory, I would be pleased to provide copies of that correspondence in both French and English.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—VISIT BY COMMONS SUBCOMMITTEE—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION BY SENATORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Flynn on February 17 concerning the fact-finding trip to El Salvador.

We have looked into the matter. This is a House of Commons trip and the members on this visit will represent the House of Commons Subcommittee on the Caribbean and Latin America. Since senators are not members of this subcommittee, I do not see how they could go along on this particular visit. However, if honourable senators determine that there should be Senate representation on this visit to El Salvador, the best course of action would be to make that proposal to our Foreign Affairs Committee, and then a separate trip, funded by the Senate, might be organized. The initiative would have to have the approval of the Senate, and a submission would have to go forward to the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee to secure the necessary funds for the visit.

POLAND—SHIPMENTS OF CANADIAN WHEAT

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator Roblin and Senator Flynn on February 2 concerning Canada's position with regard to the sale of grain to Poland, and the credit terms.

The credit limit for the sale of Canadian grain to Poland was increased by $500 million to $1.225 billion in October 1981. This limit will provide sufficient credit for Poland to import the maximum quantities of grain called for under the long-term government-to-government agreement which expires on December 31, 1982.

The major western creditors of Poland agreed in March 1981 to a multilateral rescheduling over eight years, with a four-year grace period, of 90 per cent of Poland's principal and interest payments, which were due between May 1 and December 31, 1981. The amounts due to the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of grain sold under the long-term agreement accounted for the bulk of the moneys owed to Canada.

The government is maintaining the current line of credit for grain for Poland.

The government will honour its long-term agreement which provides for sales of up to 1.5 million tonnes of grain to Poland during 1982.

The Canadian government, along with other western governments, is monitoring the Polish financial situation closely.

The Polish government is making payments to its creditors when and as possible, including payments to the Canadian Wheat Board, under the rescheduling arrangement.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question arising from that reply. Is it a fact that the moneys that might be owed by Poland to the Canadian Wheat Board are fully guaranteed, as to repayment, by the Government of Canada itself?

Senator Argue: That is correct. The accounts of the Canadian Wheat Board are in no way in jeopardy. The moneys are guaranteed by the Government of Canada.

EDUCATION

CONCERN FOR FUTURE OF POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS— DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 2, 1981, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to the widespread expressions of concern from educational leaders concerning the future of post-secondary institutions in Canada, in particular with reference to governmental grants.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I think it was useful, indeed, for Senator Macquarrie to initiate this inquiry on December 2 last. I am sure that he is correct, in the words of the inquiry that he used, that there are "widespread expressions of concern from educational leaders concerning the future of post-secondary institutions in Canada, in particular with reference to governmental grants."

● (1430)

I would like to make some comments on the inquiry which I think will have the effect of putting the problem in a fairer perspective, particularly insofar as the role of the federal government is concerned with relation to the roles of the several provinces of Canada.

Almost exactly nine years ago—on February 14, 1973, in fact—I made what I thought was a major speech in this chamber on post-secondary education. At that time I traced the history of the participation of the federal government in the financing of post-secondary education from the time that Mr. St. Laurent first started to talk about direct federal government support to the universities in 1950. These grants were initiated on a modest scale in 1951 and since that time have improved continuously, though there have been significant variations in the basis on which they were made and on which they operate.

Honourable senators, that speech was made prior to the last modification of the established programs financing arrangements, which was made in 1977, and which program expires at the end of this fiscal year, being the end of March 1982. I shall refer to the effects of some of these changes later on in my address to you.

In my speech of more than nine years ago I dealt with this question of the federal government's responsibility for post-secondary education. I wish to refer briefly to one or two paragraphs that I read into the record at that time. I pointed out that:

It is generally stated that section 93 of the British North America Act charges the provincial governments with the exclusive responsibility to make laws in relation to education in and for each province. However—and I stress this point—it is rather interesting that the inclusion of section 93 was rather to guarantee the rights of certain denominational schools in various parts of Canada than to allot, assign or apportion financial responsibility. It is also interesting to note, while it was quite clear that section 93 charged the provincial legislatures with the responsibility for education, that at the time the Fathers of Confederation thought the ultimate safeguard, in the event that provincial legislators did not do their work properly, was an appeal to, or an intervention by, the Government of Canada through the Governor General-in-Council.

Section 93 was included in the British North America Act, in my judgment, for a very special purpose. We have to look to the great sections 91 and 92, which divide the legislative responsibility among the federal government and the provinces. We have to consider the importance of the "peace, order and good government" provisions of section 91, and the various provisions of section 92, chiefly the "property and civil rights" one. Without prolonging this argument, I think that my friend, Dr. J. A. Corry, the former principal of Queen's, and one of the most distinguished constitutional experts in Canada, summed it up extremely well when he said that the provincial legislature must speak for the province, but the "federal government must speak for the nation." In Dr. Corry's view, section 93 of the British North America Act refers to the powers of the legislature "in and for each province," but Parliament has the requisite competence over needs that transcend provincial boundaries under the "peace, order and good government" clause. Dr. Corry is not the first person to make that observation, but, as he usually does, he makes it succinctly and well.

Honourable senators, I will not continue that argument today. I recognize that it is still an unpopular political argument to maintain that the federal government has the direct right to intervene in post-secondary education. However, the facts of the last 30 years have put the federal government in a very important position indeed with respect to the financing of post-secondary education. I point out that the first federal monies that went to post-secondary institutions—excluding certain technical and vocational education and certain expenditures made by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Labour, along with some other specialized concerns which the federal government has been occupied with since before 1919 or thereabouts, certainly since the National Research Council was established and became a granting agency—were the grants instituted by Mr. St. Laurent in 1951, which were direct grants to the universities. These grants were distributed to the universities through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, or its predecessor institution, which had a slightly different name. These continued as direct grants to the universities until 1967.

In 1967 the original cost-sharing post-secondary transfer program, whereby the federal government assisted the provinces, came into existence. It was designed to help meet the escalating demands arising from the baby boom of the 1950s. Honourable senators, that may be an over-simplification, but it is roughly true. The transfer was based on the greater of 50 per cent of post-secondary operating costs incurred in the province or $15 per capita. The per capita amount increased at the rate of growth of total post-secondary operating costs in all provinces. No program conditions were required for either form of transfer. The transfers were made in this way so as not to interfere with provincial jurisdiction over education. An obvious problem with the program was that the wealthier provinces received more funding, since they were in a better position to allocate more to post-secondary education facilities. As well, the cost to the federal government was open-ended, and federal transfers were escalating uncontrollably.

Thus, the 1967 formula—part of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1967—was modified in 1972, restricting the rise of the federal contribution to a maximum of 15 per cent annually.

The 1972 system of transfers was replaced in 1977 by the Established Programs Financing, generally referred to as the EPF, in which federal transfers to provinces for post-secondary education for the next five years—that is to say, from 1977 to 1982, and they are now expiring—were made on a per capita basis and escalated at the rate of growth of the economy.

The new system of transfers was half cash and half tax transfers. These new EPF arrangements did not place conditions on program standards, in keeping with the non-interference policy of the 1967 arrangements, although national standards of excellence were implicitly encouraged.

At the time I felt that this was not good enough, and said so. It has turned out, of course, that it has not been good enough to ensure that the aims which the federal government had in mind in making these transfer payments have been achieved.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): If I may interrupt you, Senator Hicks, could you tell us the date you are speaking of now?

Senator Hicks: I am now speaking particularly about the arrangements which were made from 1977 on, but, to a greater or lesser degree, my comments apply to the arrangements made from the time of the so-called Pearson formula, which was worked out in the fall of 1966 and became operative in 1967. This is when we transferred the money to the provinces without maintaining any federal hand on the expenditure of the money, or without requiring any accountability for it.

Senator Frith: When you say "this was the time," do you mean that the arrangements became what we call "block funding" in 1967?

Senator Hicks: It started in 1967, but the principle was really put into effect so that the federal government had virtually no say in, and received virtually no credit for, anything that was done after the Established Programs Financing Arrangements were entered into for the five-year period commencing in 1977 and ending at the end of March of this year. Moreover, the 1977 arrangements did not place any requirement on the provinces to account for their spending of the transfers.

Honourable senators, allow me to make a few comments on accountability and visibility. Accountability has now become a very contentious issue. Thus far, the provinces have not been obliged to account for their spending of federal funds on post-secondary education, nor are they obliged to spend as much on post-secondary education as does the federal government, even to the extent of the federal government transfers to them. While the transfers were intended solely to assist in funding post-secondary education, their destination was not guaranteed. As I have said before, I felt that this was a mistake at the time and, back in 1977, I felt that what has in fact happened today would be the inevitable result. The federal government, in my view, was not sufficiently concerned about accountability or visibility when it made the arrangements in 1977. Moreover, as federal expenditures increased with the rate of growth of the economy and now exceed 56 per cent of the total, provincial expenditures have decreased to less than 30 per cent of total post-secondary education expenditures.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, at this point I should like to place on record 13 tables which I have categorized into three groups, and which I should like to have printed as an appendix to today's proceedings. If it is agreed that I may place them on record, I shall refer to them only briefly, but I think honourable senators will find them interesting to refer to.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For tables see Appendix "B", p. 3658.)

Senator Hicks: Table 1 is entitled: "How Post-Secondary Education Operating Expenses are Financed: The Provincial View." With the exception of the last one, all of these tables were prepared by the provinces for a meeting of education ministers in 1981. You will note that the federal share in these does not include transfers under the revenue guarantee program, and I will have a little more to say about that later. In any event, for Canada as a whole they show that in 1974-75 the federal government was paying 48 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education across Canada. The provinces were paying 35 per cent, and that figure rose to 39 per cent for the provinces the next year. Other sources, such as fees and endowments, accounted for 17 per cent of the total post-secondary education expenses.

In 1981-82, the year just ending, the federal share has increased to 57 per cent, an increase of 9 percentage points, whereas the provincial share has decreased from 35 per cent, after going up to 39 per cent, to 29 per cent, for a decrease of 10 percentage points. The other sources have remained approximately the same, fluctuating between 14 per cent and 17 per cent.

Tables 1 and 2 are followed by tables giving a breakdown over the same period for each province. Honourable senators will find it interesting to look at the way education has been financed in their own provinces. If I may, I will make a brief comment on each of them.

In Newfoundland, for example, the federal share has increased from 62 per cent to 83 per cent during this period; the provincial share has decreased from 27 per cent to 8 per cent.

In the province of Prince Edward Island, the province of Senator Macquarrie who initiated this inquiry, the federal share has increased from 69 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education institutions to 110 per cent, so that the Province of Prince Edward Island is not transferring the money that it receives from Ottawa, calculated on post-secondary education costs, to the universities in that province. What has happened as a result is that, whereas in 1974-75 the

[Senator Hicks.]

Province of Prince Edward Island was paying 22 per cent of post-secondary education costs, they are now paying minus 30 per cent because, if you take the 110 per cent that comes from Ottawa and add to it the 19 per cent which is still paid in fees and from other sources in Prince Edward Island, the Province of Prince Edward Island has a benefit of about 30 per cent of the amount of those transfer payments. I am sure they are putting that to good use and that they are doing it quite legally, because we did not require the provinces to spend that money on post-secondary education. We only calculated the transfers in relation to post-secondary education. Obviously, the Province of Prince Edward Island is putting this money to good use, perhaps for highways or bridges or other services, and I am not criticizing that. At the same time, however, it does affect the intention of the federal government in supporting post-secondary education, and I must point that out.

Senator Frith: They sent us Senator Macquarrie—well worth the price.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Maybe it is compensation for the export of brains.

Senator Hicks: In my own province, I am glad to say, the Government of Nova Scotia has held up fairly well. The federal share has moved from 51 per cent to 58 per cent, while the provincial share has moved up from 26 per cent to over 30 per cent and then back down to 26 per cent. So, over the period concerned the Government of Nova Scotia has been making constant contributions towards the cost of post-secondary education.

Another province that benefits to the point of not transferring all of its funds to the universities is New Brunswick, where the federal share has increased from 62 per cent to 98 per cent, while the provincial share has decreased from 17 per cent to minus 14 per cent. The fees and other sources account for the difference.

Quebec has a very good record. As a matter of fact, Quebec and Alberta make the largest proportionate contributions towards post-secondary education. In Quebec the federal share has remained constant, just around 50 per cent during the period concerned, while the provincial share has moved from 38 per cent up to as high as 44 per cent and then, in the current year, has decreased to 39 per cent. Quebec is therefore paying a larger proportion of its post-secondary education costs than any other province. That, I am sure, is why the universities of Quebec have seen such a significant growth in both quality and quantity during the last decade or thereabouts.

Ontario's record is not so good. The federal share in Ontario has gone from 46 per cent to 60 per cent, while the provincial share has gone from 34 per cent down to 22 per cent.

In Manitoba the situation is not so stable. The federal share has moved from 51 per cent to 68 per cent, while the provincial share has decreased from 30 per cent to 19 per cent.

In Saskatchewan approximately the same situation obtains, the federal share having moved from 48 per cent to 61 per cent, while the provincial share went from 35 per cent down to 26 per cent.

Alberta has a record comparable to that of the Province of Quebec. The federal share in the province of Alberta has gone from 46 per cent to 51 per cent, while the provincial share has remained constant, with some fluctuation in the interim period. At the beginning of the period it was 38 per cent and it is 38 per cent in the current year, as estimated.

Finally, in the province of British Columbia, the federal share has moved from 43 per cent up to 54 per cent, while the provincial share has gone down from 39 per cent to 33 per cent.

Honourable senators, the last of the tables, table 13, which I would categorize separately, summarizes the whole situation with respect to transfer payments. The figures I am about to give you are not education figures; they are the figures which reflect the changes proposed by the Government of Canada for the years 1981-82 to 1986-87—the next five years. They show the effect of the whole of transfer payments in those years. These are not provincial figures but are figures from the federal Department of Finance. They attempt to predict what will happen to the transfer payments as a result of the new budget and the new budget arrangements.

Again, I repeat that these do not deal exclusively with post-secondary education but are projections for the whole of the transfer payments. Roughly, the aggregate of such payments in Canada in the current year is $15.2 billion. It is expected that that will rise to $26.5 billion by 1986-87, an increase of 68 per cent. Moreover, in no single year during that period will the increase be less than 10 per cent.

There then follows a breakdown of that aggregate into the totals by province, and with only one or two exceptions the increase provincially is at least 10 per cent each year for each province. However, over the five-year period the aggregate increase is 68 per cent.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Will the honourable senator permit me to ask a question with respect to the figures he has just given us in terms of the contributions by the provinces towards the financing of post-secondary education?

Senator Hicks: Certainly.

Senator Tremblay: The honourable senator mentioned other sources, including fees from students and endowments.

Senator Hicks: Yes.

Senator Tremblay: Do the figures he has given for provincial contributions include the contributions of the provinces to the financing of those fees in the form of scholarships and so forth? Or are they just rough figures which exclude scholarships and that sort of contribution by the provinces?

● (1450)

Senator Hicks: I understand Senator Tremblay's point but, unfortunately, I cannot answer with authority. I think that the fees are merely gross figures. In some provinces the provincial contribution to scholarships may be significant, but in my own province it is not significant. Perhaps, if it had been I would have delved into this question a little more carefully. However, I think that we must assume that these are merely gross figures. As I said, I was reading from tables which were prepared by the provinces for a provincial ministers of education conference.

In any event, it looks to me as though these figures show that the federal government has held up its end in support of post-secondary education institutions pretty well, and that it is the provincial authorities that ought to look to their own position and their own attitudes with respect to post-secondary education support.

I would like to say a word on visibility, which is another painful issue about which Ottawa was not much concerned as recently as five years ago, and it seems to me that they ought to have been. Of course, the federal government is more concerned about this issue today, and they regard it as a painful one.

Increased federal spending of Canadian taxpayers' dollars on post-secondary education has not been readily visible. Although the federal government must continue to respect provincial jurisdiction over post-secondary education, it also now realizes the need for:

- (a) some recognition of its role in post-secondary education;
- (b) some standardization between the two levels of government of post-secondary education goals because of "spill-over effects"—that is to say, students who move from one province to work in another province or to work for federal government agencies and so forth; and
- (c) some accounting for how the transfers from post-secondary education are used.

To help fill these needs, the budget calls for a coordinated approach to post-secondary education based on co-operation between the two levels of government. I shall refer briefly to the budget proposals relating to this, but I will not go into any great detail as I realize that they have not yet become law and that it will be proper to examine them in greater detail when they have become more firmly established.

According to the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, the basic thrust of the proposed federal-provincial fiscal arrangements is that they will "enable us to achieve the desired savings without affecting federal contributions to the financing of provincial . . . post-secondary education programs." I hope he is right about that. Mr. MacEachen proposed:

- (a) to eliminate compensation for the 1972 revenue guarantee which was included in the EPF arrangements in 1977. This is fairly technical, and I think we can leave it at that for the present time. There will be a reference back to it in a moment.
- (b) an improved equalization to replace the system that will expire on March 31, 1982.
- (c) that transfers to the provinces over the next five years are still projected to grow at least as fast as the rest of our expenditures. I have already pointed this out in my reference to table 13.

(d) that the tax changes will automatically increase provincial revenues. All I can say there is res ipsa loquitur.

(e) and that the resulting increase in provincial revenues in 1982-83, the first year of the new arrangements, will virtually offset the reduction of transfers due to the elimination of compensation for the 1972 revenue guarantee, to which I referred a moment ago, and will cut that reduction by more than half in 1983-84.

I realize that these provisions have not yet the force of law, but I hope that the Minister of Finance's projections will turn out to be correct. Those are the facts that I wanted to put on the record.

Let me conclude by reiterating that I place myself among the very front ranks of those who appreciate the importance to our country, not only of our universities but also of our other institutions of post-secondary education. Perhaps in the highly technological society in which we are living today, some of these are even more important than the classical or traditional university.

I do not wish to see the finances of post-secondary education institutions diminished. Indeed, increases should more than keep pace with inflation and should enable universities to meet Canada's needs in the important years ahead in this century. It would seem to me, as I have said before, that the federal government's support is on the whole cognizant of these needs. I believe that provincial governments and provincial politicians must do more than talk about their provincial rights and responsibilities in education; that they too must provide a fair and adequate measure of support, which some of them, riding on the coat-tails of the federal government, have not been doing during the last decade or the last 15 years.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Rowe, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 23, at 8 p.m.

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR—TEXT OF LETTER FROM MINISTER OF TRANSPORT TO PRESIDENT OF AIR CANADA

February 11th, 1982

Mr. Claude Taylor,
President,
Air Canada,
1 Place Ville-Marie,
Montreal, Quebec.
H3B 3P7

Dear Mr. Taylor:

In November 1978, the government agreed to the purchase of Nordair by Air Canada on the condition that the ownership of Nordair would be restored to the private sector within a year.

Two former Transport Ministers tried to accomplish this but failed to do so. When I became Minister of Transport I inherited this intricate problem.

You are aware that I have devoted considerable time and effort to finding a solution which would accommodate, to the greatest extent possible, the various interests involved and the objectives to be achieved, particularly the rationalization of regional air services in Central Canada, through a merger of Nordair and Quebecair.

You also know that throughout my involvement with this matter, I have always kept in mind the concerns of the Nordair management and employees. I recognize that for them the last three years has been a period of continuing uncertainty. Obviously they have performed well in a rather difficult situation which I believe should now be clarified.

I have come to the conclusion that there are only two realistic options regarding Nordair's future. One is that control of Nordair should remain with Air Canada. This would ensure Nordair's future as a viable and efficient regional carrier predicated, of course, on the continuation of the healthy competitive relationship that has been established between Nordair and Air Canada.

The other option is the possibility of rationalizing the regional air carrier industry in Central Canada through a merger of Nordair and Quebecair. I continue to believe that this would be the best way of ensuring good and efficient regional air service in the area, in the long term. We came very close to achieving this last summer and I want to assure you that any further efforts in that direction could only occur where the terms and conditions are similar to those of last summer and are acceptable to all parties involved. I would expect Air Canada not only to play a major role in any merger arrangements but also in the rationalization process that would surely follow.

I recognize the difficulties which must be overcome before such a merger could take place. Indeed, I am not encouraged by the government of Quebec participation in the ownership of Quebecair and I would only contemplate such a merger in the circumstances stated above. Otherwise I would see Nordair remaining as a subsidiary of Air Canada.

I would appreciate if you would inform Mr. André Lizotte of my views. His stewardship of the airline and the performance of his management group and employees throughout this difficult period are to be commended. Nordair has provided safe, high quality service and has done so efficiently and profitably.

Yours sincerely,
"Jean-Luc Pepin"

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 23, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

BALTIC HONORARY CONSULS

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I call to your attention the presence in the gallery of the Baltic Honorary Consuls. They are: Dr. Jonas Zmuidzinis, Honorary Consul General of Lithuania; Mr. Ilmar Heinsoo, Honorary Consul of Estonia; and Dr. Edward Upenieks, Honorary Consul of Latvia.

I am sure that most of you are aware that tomorrow the Baltic Evening, which has become a very sought-after social and cultural occasion, will be held on Parliament Hill. On this occasion, the tenth anniversary of the event, the Baltic community is being especially honoured by the presence of His Excellency the Governor General. I hope that many senators will be present also.

LABOUR ADJUSTMENT BENEFITS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-78, to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA

INVITATION TO "WONDERFUL WEDNESDAY" FUNCTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would explain to me the significance of my receiving an invitation headed:

It is always a wonderful Wednesday in British Columbia.

That may be true; and it is always a wonderful Wednesday in Manitoba. This invitation states:

B.C. cabinet ministers, Senators Jack Austin and Ray Perrault—

I think the order is inverted.

—invite you—

And this is underlined.

—to a B.C.W.W. in the Railway Committee Room.

I have never been favoured with such an invitation before, and before accepting the invitation I wonder if somebody could tell me what I am letting myself in for.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Perhaps you had better refuse.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I have to agree that it is a pretty difficult question to answer. I am not surprised that my honourable friend would not wish to deal with it right away.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATOR—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I now wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with the questions I asked him the other day concerning the terms of reference of Dr. Gilson who will be studying the Crow rate in conjunction with some others in western Canada soon.

I have been told by the minister that as of last week the terms of reference had not been drawn up. May I ask him if they have now been drawn up, and, if not, when does he expect to see them?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, this comes under the authority of the Minister of Transport. I do not have that information at hand, but I shall be happy to take that question as notice and obtain an answer for the honourable senator as soon as I can.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his reply. In the answer he gave me the other day he dealt with my question as to whether the government had issued any instructions to Dr. Gilson about secrecy, or whether the meetings should be held in camera. Obviously, if they have not issued the terms of reference, that matter has not been decided upon by the government, but part of his answer stated:

The response being used by the Department of Transport is that Dr. Gilson and the other participants in the process who have been canvassed favoured holding the meetings in private.

So, I register that fact. I now ask my honourable friend whether he favours holding these meetings in camera?

Senator Argue: I would think that the main parts of any such meetings are probably more fruitful if they are held in camera. If Dr. Gilson is going to discuss the government's proposal and the attitude of any major farm organization, it would be my judgment that the farm organization would very likely wish to have that discussion conducted in camera. Of course, the government's attitude might well be governed to some extent by the views of the farm organizations themselves, but my opinion would be—perhaps you did not ask for my opinion—

● (2015)

Hon. Lowell Murray: We asked for the government's position.

Senator Argue: —that negotiations are likely to be more fruitful if they are not televised and conducted in the public domain.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend suggesting that the farmers of western Canada whose interests he so zealously defends, particularly with respect to the Crow rate, want to have these negotiations conducted in such a manner that they are not made aware of what is bargained for them in respect of this matter? I really ask him to consider whether he is prepared to say that meetings of this kind on a matter that affects the livelihood of every farmer in western Canada should properly be conducted in this rather secretive manner?

Senator Argue: I think these negotiations would likely be more fruitful if they are conducted in a confidential manner, but I come back to that part of my reply in which I said it would depend, in no small measure, on the representatives of the farm organizations themselves and how they want this done. If there is to be any measure of give and take, and any likelihood of agreement, it is my opinion that the meetings are likely to be more fruitful if they are not conducted in public. I believe that delicate labour negotiations are likely to be more fruitful if they are conducted outside the attention of the media. After these negotiations have reached a certain stage, then I am sure that whatever agreement has been attained—if there is agreement—will, in fact, be made public.

Senator Roblin: I take it from the way my honourable friend has carefully balanced himself on both sides of this question that he will certainly be supportive of a free exchange of opinion without any mandated in camera policy on the part of the government. In other words, he does not think the government ought to mandate in camera meetings for this subject.

Senator Argue: I think Dr. Gilson is perfectly capable of deciding which way he wishes to go. If he feels it would be more fruitful to have those negotiations conducted in public, then the government will not stand in the way of his proceeding in that fashion. My honourable friend is a businessman of much experience, and he knows that if matters as important as these are to the public, the farmers and the customers are to be discussed with any hope of arriving at a consensus then the discussions should be conducted privately. The meetings are likely to be more fruitful if they are held in a confidential manner until such time as some agreement, some progress, has, in fact, been achieved.

Senator Roblin: I can only express the hope that my honourable friend will leave it to Dr. Gilson to decide on this matter, but I would be much happier if he would say that these meetings are to be held in public because they are not ordinary meetings. These meetings are held once in every 100 years. Therefore, I want to register my point with my honourable friend—and perhaps I have.

I now want to go on to the second part of my inquiry of the other day as to whether or not Dr. Gilson will be consulting with the provincial governments in respect to this matter. I know that certain provincial governments have taken a stand on this subject, but I rather fancy that they are still entitled to make their case one way or the other, such as it is, with Dr. Gilson. I ask my honourable friend whether the terms of reference will make it possible for him to consult with provincial governments should it be deemed advisable to do so.

Senator Argue: I would not think he is barred from consulting with provincial governments. The answer I gave the honourable senator was prepared for me—it is not my own answer—by the Ministry of Transport.

Senator Murray: The answer was prepared—

Senator Argue: Well, if you want to chip in, just keep chipping in.

Senator Murray: The answer was prepared for you; it is not your answer.

Senator Argue: That's fine. It was provided to the Senate, and I am speaking on behalf of the government. You can take it any way you like. You can shake your head all you want; it will not make much difference. In any case the answer—I withdraw that remark because it was not very appropriate—

Senator Roblin: It is quite Parliamentary.

Senator Argue: In any event, I do not have anything to add, but I will make further inquiries. If I can obtain for the honourable senator information as to if and when Dr. Gilson is visiting with provincial governments, I do not mind doing that.

● (2020)

Senator Roblin: I take it my honourable friend will be good enough to table the terms of reference as soon as they are decided, so that we shall have an opportunity to examine them at that stage. I hope also that he will assist me in assuring a reasonably wide-ranging debate on the matter so that when it is completed interested parties will not be able to go around saying that they were not consulted and did not know it was going on, and that sort of thing.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): We are ready to receive their representations right now.

Senator Roblin: Sometimes there is a difference between representing the members and representing the organizations, as my honourable friend well knows. I am concerned about that, and I think he is too.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MEETING BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND ALSANDS GROUP

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would now like to address another question to the honourable senator, as the Minister of Economic and Regional Development. I hope I have that right.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Don't be too sanguine of getting an answer.

Senator Roblin: I am really not sanguine of getting much of an answer, but I always try, and my honourable friend is a pretty good question answerer, in the parliamentary sense.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The answers are better than the questions.

Senator Roblin: I hope so. I hold no brief for the questions. The answers ought to be better than the questions, because if the minister does not know the answer to anything within his department he ought to, whereas the questioner is often in the dark.

Last month there was a meeting between the government and those involved in the Alsands operation. At that time the government stated, according to reports that reached the public, that this was the final offer. My question to the minister is: In view of the recent meeting of the Alsands people last week, requesting a further meeting with the government, is the government intending to meet with these people to discuss the matter further?

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Olson: I do not know, honourable senators, that a specific meeting, along with a time for that meeting, has been set up; but I do recall a question of this nature some days ago, and since then I have found that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said that he is prepared to meet again. The time and the date and the terms and conditions of such a meeting have not, however, been set up.

Senator Roblin: I daresay we will hear about that in due course, so I am willing to wait.

Honourable senators, my next question has to do with the fact that last month the government presented these people with what it described as being the final offer. If they are going to meet again, I would like to ask my honourable friend whether there is any intention on the part of the government of revising the final offer.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators will have to recognize that there are a number of considerations that have to be taken into account, one of which is that part of the Canada-Alberta energy agreement is to the effect that any changes in the terms and conditions of taxation and all related levies are to be dealt with in concert, or, I think it says, in parallel, and therefore it would be necessary for Canada and Alberta to agree on whatever changes they want to make prior to such changes being made in the terms and conditions.

Senator Roblin: I mention that particularly, again, honourable senators, because I am sure that along with many others the minister has read the speech by the Premier of Ontario in which he in effect implored the federal government to get a move on and get this tremendous potential supply of oil into the productive phase as soon as possible. Has my honourable friend any intention of giving the Premier of Ontario information as to when he may expect this operation to commence?

Senator Olson: I do not like to complain about how people say things, honourable senators, but it seems to me that the premier of Ontario, if he wanted to be fair—and he usually claims that he is trying to be fair—might have said that he wanted to implore the federal and the provincial governments both, because of what I said a few minutes ago.

Senator Roblin: I am sure that may be the case, but my honourable friend must also recognize that he is expected to take the lead. He has been telling us for a long time about the status of the federal government in the Canadian Confederation and about the leadership it intends to give in developing the economy of this country. I take him at his word. I believe that I must expect him to take the lead in this process. It is not good enough to hide behind the Province of Alberta.

● (2025)

Senator Olson: The federal government is not hiding behind the Province of Alberta or anyone else. It has taken the lead in many things, including reaching an agreement with the producing provinces. Once this federal government makes a deal with another government, the deal is kept.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: As part of the terms and conditions of the agreement that was reached, we were going to work in concert in adjusting the terms and conditions of oil and gas development in the future. My honourable friend knows that. He can twist it any way he likes, but we still come back to an accurate interpretation of the agreement.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend only keeps agreements when it suits him.

Senator Olson: No—

Senator Roblin: Yes, he does. Not only does he not keep agreements, but he does not keep his promises either. I am not about to spend the evening detailing the promises that have not been kept or those that have been reversed and stood on their heads.

Senator Olson: They are hard to recall, aren't they?

Senator Roblin: No, they are not. I can start out with wage and price controls and work right down to this present day and generation.

Hon. Lowell Murray: You can start before that.

Senator Roblin: I dare say I can, but I will let my honourable friend off a little lightly this evening and will not embarrass him with a recitation of his failures in that respect.

Senator Olson: Perhaps my honourable friend would like to bring a recitation of those things into the chamber some day. If he will give me a minute or two, I can find the right tabs in my books in order to give him a complete and accurate answer that will disprove every one of his claims.

Senator Smith: You will give the contrived answers which you carry with you; that's what you will give.

Senator Roblin: You will give the political answers, which won't wash.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—VISIT BY COMMONS SUBCOMMITTEE—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION BY SENATORS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Last week, the Leader of the Opposition asked him whether it would be possible for senators to accompany members of the House of Commons subcommittee going to El Salvador on a fact-finding mission. The minister replied:

Honourable senators, the idea is a good one. I was in conversation this morning on precisely that point. I suggested that, if possible, senators be included on that mission.

Yet, the subcommittee is made up of only four members of the other place. Can the Leader of the Government explain to us why members of this House were not also invited to take part in this mission?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in my reply last week I stated that I had been informed that the proposal to send parliamentary representatives to El Salvador on a fact-finding mission was made on the initiative of a committee in the other place.

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Perrault: Just as Senate committees are not inclined, at times, to invite the joint participation of members of the other chamber in committee activities, obviously in this case members of the other place decided that they would like to have the members of their fact-finding mission drawn exclusively from the House of Commons. Nevertheless, I know of the honourable senator's interest in international affairs, and I am aware of his expertise in the area. I can well understand his interest, as well as that of other honourable senators, in the situation in El Salvador.

The determination of whether Senate observers should at some point go to El Salvador may well be a matter for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I want to say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that his answer is not consistent with the statement he made tonight. As reported on page 3633 of the French version of the Debates of the Senate this is the answer he gave last week:

Honourable senators, the idea is a good one. I was in conversation this morning on precisely that point. I suggested that, if possible, senators be included on that mission.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us to whom he made that proposal? Was it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to his officials and why could senators not go along with members of this subcommittee of the other place, on this mission to El Salvador?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in a later comment on this situation I pointed out that I had indeed looked into the matter. As reported at page 3651 of Debates of the Senate, I said:

● (2030)

This is a House of Commons trip and the members of this visit will represent the House of Commons Subcommittee on the Caribbean and Latin America. Since senators are not members of this subcommittee, I do not see how they could go along on this particular visit. However, if honourable senators determine that there should be Senate representation on this visit to El Salvador, the best course of action would be to make that proposal to our Foreign Affairs Committee, and then a separate trip, funded by the Senate, might be organized. The initiative would have to have the approval of the Senate, and a submission would have to go forward to the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee to secure the necessary funds for the visit.

Honourable senators, I feel that is a rather complete reply.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: In other words, the suggestion made by the minister to the officials or the Secretary of State for External Affairs with a view to appointing senators to that subcommittee was not welcomed. They did not want senators on that subcommittee. Since Canada has decided not to accept the monitoring of the election in El Salvador, can the minister tell us why the government would send that subcommittee? Why was a subcommittee of the House of Commons sent there?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government does not dictate to the House of Commons committees. And may I remind honourable senators that in this instance we are referring to an all-party visit, as represented by members of a committee of the other place, to El Salvador. One of the members of that delegation is the Honourable Flora MacDonald, the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the Clark government. I am rather surprised, given the deep interest of one of her former cabinet colleagues in this visit to El Salvador, that the Honourable Senator Asselin has not contacted the Honourable Flora MacDonald with a request that the Conservative Party in the Senate have representation on such a mission.

Having said that, if Senator Asselin wishes to move that there be an all-party Senate delegation sent to El Salvador, I am certain there are honourable senators who will wish to express their support for such a proposal. I find it rather surprising that the honourable senator, with his experience in government, would somehow feel that, because of some action on the part of government, the Conservative Party has been denied an opportunity to send representatives from this chamber to El Salvador.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Nobody said anything like that.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest that the honourable senator make his representations to his party leader, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, and the Honourable Flora MacDonald?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Surely, you would not want to go without the permission of the Senate?

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, obviously, the Leader of the Government is twisting the meaning of the question I asked. I have no objection to members of my party joining a committee of the other place that would carry its investigations abroad. That is not what I meant. My question is as follows: If the government has decided against sending observers to monitor the elections in El Salvador, what is this subcommittee of the House, which actually represents the Canadian government, doing in that country right now? Why was it sent there? Does the Deputy Leader of the Government want to answer on behalf of the Leader of the Government? Will the Leader of the Government answer my question?

[Senator Perrault.]

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this committee is not carrying the views of the government. The committee includes representatives from the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party. It is attempting to ascertain the situation in El Salvador. Whether or not the government, as a matter of policy on behalf of the people of Canada, determines to send observers to the election in El Salvador, surely, is a question apart from whether a subcommittee of the House of Commons, or a subcommittee from this place, for that matter, should decide to dispatch a group to that area or any other area to determine certain facts.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: This will be my last question: Has the government decided to send Canadian observers to monitor the elections to be held in El Salvador?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I made a statement on that particular question last week. No further official information has been received by the Senate since that time. Additional policy data will be made available to the Senate as soon as possible.

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—OBSERVER STATUS FOR SENATORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with regard to a delegation of a different sort. The Law of the Sea Conference is beginning in New York on March 8. In view of the wide interest the conference will generate this year, since the United States is now resuming its interest in the Law of the Sea, and in view of the fact that our Subcommittee on National Defence is in its new thrust dealing with the overall Law of the Sea regulations in connection with sea power, would the Leader of the Government take into consideration that those from the Senate who are interested could, over the period of weeks of the Law of the Sea Conference, attend as observers, as has been the case in the past?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the proposal by Senator Marshall will be given immediate consideration.

POLAND AND U.S.S.R.—SANCTIONS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can he inform this house of any sanctions that Canada has imposed upon Poland and the U.S.S.R. in view of the continuing repression by martial law in Poland?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, announced today—

Hon. Martial Asselin: It's about time.

Senator Perrault:—that, in view of the continuing suppression of civil liberties in Poland and the continuing contravention of the principles of the Helsinki Final Act, the Canadian government has decided to take the following measures to demonstrate its concern to the Polish and Soviet authorities. First, the program of Canadian-Polish academic exchanges is being suspended. In view of the restrictions placed on the movements of Canadian diplomats in Warsaw, Canada is placing restrictions on representatives of the Polish government in Canada.

With other like-minded countries, Canada will support initiatives within international organizations, such as the International Labour Organization and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, to promote respect for the basic rights of the Polish people. Canada will continue to make its concerns over the situation in Poland known to Polish and Soviet authorities.

Concerning economic measures, Canada in support of the general Alliance position, has decided to extend no new commercial credits for goods, other than food, to Poland for the time being, to support a delay in holding negotiations on rescheduling payments of Poland's official debts due in 1982, and to restrict scheduled traffic of Polish airlines to the frequency presently in effect of two flights per week.

The Government of Canada views the continued interruption of communications with our embassy in Warsaw, through normal means, as being in contravention of obligations under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations to facilitate operations of diplomatic missions. Although commercial telex service has resumed, the Canadian government again calls for the immediate restoration of normal leased circuit communications with the embassy.

Canada believes the Soviet government must be made aware of the concern we share with other members of the Alliance over the Soviet attitude towards developments in Poland. The government has therefore decided to implement the following measures with respect to the Soviet Union. First, proposals for high level official contacts will be reviewed to determine whether in the present political climate they should proceed. Anticipated negotiations on a program of general exchanges in the areas of science, education and culture will be postponed. The government has also decided to delay the proposed meeting of the Mixed Economic Commission. Also Aeroflot will be limited to its present traffic frequency of two flights per week.

The government regrets having to implement these measures, which parallel in general terms those being introduced by Canada's western allies. Canada will continue to encourage an atmosphere in which the Polish people are allowed to solve their own problems. The measures adopted by the Canadian government reflect Canada's concern that the political and moral commitments freely made by Poland and the Soviet Union under the Helsinki Final Act to other states participating in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe are not being observed. Under the Helsinki Final Act the participating states accepted review by one another of the degree and extent of their fulfilment of internationally recognized standards of behaviour. Canada's action here is consistent with this understanding.

● (2040)

At the same time Canada will continue to assist the Polish people in those ways that offer promise of encouraging a return to renewal and reform within their country. Canada will also supply credit to permit Poland to continue to purchase grain under the terms of the present long-term grain agreement. While Canada is already one of Poland's largest official creditors, the government considers that the supply of food for use by the Polish people is essential at this time.

In addition, Canada has contributed $500,000 to an international appeal launched by the Red Cross to provide medical supplies, food and clothing to the Polish people, and has contributed $100,000 to support relief efforts of the Canadian Polish Congress. Further contributions of this kind are anticipated.

Concerning refugees, Canada's record is exemplary. The government will continue to support initiatives to re-settle additional refugees in Canada as part of an international effort to respond to this problem.

Canada again calls upon the Polish leadership for an act of national reconciliation to allow its people to pursue their own destiny and to permit Poland once again to take its place as a respected member of the international community.

The government urges the Polish government to live up to its declared intention to re-establish civil liberties and calls upon the Polish authorities to end the state of martial law, to release those arrested, and to restore immediately a dialogue with the church and Solidarity.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, on the subject of refugees and self-exiles who are destined to come to Canada, in December the minister stated that a quota of 6,500 had been put in place for refugees coming to Canada from eastern Europe. In view of the fact that there is only the normal number of Canadian officials in Vienna dealing with immigrant applications, and that reports have reached us here in Canada that they cannot possibly process more than 1,500 applications during the next 10 months, would the minister inform us whether any additional personnel will be sent to Vienna to expedite the processing of applications?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I have no specific information about the situation in Vienna, but that information will be obtained and brought to the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, considering that the Leader of the Government has made a lengthy statement, the opposition is entitled, according to parliamentary practice to make a few comments following that statement.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Let him reply to the question.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: The Minister of State for Economic Development should remember his years in the House of Commons, where this is a long-standing custom.

Since the Leader of the Government made a policy statement, I think the opposition is entitled to make a few comments. I have already done so, honourable senators, with respect to the government's attitude and the stand taken at the very beginning by the Prime Minister of Canada with respect to the situation in Poland.

The Leader of the Government will recall that I questioned him a number of times regarding this matter. I asked him what the Canadian government's position was on the events in Poland. Honourable senators will recall that at first, there was some confusion as to statements on these events made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and also by the Prime Minister of Canada. I may remind the Leader of the Government that I told him that at first, the Prime Minister—and I am not so sure this is not still the case—seemed to be supporting the Polish government's decision to impose martial law; he said it was a good thing because it would prevent Soviet intervention in the Polish conflict.

Hon. Azellus Denis: And then what?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The senator is actually making his contribution to the debate!

Senator Asselin: The Prime Minister also said in his statement that Solidarity's claims were excessive and that it had to stop.

We asked when the government would decide to express its objections to the situation in Poland, but we never had a decision by the government.

The decision announced today by the minister comes after several representations made by the United States, especially at the last conference in Spain, when the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs was forced to go along with the rest of the crowd and act like our allies who were going to tell Poland and Russia that all this had gone far enough and that martial law had to be abolished in Poland.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Question!

Senator Asselin: This is not a question, it is a statement, and as my honourable friend will learn later on when he has had some experience in this chamber, when a minister of the Crown makes a statement, the opposition has the right to reply.

I am therefore saying that the minister's statement is well received by the opposition, because these measures should have been taken against Poland and Russia a long time ago, but the government avoided doing so and preferred to wait and see what other countries were doing. Before reaching a decision, they said we should not act right away, because we will be accused of blindly following in the footsteps of the United States. However, because of pressure exercised by the United States on Canada, the government made these decisions today, and intends to carry them out. However, it will be too late, because the harm has already been done and the situation is beyond repair. The Poles are being repressed by martial law and by their present government.

If the Canadian government is really sincere, could the minister inform us whether he is going to make special arrangements to ask immediately for the liberation of Lech Walesa, the head of Solidarity? Does the minister intend to ask the Canadian government to take immediate and special action for the purpose of liberating the union president, Lech Walesa, so that he will be able to continue his work with Solidarity? Can the minister answer this question?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that, at the end of that long statement, finally there was a question of sorts.

The reason for the long reply I gave in response to the very appropriate question asked by Senator Haidasz is the fact that the Polish question is of great importance to this chamber and to the Canadian people.

Senator Flynn: Nobody denies that.

Senator Perrault: A few days ago the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Asselin stated that we were not providing enough information on Poland, and requested more data. That information was provided. Now we are being upbraided for making a statement which provides too much information.

Senator Asselin: No, that was not the case at all.

Senator Perrault: The Canadian record with respect to Poland will stand scrutiny measured against any standard of concern for human rights and freedoms. No country in the world has a better record than Canada with respect to the Polish situation. It is time the opposition took some pride in Canadian human rights initiatives, instead of attempting to denigrate the efforts of a Prime Minister who has a career of fighting for human rights.

Senator Asselin, who voted against the proposed Canadian Charter of Rights in this chamber the other day, is now demanding more rights for the Polish people. The Prime Minister, who has fought for human rights and freedoms throughout his entire career in public life, and before he entered public life—

Senator Flynn: Especially in 1970!

Senator Perrault: —is being accused in this shift fashion of, somehow, not being concerned about the fate of the Polish people. That is political chicanery of the worst kind.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That's a good word.

Senator Perrault: Political chicanery of the worst kind.

Senator Flynn: Be frank.

Senator Perrault: We are proud to have a Prime Minister who is among world leaders in his concern for the rights and freedoms of the Polish people.

Senator Flynn: How can you say those things without smiling? You don't believe them for one moment.

Senator Olson: Everything was in order except Senator Asselin's speech.

Senator Flynn: What do you know about that? Don't you know the difference between a question and a statement?

COSTA RICA—ELECTION RESULTS

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the continuing and controversial situation in El Salvador and the seeming fact that most countries in the region do not support the idea of the holding of an election in March—they, themselves, never holding elections—would the leader give us a report on the results of the Costa Rican election which took place, I believe, last week? The only countries which apparently support elections in El Salvador are those which do hold free elections.

● (2050)

Would the Leader of the Government inform me as to whether the newly elected Costa Rican government, whose leader I believe is a member of Socialist International, supports or does not support the holding of next month's elections in the Republic of El Salvador?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

POLAND—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Mr. Speaker, honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Of course, the Leader of the Government has to resort to all kinds of specious arguments in order to prove his statement, and now he tells me that I voted against the Charter of Rights, and that if I had no respect for freedom here in Canada, how could I appreciate the freedoms existing in other countries? I told him just now that his statement on economic sanctions does not reflect what was said by the Prime Minister of Canada at the very beginning, when martial law was first imposed in Poland. I would refer the Leader of the Government to page 3578 of the Debates of the Senate.

I had asked the minister to produce the statements made by the Prime Minister and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the situation in Poland. I shall refer the leader to page 3578 and read, for his information, what the Prime Minister said about the situation in Poland:

Q. I asked how far you would tolerate repression before deciding on taking economic or political sanctions against Poland.

A. From the outset our policy has been, and I think it is the right one, to leave it up to the Polish people and the Polish authorities to solve their own problems, in order to avoid creating any justification for East or West to intervene in Poland's domestic affairs. We have followed this policy and we shall continue to do so. I think it is the right approach.

That was the Prime Minister. He did not mention economic sanctions. He added the following:

Other countries have military regimes and we have not broken off diplomatic relations with them. We shall have to wait and see whether the Polish regime actually becomes excessive, and starts to use violence, torture and the rest. And then we could perhaps make some sort of judgment.

There is no mention of economic sanctions.

However, for the time being, we are sorry that the Polish authorities had to resort to a military regime and martial law to maintain order. But once more, I think it is up to the Polish people to find their own solutions, and the best way we can help them is through economic aid, especially food, to ensure that hunger and poverty do not force people into an irrational movement of revolt, which would probably be disastrous and could lead to civil war.

It is certain, and I said a long time ago, that if there is civil war in Poland, it is very likely the Soviets will intervene to prevent civil war on its borders.

To me, any action that prevents civil war is a positive step. If a military regime succeeds in preventing civil war, I cannot dismiss it out of hand as a bad thing. That would depend on the conditions under which order is maintained.

The whole statement goes on like that. There is no mention of economic sanctions. I am therefore saying that the Canadian government is taking economic sanctions at this stage because it was forced to by its allies, especially by the United States, in order to show a common front with Japan and the other European countries which decided to take economic sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union.

I should therefore ask the minister to correct his facts and at least allow the opposition in this chamber to seek out and know the truth. Never mind those specious arguments that we voted against fundamental freedoms. I am saying that the Prime Minister of Canada, in his initial statements on Poland, supported both the military regime and martial law which had been imposed in Poland. And please do not tell us that this government is the defender of fundamental freedoms.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is very difficult to understand this line of attack by the Honourable Senator Asselin.

Hon. G. I. Smith: It is difficult for you to understand it.

Senator Perrault: The word may be "sad." It is saddening to see a veteran parliamentarian of his experience engage in this great patchwork of chronology and half truths—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He was reading the Prime Minister's statement.

Senator Perrault: Please learn to writhe while sitting down.

Senator Flynn: Stop making false statements.

Senator Perrault: It is saddening to hear Senator Asselin take these selective quotations, these phrases lifted out of context—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Asselin: I am rising on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that the Leader of the Government's statement in this house that I am using selective quotations. I simply read the Prime Minister's statement, which the Leader of the Government himself tabled in this house. I, therefore, ask him to withdraw, I have been in this house just as long as he has, and I have never misled the Senate. I ask him to withdraw his comments to the effect that I misled the house; that I used selective quotations. This is in extenso the text tabled in this house. If the minister is an honourable man he will withdraw his comments.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is a shabby and shoddy record attempting to discredit the Prime Minister. Taken in total form the documents which were tabled, I think generously, by this government the other evening—

Senator Flynn: Who do you think we are?

Senator Perrault: —which are part of the record of this chamber—

Senator Smith: What's the matter with us?

Senator Perrault: —indicate the Canadian position from the beginning has been one of invaring concern for the welfare of the Polish people. As further facts have been made available, Canada has moved to further measures, such as the economic sanctions announced today.

For the honourable senator to try to portray the government as being less than forthcoming with respect to Poland does little to enhance his reputation.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise again on a question of privilege, and I will not let the matter drop, Mr. Speaker. This is my right because the honour of a member of this House is involved. If the Leader accuses me of quoting selectively from the text I read, as he did, I ask him to withdraw his comments. I read in extenso the text that was tabled in this House. I ask him to withdraw what he said about me.

[English]

Senator Perrault: The accuracy of the brief excerpts quoted by the Senator from certain documents brought to this chamber last week is not in question, but I will tell you what is in question, it is the suggestion that these comments lifted out of context—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Asselin: They were not.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: —in incomplete form represent the entire position of the government with respect to the Polish question. May I say that the connecting phrases between these selective quotations have done little to enhance the senator's reputation.

Senator Flynn: You did little yourself.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether there was a single western leader, other than Pierre Elliott Trudeau, whose words were quoted and requested and quoted again on the Polish state-run radio and television by General Jaruzelski's men to justify their imposition on martial law in that country?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have—Senator Smith: Answer the question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have the time to monitor Polish shortwave radio broadcasts, but apparently Senator Murray has the time to do that. Apparently Senator Murray has the time to sit with his ear cupped to the radio to listen to the shortwave transmissions from communist countries.

Senator Flynn: When we travel with you, that is all you do.

Senator Smith: Why don't you say you don't know and sit down.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps Senator Murray has a tape recording of the alleged broadcasts and he can share them with us. I do know that His Holiness—

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

• (2100)

Senator Perrault: His Holiness the Pope expressed the fervent hope that there would be no civil war in Poland. He stated that concern. Pope John Paul II deplored the possibility of one Pole fighting another Pole. It is rather significant that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada, too—

Senator Flynn: The Pope is in agreement with you.

Senator Perrault: —has stated his support for a peaceful solution and his hope that a civil war would not occur. Just as His Holiness the Pope has said that he hoped that one Pole would not take up arms against another Pole—

Senator Flynn: The Pope shares your view.

Hon. Peter Bosa: The Pope speaks Polish, too.

Senator Perrault: Yes, and because of his origin, the Pope has a unique understanding of the situation in Poland.

Senator Flynn: Stop laughing at the Senate. I would hope that some honourable senators on that side would resist that sobriety that the leader is showing. It is very sad, indeed, when no senators on that side are able to smile.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he would ever consider the possibility of making a straightforward answer to a straightforward question and give up his habit of undeservedly lecturing honourable senators who dare to ask him questions as though they did not have the right to ask them, and if he would stop making these unjustified accusations against senators who evince a desire to know what is going on in this country?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): We never get a straightforward question.

Senator Smith: The honourable senator wouldn't know a straightforward question if he heard one because he has never asked one in his life.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He never gives a straightforward answer. I can tell you that.

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman who now sets himself up as a critic of questions once stood here on this side and asked some of the most confused, lengthy and obscure questions that it has ever been my pleasure to listen to. I admire him for his ability to ask questions which nobody understands and to make answers which nobody understands either.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Olson: It started out on a point of order.

Senator Smith: One of the things the honourable gentleman has not learned about parliamentary procedure is—

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Smith:—that when a senator starts to speak on a point of order he is entitled to be heard, and if somebody interrupts him, then that person who was interrupted has the right to answer. The honourable gentleman will some day learn that, but he will likely be a lot older before he does because he is rather slow at learning, as I have observed.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Smith: But he is not so slow, of course, as the Leader of the Government who has not learned yet.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Let's elect senators.

Senator Smith: If the honourable gentleman wishes to engage in discussion with me, fine. Stand up, and let yourself be heard! Don't keep these pearls of wisdom to yourself!

Before I was interrupted by the honourable gentleman who, for a short time, holds an office in the Government of Canada to which somebody has given the long name of minister of state in charge of economic development or something of that nature, I was asking the Leader of the Government if he would ever reach the point where, in his opinion, he would make a straightforward answer to a straightforward question. That is my question. Let him answer it, yes or no.

Senator Flynn: He has never said yes or no.

Senator Perrault: May I give you an example of questions of the kind posed by Senator Asselin. He asked, in effect, why the Government of Canada did not support economic sanctions from the very outset. The answer? Because there was a lack of information. It is, perhaps, the same reason why the British and others have only recently announced their sanctions. But here we have the incredible paradox of two honourable senators who speak as passionate defenders of freedom, yet on December 8, 1981 both of whom voted against a Canadian Charter of Rights which would include freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought and freedom of belief, opinion and expression—

Senator Flynn: Oh, no!

Senator Perrault:—freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association.

Senator Asselin: Sit down!

Senator Flynn: Your Honour, I rise on a point of order. I think there has been enough of insulting the intelligence of the Senate, and I would hope that my point of order would be supported by some honourable senators behind the Leader of the Government. It is not relevant to the question to revive the debate that took place on December 8. It has nothing to do with the situation that we are dealing with today. It is entirely out of order, as usual.

Senator Olson: But it is still true.

BANKS

PROFITS AND OPERATIONS—PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Earlier this week the government announced a parliamentary committee to study bank profits and bank operations. Will this be a joint committee or a committee of the other place?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: That is a short answer.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATION OF FISHERMEN ON EAST COAST FISHERIES TASK FORCE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to a question I posed on February 3 to which the leader responded with a delayed answer last Tuesday evening. I was not in the chamber last week due to other commitments.

In my original question I asked that a representative of the fishermen be appointed a member of the Kirby task force seeking a solution to Atlantic fishing problems. In the leader's reply I was assured that fishermen would be fully consulted. The leader took great pains to assure me that because Mr. Peter John Nicholson has resigned his position as an executive of a large processing company, he did not, in fact, represent the industry on the task force.

The leader also provided a list of the labour components of the industry, part-time fishermen, full-time fishermen, inshore fishermen, offshore fishermen, labour unions and so on. In fact, honourable senators, in his reply of over 400 words, the leader did everything but answer my question.

Hon. G. I. Smith: As usual!

Senator Muir: I should like to ask the question again: Is there to be a representative of the fishermen on the so-called Kirby task force and, if not, why not?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. Although I felt the question, which was brought to the chamber the other day was rather complete, I understand the honourable senator's concern.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The questions are always good.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The answer was complete.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary question. There seems to be some misunderstanding. My French is terrible and my English is not much better, but we have heard a lot this evening about straightforward questions. On February 3, I posed a straightforward question: Is it the government's intention that fishermen be given representation together with government and industry? We have heard a lot from Senator Olson about putting a straightforward question. That was a straightforward question. Further on I said, "I look forward to the government's doing something to create a proper balance." I was reinforcing the fact that I thought a representative from the fishermen should be on that commission.

The Leader of the Government this evening said that the government was very good at providing information at all times—every type of information that was possible. I am asking for that information.

As I said, my ability to express myself is not so good but, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, the Leader of the Government, or his understanding, is very vague or unusual—

Senator Smith: It's rather dim.

Senator Muir: In his response on February 16, the leader said:

The Honourable Senator Muir asked why there is no one on the task force serving as a co-chairman to represent the fishermen.

At no time did I ask for a co-chairman. How can you have a co-chairman on a troika—perhaps he would be a tri-chairman, or something like that—to represent the fishermen. He also put words in my mouth, and I am going to follow with a question—

Senator Perrault: On what page is that?

Senator Muir: Page 3623. Am I loud enough? Am I clear enough? Am I getting through?

● (2110)

To quote the leader again, he said:

The Honourable Senator Muir... based that complaint on his incorrect assumption that Mr. Peter John Nicholson, an economist who recently resigned his position as an executive of a large processing company, is serving as a co-chairman representing the corporate sector.

I did not mention "co-chairman" at any time. The honourable leader is putting words in my mouth again.

To finish up, quoting the honourable leader again, he said:

Honourable senators, there is no co-chairman of the task force. Furthermore, no one on the task force has been engaged to act as a lobbyist or to represent the vested interests of any single group.

I did not say that that was the case. I referred to Mr. Kirby and to Mr. Nicholson, and also advised honourable senators of their former positions, and said:

This is no reflection on the two gentlemen I have mentioned.

That is, one from government and one from industry. Would it not be proper also to have a representative from the fishermen?

May I ask again: Is there going to be a representative from the fishermen to represent the fishermen on this so-called task force, which would appear to me to be at the moment very one-sided?

When the honourable the leader puts words in my mouth, insinuating that I said that Mr. Nicholson was a lobbyist representing the vested interests of a single group, that is an outright lie. I did not say that about Mr. Peter John Nicholson or anyone else. The honourable the leader, it seems to me, protests too much when he puts a statement like that on the record. I did not suggest such a thing.

I asked then, and I am asking again, if there is going to be someone from the fishing industry, whether fisherman or fisherwoman—and we have both on the Atlantic coast—on that task force?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first of all I have referred to the question posed by the honourable senator on February 3, and indeed I agree with him that there was no reference to the position of co-chairman in that question. I can only assume—this is merely an assumption—that the reply may be one prepared for use in the other chamber based on a question asked by someone in that chamber, and that there has been a transposition of replies for the one intended here. In any event, the question will be taken as notice.

I apologize to the honourable senator if there were inaccurate inferences in my reply, which I did not prepare personally but which I most certainly voiced.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Try to check the replies ahead of time.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, does the honourable the leader not know that the question posed by the member in the other place, a member of his own party, was posed after I posed my question here? In any event, I am sure that the member in the other place did not wish to reflect on anyone, any more than I did.

All I want is to see a representative from the fishing industry on that task force. I think that all reasonable people in this chamber would agree that there should be a representative from among those who are doing the actual work as well as representatives from the government and the processors.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to say that the honourable senator has a good reputation in this chamber for asking fair questions, properly put. I assure him that I will get to the bottom of this situation and find out the nature of the problem. Certainly, an inquiry will be made to determine whether or not a full-time working fisherman is going to be included on the task force.

THE ECONOMY

STIMULATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I was about to ask a question and the Honourable the Speaker was kind enough to attempt to recognize me earlier. I now find, on rising to my feet, that the person to whom I wished to address my question, namely, Senator Olson, has seen fit to absent himself from the chamber. I trust he has some valid reason for not being present.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Always! Always!

Senator Donahoe: "Always"? I am sure. I, however, have a valid reason for wanting him present when I ask a question. I therefore do not propose to take advantage of His Honour's kindness tonight. I will put my question on a future occasion.

I would just close by saying that I would have asked it long since had the opportunity to make use of Question Period been available to me; but, like by honourable friend from Cape Breton, I was not in the chamber for at least two days. This is the first opportunity I have had to ask the question, and I am deprived of it by Senator Olson's absence.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Olson has left all of his documents here, and I am sure that his absence from the chamber is only temporary, for a pressing reason.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is by way of a follow-up to one that I addressed to Senator Olson himself. Not my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, not his seat-mate, and not even the minister responsible for the Wheat Board can answer the question correctly. The only person who can answer my question is Senator Olson, and I shall maintain my resolve to wait until he sees fit to grace this chamber with his presence before I ask it.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has stated that he was away from this chamber for two days. Senator Olson has been away for only two minutes. I hardly think he should be accused of unwillingness to reply to questions in those circumstances. I believe that he will return.

Senator Donahoe: On a point of privilege, or order—I do not know which—honourable senators, I take the same objection as my honourable friend from Cape Breton took earlier; that is, having words placed in my mouth, which have no relationship to those which I uttered. I did not for one moment suggest that Senator Olson was avoiding the question. I was simply regretting the fact that he was not here to answer it. I further said that I sincerely trusted that he had a valid reason for not being here, to which my honourable friend the Leader of the Government replied, "Always! Always!" I accepted that suggestion that Senator Olson had a valid reason for not being here.

I now see that the honourable senator has returned. I welcome him to the chamber. I trust that it is not more than just a happy coincidence that he has arrived while I am expressing a desire to ask him a question.

My question is related to one that I asked on an earlier occasion. When Senator Olson answered me on Thursday, February 11, the week before last, he said, with regard to whether anything had been done to offset the effects of the unfortunate budget, that a great many things had been done. He listed a large number of such measures, and referred to many large sums of money that he said were being spent in an attempt to alleviate the worsening economic situation.

My question to him tonight is simply this: Would the minister now indicate if the government has announced any program since the budget which was not provided for or anticipated in the allocations to any of the budgetary envelopes?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, although I know the honourable senator did use the term "offset the adverse effects of the budget," I did not acknowledge that the budget had produced any adverse effects. What I did do, I think, in response to his question, very legitimately, was to give him a fairly long list of actions that had been taken to stimulate the economy in Canada.

I can tell him now that what I gave him was only a partial list, and that whenever the opposition wants the rest of it I will be very glad to read it to them. I have it with me right now, and any time members of the opposition want to ask questions about the actions taken by this government to stimulate the economy I will try to be as complete and forthright as I can. The list is very long, however, and would take a long time to read.

I have it tonight in a slightly different form, one that not only gives the date and the amount of capital investment but also the number of jobs that will be created.

Honourable senators opposite will have to accept the fact that if they ask these kinds of questions I am going to have to try to reply and will do so in as much detail as they wish.

• (2120)

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, I would like to ask a supplementary question. I press the point because, whether the minister realizes it or not, he has already, in fact, admitted that, if one uses any traditional explanation or definition, we in Canada are in a recession. He has told us that the economic situation is not the same today as it was when the predictions concerning it were made on budget night. I would say to the honourable minister that, unless it can be substantiated that the announcements being made almost every day—including the ones to which he referred on the day in question—are, in fact, supplemental to those provided for or anticipated in the budget, the government cannot argue that it is doing anything at all to alleviate the situation. It is a situation which, according to the government's own admission, is worse than had been forecast.

I come to my supplementary question, honourable senators. I do not propose to ask any further questions unless I am aggravated by the kind of circumlocution that I have been getting by way of response. This is my question, honourable senators. It is exact; it is precise; it is straightforward; it can be answered with a simple yes or no. It does not require a speech. It does not require a listing of objects or undertakings of the government. Would the minister specify, with regard to his previous such claims, or, indeed, to anyone's previous such claims, and also in the case of any news of future programs which he might bring to the Senate, if the funding for such programs is in addition to that allocated in the various envelopes in the budget?

Hon. R. James Balfour: A simple yes or no.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is asking a question—

Senator Donahoe: It is a simple, straightforward question.

Senator Olson:—and he is trying to narrow the scope in which the reply can be given. Honourable senators, I have been in politics—on the floor of this chamber and of the other place—long enough to know better than to be led into that kind of trap.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The truth is a trap for you, is it?

Senator Olson: I will continue to give to the honourable senators opposite answers which indicate the type of economic stimulation that the government has given to this country. I have pointed out the full effects of the employment opportunities that have resulted from this economic stimulation.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Oh, my my; never a simple yes or no.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some further information about the proposed joint inquiry into the Ocean Ranger disaster.

My office has been in contact with the office of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As of a few minutes ago, we were informed that the situation is still somewhat confused. The federal government has just sent a telex in reply to Newfoundland's telex of last Friday. The government's telex basically corrects certain statements made in the Newfoundland telex.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is helpful.

Senator Perrault: Both sides say that they offered the joint inquiry first, and that they are still interested in pursuing a joint inquiry.

Private conversations between the two parties commenced by telephone today. I understand that we have made a legitimate offer over the telephone with a view to working out the problem.

Copies of all telexes will be tabled in the Senate, hopefully tomorrow afternoon.

THE ECONOMY

INTENTIONS OF GOVERNMENT RE 1980 POVERTY LINE UPDATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question which was asked by Senator Marshall on November 18, 1981, concerning the intentions of the government regarding the 1980 poverty line update.

One of the highest priorities of the Government of Canada has been to attempt to provide the assurance of a decent standard of living to our senior citizens, widows and disabled population. It is the intention of the government to go forward with a proposal to combat poverty amongst these groups of people as soon as economic conditions permit it. In the meantime, in order to protect, in these inflationary times, the purchasing power of the benefits these groups of people now receive from the government, Old Age Security, Canada Pension Plan and Family Allowance benefits are fully indexed to increases in the cost of living.

Honourable senators, because of the lateness of the hour, perhaps the remainder of these questions can be held until tomorrow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps they could be included as an appendix to Hansard.

Senator Perrault: In some cases the honourable senators who posed the questions are not present this evening. Therefore, I will deal with those questions at another time.

EDUCATION

UNIVERSITIES—POSSIBILITY OF DIRECT FEDERAL AID

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one rather long reply to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on February 17 concerning the possibility of direct federal aid to universities.

The Honourable Gerald Regan, Secretary of State, still wants to negotiate with the provinces on the present method of financing post-secondary education in Canada. Discussions of how to continue the present method of financing post-secondary education are in fact continuing. However, the national government would be foolish not to consider various other possibilities. Consequently, the government is studying a number of different proposals by which to finance post-secondary education. These proposals include direct financing to universities, a system of vouchers paid directly to the students, and financing through provincial granting bodies.

Senator Macquarrie claimed that direct federal financing of universities would amount to a fundamental change in functioning federalism. I would like to point out that direct federal payments to universities were first instituted by the St. Laurent government in 1951, and continued until a program of payments to the provinces for post-secondary education support was introduced in 1967.

In order to further clarify any misconceptions that honourable senators may have about this matter, I would ask that the highlights of addresses made recently by the Honourable Gerald Regan to the University of Western Ontario and to McGill University be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of highlights of addresses see appendix, p. 3683.)

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

RUSSIAN NATURAL GAS DEVELOPMENT PROJECT—LOAN TO LAVALIN INC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on February 3 by Senator Roblin which concerned the Export Development Corporation and the concessional financing of the Russian natural gas development projects. It is a fairly long response. I am willing to read it if honourable senators wish to have the information now. Otherwise, I ask that the answer be taken as read.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I presume that is the answer to the question asked regarding the Siberian project?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Roblin: In that case, it can be added to today's record.

Senator Olson: I ask that the answer be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I am informed that negotiations between the Soviet Government and Western Competitors for financing of the Soviet Astrakham sour gas project have been ongoing since 1977. As yet no contract has been awarded. At the present time EDC does not have a financial offer outstanding.

Should a Canadian bidder be successful, however, up to 16,500 person-years of employment would be generated in Alberta, B.C., Ontario and Quebec. If Canada wins this order it would also help to establish our reputation internationally as a source of technology in the oil and gas field. Hence, both the federal and Alberta governments have promoted a role for Canadian companies in oil and gas developments not only in the USSR but elsewhere.

The figures quoted in the press for the likely Canadian component and the present value of the subsidy element are exaggerated. However, the Government cannot reveal the precise terms of the Canadian offer on this and any possible EDC offers elsewhere since this would provide valuable information to our competitors.

With respect to the Honourable Senator's supplementary question, I can only add that the Canadian Government is continuing to review and discuss with its allies the totality of Western relations with the USSR. In the interim, any unilateral Canadian action would not affect the Soviet Union substantively but could benefit our Western competitors.

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the third reading of Bill C-11, relating to the inspection of electric and gas meters and supplies.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-45, to amend the Pest Control Products Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Deschatelets, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That a special committee of the Senate, to be composed of seven members, be appointed to inquire into and report upon

(a) any matter relating to labour relations in Canada with particular reference to problems concerning the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes; and

(b) any proposals for a more orderly and less disruptive exercise of the right to strike;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of the inquiry; and

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate on this motion, perhaps you will permit me just a few words on the matter. After some explanation I shall be in a position to ask permission to withdraw the motion.

This motion has been on the order paper for several months. Thus far only two honourable senators have participated in the debate. Both of those gentlemen, for roughly the same reasons, have indicated that they would oppose this motion if it should come to a vote. I have not changed my mind in any way about the urgency of having a good look into an aspect of labour relations—namely, strikes—so that the right to strike in the public service can be exercised in a more orderly way.

● (2130)

I am also convinced that in these times of inflation and high interest rates, a maximum allowable salary increase to match the increase of the cost of living would be a desirable policy. So, in the future, we should try to avoid winning the two championships we have held in the past, first, the greatest number of strikes in a given year and, second, strikes of the greatest length.

In any event, since a consensus on this motion has not evolved, I have no alternative but to ask your permission, honourable senators, that under the rules I be allowed to withdraw my motion.

Hon. Martial Asselin: They let you down.
Motion withdrawn.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER
OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE
COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I spoke to Senator Murray about this motion. Since its subject matter is included in bills relating to the National Energy Program, I believe he intends to withdraw the motion. I ask that this order stand until tomorrow.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 17, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Lamontagne calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution," tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1980.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, after Senator Stanbury spoke in this debate last week, I moved the adjournment, although I had expected someone on the opposition benches to do so. I do not know whether Senator Roblin explained for the record his reasons for declining, but he certainly signalled to me that he felt I should move the adjournment.

I feel I should explain my position in view of the article which appeared in the press, and the questions asked by Senator Marshall and Senator Roblin. I seem to be receiving signals from Senator Asselin.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Perhaps it would be better to postpone the matter until tomorrow.

Senator Frith: When the honourable senator hears what I am about to say, he may agree that we can dispose of the matter rather quickly.

I propose to commence my remarks by making a couple of assertions and explaining the background for those assertions. I shall then ask that the debate be adjourned in the name of some other honourable senator.

The first assertion is that some of the suggestions I made in answer to questions put by Senator Roblin and Senator Marshall were a bit naive, in that I felt I could speak on this issue without creating the impression that, as Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, I was speaking with the authority of the government, or flying a trial balloon on behalf of the government. The fact is that neither of those impressions is correct. I blame no one, nor do I think that it would be unreasonable for anyone to assume that either of them might be right. I ask for your indulgence, honourable senators, to make one or two comments on the subject matter of Senate reform, and ask that you take, without a grain of salt, the fact that I am to this extent speaking on my own behalf, not on behalf of the government.

The comments I wish to make relate to the point of procedure I raised when I discussed the matter earlier. I feel it would be useful for the Senate, and the country as a whole, if the Senate led the debate on Senate reform or, at least, kept the debate alive at this time. I believe that the form which the present debate is taking is less than satisfactory, and that we should try to find a way of having the Senate deal with Senate reform in a more concrete way than by way of an inquiry, because the inquiry disappears once it is considered debated.

By way of historical background, the Senate first debated the question of Senate reform, according to my research, in 1890.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Yes, I remember that.

Senator Frith: It was before my time and certainly before Senator Smith's time, but Senator Smith's scholarship extends back further than mine. I believe there have been eight previous debates of this nature. The motion that was debated in 1890 took the form of an Address to Her Majesty. I shall not read the entire motion, but it can be found in the Debates of April 23, 1890.

Senator Asselin: How many pages did the debate occupy?

Senator Frith: It starts at page 517 and ends at page 564. You can do the arithmetic. The final statement on the debate reads: "With the consent of the house the motion was withdrawn." So no concrete resolution was reached at that time.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Who introduced the motion?

Senator Frith: It was introduced by Senator Poirier, who is not described as having any position with the government at the time.

In 1906 Senator David moved a motion on Senate reform which can be found in the Debates of the Senate of July 5, 1906. At page 1087 of the Debates of that year, the motion is agreed to, but no resolution is made. The motion agreed to was that there be no resolution of the motion at the time.

In the session of 1907-08 a motion was introduced by Senator McMullen respecting Senate reform. As reported at pages 774 to 777 of the Debates of that session, the motion was withdrawn. The honourable senator introduced another motion, but it related to legislative procedure rather than Senate reform.

As reported at page 34 of the Debates of January 27, 1909, Senator Scott moved a motion dealing with Senate reform. Debate on the motion seems to have been adjourned sine die because it never appeared again. Apparently it was dropped.

● (2140)

In 1951 the subject of Senate reform was again raised in the Senate. On January 31 of that year a motion was put by Senator Robertson, which motion was withdrawn on May 24, as reported at page 480 of Debates of the Senate.

In 1973-74 Senator Croll brought the subject forward by way of an inquiry:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the urgent public need in Canada for Senate reform now.

That inquiry resulted in 12 propositions for Senate reform. However, in July the matter ended, as our present inquiry could end, by being treated as having been debated, and no agreement was reached on Senator Croll's 12 propositions.

Finally, honourable senators will remember that in 1978-79, we proceeded to the consideration of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution tabled in the Senate on Thursday, October 19, 1978. Again, that matter was adjourned never to appear again, I take it, as a result of the end of the session.

Honourable senators, the subject of Senate reform has been debated at length in this country since 1867. In 1875 it was debated in the House of Commons; it has been debated all across the country; it has been discussed at federal-provincial conferences; and, as we have seen, it has been debated in the Senate itself. Notwithstanding all of this attention, the Senate has never come up with an actual resolution dealing with the subject of Senate reform.

Still speaking as an individual senator and not on behalf of the government, I make this suggestion which I believe will be useful: I invite honourable senators who wish to speak to this matter to consider whether we should take advantage of the many hours of hard work done by the committee whose report is the subject matter of this inquiry and further consider whether the matter should be referred to Committee of the Whole.

Although we seldom use the Committee of the Whole, let me explain why I believe there would be many advantages in so doing. The disadvantage of proceeding as we are is that the inquiry will eventually simply peter out and be considered as having been debated. Therefore, we will not end up with a concrete position which the country may consider to be the Senate's position on Senate reform. If we try to amend the report, we cannot do so without sending it back to committee.

However, if we deal with the question of Senate reform in Committee of the Whole, using this report as a springboard because it deals with all the aspects of Senate reform, there will be several advantages. There is no limit on the number of times a senator may speak on the subject or any part of the subject. Amendments can be proposed in Committee of the Whole. All aspects of the report can be spoken to and even synthesized, eventually, into specific, concrete proposals for Senate reform. It will give every member of the Senate an opportunity to speak on all aspects of the subject. Of course, the framework will be the report itself. How that report may be amended at the conclusion of the Committee of the Whole stage, of course, we will not know until all senators have expressed their views.

The advantage of utilizing the report is that it has canvassed the subject and contains specific proposals that we can choose to agree with or disregard. The advantage of the Committee of the Whole is that it gives so much freedom for debate and amendment.

Therefore, I suggest that honourable senators consider my proposal. I hope that those who wish to participate in the debate on the inquiry now before us, or in the debate on the motion, notice of which Senator Roblin, has given today, will consider referring these matters to Committee of the Whole. However, that is a matter for Senator Roblin and others to consider.

Once again, I thank honourable senators for allowing me to speak personally, and not as the Deputy Leader of the Government, in considering the best way to achieve a concrete proposal for Senate reform.

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, personally I have no objection to dealing with all phases of Senator Lamontagne's resolution or Senator Roblin's motion. However, I should like to know if Senator Frith or the Leader of the Government in the Senate has given any thought to introducing a resolution concerning possible reform of the Senate, which resolution would reflect the thinking of the government and could be discussed and, possibly, amended.

Senator Frith: As I said last week, when I can speak for the government, I will do so. I am not speaking for the government at the present moment.

Naturally, I have thought about the government's possibly presenting a resolution but, as the situation now stands, I have nothing to offer in terms of the government's position on this question.

From the Senate's point of view, I feel it would be a mistake to await something from the government or elsewhere and that we, as senators, should engage in a discussion of Senate reform. I hope the government will come forward with something in due course, but I do not think we should wait for it because I see no immediate prospect of it.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: May I ask a question about the subject matter to be referred to the Committee of the Whole? Will it be the entire report of the committee or simply the aspects dealing directly with the subject of Senate reform? This is the expression that Senator Frith has been using. I was wondering if this means that only the aspects of the report dealing with Senate reform will be referred or if it will be the entire report. I am thinking for instance of the new role identified or defined in the report for the first ministers' conference. In other words, will the entire report be referred?

Senator Frith: I thank Senator Tremblay for drawing this aspect of the question to my attention since it had slipped my mind. It is a fact that I have talked mostly about the reform of the Senate. In my opinion, this reform would be incomplete without the other aspect, namely the House of the Federation. In any event, I am glad to take this opportunity to clarify matters and to point out that the entire report will be referred because one aspect is incomplete without the other.

[English]

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

EDUCATION

HIGHLIGHTS OF AN ADDRESS BY THE HONOURABLE GERALD REGAN,
 SECRETARY OF STATE, TO THE UNIVERSITY OF WESTERN ONTARIO,
 LONDON, ONTARIO, ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1982

- * In remarks to the student body of the University of Western Ontario, Feb. 5, 1982, Secretary of State Gerald Regan stated that while the federal government intends to continue to bear its part of the cost of the post-secondary education system in Canada, the provinces must begin to accept their fair share of the financial responsibility.
- * The Secretary of State noted that the system for sharing post-secondary education costs has never been satisfactory on either side, and that it has permitted "wholesale erosion" of their contribution by certain provinces over the years.
- * He indicated that in Ontario, in 1974/75, the federal government was contributing about 45 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education, with the province paying 34 per cent. Today, the federal share is approximately 59 per cent, while the government of Ontario pays only 21.8 per cent. In terms of dollars, this means that since 1974/75, the federal government's annual contribution to post-secondary education has increased from $469 million to $1.14 billion while, during the same period, the Ontario government contribution has only grown from $351 million to $418 million.

"What I am saying basically is that Ontario has been cheating—that it has not been meeting its share of the responsibility," stated Mr. Regan. He observed that if the current reduction in the provincial share of post-secondary spending continues, the day will soon come when the federal government and the private sector pay the entire cost of higher education in Canada.

"I want to make it clear that I am not seeking confrontation," stated Mr. Regan. "I think that Canadian citizens expect their two levels of government to cooperate . . . it is therefore extremely important that we all move towards the goal of enriching our country by creating a better post-secondary system."

- * The Secretary of State outlined the offer made to the provinces by the Prime Minister during the recent Economic Summit of First Ministers in Ottawa. He stated that the federal government is prepared to continue the 1977 program of block transfer funding for post-secondary education for a further two years, until March 31, 1984. Federal contributions during this two-year period would continue to increase by approximately 12 per cent per year.

This offer is based on certain conditions, namely that:

- the provinces not decrease their share of the cost of post-secondary education below the current rate; and — provincial governments undertake to discuss with the Secretary of State mechanisms for achieving major national objectives concerning new agreements on post-secondary education funding. These national principles include:

accountability, to ensure that the public knows what share of post-secondary operating costs is being paid by the Government of Canada and what share is being paid by the provinces;

mobility, the right of any Canadian citizen to be admitted to any university in Canada; accessibility to post-secondary education and adult training programs for all qualified Canadians.

- * Mr. Regan drew attention to the fact that the five-year federal-provincial agreement established in 1977 for funding post-secondary education involved the block transfer of funds to the provinces, with no conditions set by the federal government as to how this money would be spent.
- * The Secretary of State noted that, while education is primarily the constitutional responsibility of the provinces in Canada, the national government must be deeply concerned about the preparation, training and education of Canadian citizens.
- * Observing that the federal government is committed to national objectives such as accountability, mobility and accessibility in the post-secondary education area, the Secretary of State described options for ensuring that federal tax dollars are used to achieve these objectives. He observed, "the national government must be more than just a banker for the provinces if our country is to survive . . . I think it is necessary that Canadian citizens have more opportunity to deal direct with the national government and for the national government to deliver more programs direct to the people."
- * He said that if federal-provincial agreements cannot be satisfactorily reached, the government is prepared to explore several options for more direct funding of post-secondary education. He described the possibility of a voucher system whereby funds would be allocated directly to students, with each voucher being applicable toward tuition fees at the educational institution which the student attends.
- * Another possibility described by the Minister is to provide assistance directly to post-secondary institutions, or to independent grant commissions which would handle both federal and provincial funds and channel them to institutions.

* The Secretary of State concluded his remarks by pledging the support of the Government of Canada for the preservation of the positive features of Canada's post-secondary system, stating "Let us, to the greatest extent possible, move in such a way as to recognize and retain the highest degree of autonomy for the system and the individual institutions. That, I believe, is vitally important."

HIGHLIGHTS OF AN ADDRESS BY THE HONOURABLE GERALD REGAN, SECRETARY OF STATE, TO A SYMPOSIUM ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION SPONSORED BY THE STUDENTS' SOCIETY OF McGILL UNIVERSITY, MONTREAL, ON THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1982

In a speech to a symposium on post-secondary education sponsored by the Students' Society of McGill University, Secretary of State Gerald Regan today called upon the Government of Quebec to enter into formal talks with the federal government on the renegotiation of Established Programs Financing (EPF) arrangements on post-secondary education.

* "I don't believe that it is fair that Quebec universities and colleges be placed in the position of a political football because to operate effectively, universities must be allowed to preserve their academic freedom and independence," he said. "I want to pledge to you today that I will do all in my power to ensure that the citizens of Quebec continue to receive the benefits of federal support for post-secondary education."

* In reviewing the history of federal funding for post-secondary institutions in Canada since 1977, the Secretary of State noted that of the nearly $13-billion in cash and tax points which have been transferred to the provincial governments under EPF arrangements for support of post-secondary education, more than $3.4-billion has gone to the Province of Quebec.

* Mr. Regan emphasized four main points regarding the future of federal support for post-secondary education:

- the Government of Canada is committed to continuing its support for post-secondary education;
- the Canadian government fully intends to meet its responsibility to be accountable to Parliament and the Canadian people for federal financial contributions in the area of post-secondary education;

- Canadian universities and colleges represent a national resource deserving of national support. For this reason, the Canadian government is examining appropriate mechanisms for providing direct support to post-secondary students. Such possible methods include direct aid to universities, a student voucher system, or federal payments to regional granting councils which could coordinate funding from federal and provincial governments;

- in view of its major financial support to post-secondary education in Canada, the federal government must be a visible partner in the post-secondary decision-making process while, at the same time, continuing to respect overall provincial jurisdiction in the field of education.

* In stressing the need for the achievement of national objectives with respect to post-secondary education, Mr. Regan reaffirmed that the federal government has a necessary and important role to play in the post-secondary field.

"I have made the point on several occasions that the national government must be something more than just a banker for the provinces if we are to occupy a meaningful place in the hearts and minds of our citizens," he said. "I feel that this is vital if we are to survive as a nation."

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 24, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I draw to your attention the presence in the south gallery of His Excellency the Most Reverend Angelo Palmas, Pro-Nuncio; His Excellency John Joubert Becker, Ambassador of South Africa; His Excellency Petter Graver, Ambassador of Norway; His Excellency Antonio Elis y Martinena, Ambassador of Spain; His Excellency Olivier Exchaquet, Ambassador of Switzerland; His Excellency John R. P. Dumas, High Commissioner of Trinidad and Tobago; His Excellency Luis Henrique C. Navega, Ambassador of Portugal; and The Honourable Mr. Justice Thomas Callon, of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

VISIT OF ANGLOPHONE STUDENTS OF CONNAUGHT COLLEGE, OTTAWA

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, allow me to draw your attention to some very interesting visitors we met this morning in the Senate, a group of English-speaking students from the Connaught College in Ottawa, who are taking an accelerated French course. This morning, being one of the French-speaking senators, I had an opportunity to explain to them how the Senate operates. All the questions asked by the students were very interesting and were asked in French. The visit was very interesting, and I wish to take this opportunity to tell our visitors that we appreciated their presence here today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE ESTIMATES

DISTRIBUTION TO SENATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the tabling of the estimates yesterday evening. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon the same estimates were tabled in the other place. At 3 o'clock they were debated and all members were provided with copies. Yesterday afternoon the Senate received copies of the estimates, which were tabled in the chamber at 8 o'clock.

Since individual senators were not furnished with copies of the estimates, there was no opportunity for a reaction by the opposition, although the matter had been debated in the other place by all the opposition critics.

The matter was debated at 7 o'clock this morning on Canada AM by the President of the Treasury Board and the critic from the opposition.

I would point out that copies of the estimates did not arrive in senators' offices until 9.30 this morning.

When we talk of Senate reform, we should keep in mind that a lot of cleaning-up should be done around here. When everybody and his grandmother received a copy of the estimates yesterday, there is absolutely no reason why senators should not have received copies until 9.30 this morning.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the situation will be investigated immediately. Certainly, the standard practice was followed as far as this chamber is concerned, but standard practice may not be good enough under the present circumstances.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For once we receive a decent reply.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Doody be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Charbonneau on, and that the name of the Honourable Senator Phillips be added to, the list of senators serving on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Tremblay be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Murray on, and that the name of the Honourable Senator Phillips be added to, the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the minister responsible for our lack of economic development. I never know whether I should direct my question to the Leader of the Government or to the minister I just mentioned, because there is no telling which of the two is going to give the more evasive answer. In any case, last week after the Minister of State for Economic Development had given us a list of mega-projects which he said was not exhaustive, I asked him whether he would care to supplement his answer with a list of all projects that have been abandoned or postponed as a result of the government's fiscal and monetary policy. However, he answered, I believe, that he was not going to do my work for me. Since, on the other hand, he was prepared to do so for Senator Bosa, who had asked him to produce a list, I would ask the minister whether his answer is final, and whether he would not be willing to produce the list. It is, in fact, very important, because without it the list the minister did provide fails to reflect the actual situation.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there was another part of that question wherein I think I was asked if I could give a list of those that were being delayed or held up. That, of course, entails a certain amount of investigation into the minds of those who have the plans under way.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: That cannot be done with the same precision that I usually apply to the compilation of our answers.

The precision with which I listed those mega-projects that are under way—which prompted the Leader of the Opposition to ask the question—means those are the ones that are, in fact, under way.

Now, there may have been announcements by certain leaders in capital investment to the effect that they have delayed projects because of an apprehension about the cost of capital in the future. I guess if they say it we have to accept it, but it would be a rather complicated task, considering the accuracy and precision that we usually attach to answers to the opposition, to find out which ones had been delayed. I suppose the Leader of the Opposition would find some reason to disagree with the accuracy of whatever lists I came in with.

● (1410)

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary. Well, the answer may be better than usual, but it still gives me the same cause for concern I mentioned at the beginning of my question.

In preparing his so-called non-exhaustive list, the minister took for granted that any project announced up to ten years ago was actually in progress. I refuse to believe that he is unable to obtain a progress report on those projects from the various departments concerned or involved. It is as easy as taking for granted that any project announced up to ten years ago is going to continue and finally materialize.

[English]

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is partly wrong, which is usual, because—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Only partly? He is very lucky.

Senator Flynn: He is partly right as usual.

Senator Olson: —he attempts to describe the list that I gave as only a number of projects that have been under way for many years. I believe he used the extreme of ten years in one case.

Senator Flynn: Sure. The minister mentioned the James Bay project.

Senator Olson: No, I mentioned the transmission networks for the James Bay project.

Senator Asselin: That is the same thing.

Senator Olson: That is part and parcel of it. That project is under way although it is not completed. There are a lot of jobs involved in that project, and the entire list that I read—

Senator Asselin: How much money did you invest in it? None!

Senator Olson: Well, that was not the question. The question was as to how much money we invested in it, and also as to how many mega-projects, which are defined as costing $100 million or more, are in fact, under way. I gave only a partial list. There are many, many more—

Senator Asselin: Don't take credit for it.

Senator Olson: —that can be included because they all are contributing to the economic well-being and the economic activity in this country.

There was one other thing that is fairly important in relation to the matter the Leader of the Opposition is asking about now. If he is asking whether they can be financed because of what he mentioned—

Senator Flynn: I said "stalled or abandoned."

Senator Olson: The list that I gave contained the projects where the financing has been arranged for and committed.

Senator Flynn: I have a very precise question. The honourable minister said that the transmission line at James Bay was something new. Can he imagine the James Bay project, which started more than ten years ago, without any transmission lines?

Senator Olson: No, I cannot.

Senator Flynn: Come on! You're a joker!

Senator Olson: I cannot imagine any responsible government doing that.

Senator Flynn: And I cannot imagine a responsible minister taking credit for it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is incredible. The Leader of the Opposition is trying to say that the list of the mega-projects involving the private sector and crown corporations was something I was trying to take credit for.

Senator Flynn: You certainly did.

Senator Olson: That is the last thing I would do. The honourable gentleman opposite did not put the question in that context. He put the question in this fashion: What are these mega-projects that are going to be done in Canada by the private sector, by provincial governments and by the federal government? I know they could not stand the good news. Nevertheless—

Senator Flynn: Oh, my!

Senator Olson: —they cannot even take that on division. The fact is that that was asked for. We hardly ever get credit for what we do achieve, let alone try to take somebody else's credit. Therefore, that was not part of the question.

Senator Flynn: I ask again: Will he give me the list of the projects that have been abandoned or stalled?

Senator Olson: And I will have to say again that that is such an imprecise exercise that it would have to be subject to a lot of assumptions.

Senator Flynn: You are used to that.

• (1415)

Senator Olson: As I said the other day, I believe the Leader of the Opposition could probably do his homework in that respect better than I.

Senator Flynn: If you cannot do it, then I do not think that I can do it, because I have not the number of public servants or the resources at my disposal that you have. You refuse to do it because it would change the nature of the answer that you gave last week.

Senator Olson: No, it would not. Either the Leader of the Opposition has difficulty understanding me—

Senator Flynn: I am not the only one.

Senator Olson: —or he has some difficulty remembering what I have just said. As I told him some time ago, I really do not know what goes on in the minds of some people, unless they have made an assertion to that effect. Is he asking me to use the limited number of public servants at my disposal to go about the country asking the principal officers, in each project identified by the major projects committee, whether they are still contemplating completing it within the time frame suggested, or whether the completion date is somewhat different from that identified there or from what their intentions were some time ago? If that is the case, then I suppose he would put it in the category of being delayed.

Senator Flynn: You would do it if it served your partisan purposes.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You would refuse to hear it.

THE ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Can the minister, with any precision, tell us whether, and if so when, he expects that this country will regain the 300,000 manufacturing jobs lost in the last year, 110,000 of them since the month of August; or does he expect this disastrous decline in our economy to continue?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): We expect that the federal government's programs, and those of the private sector and others who are making investments in the economic activity of this country, will, in fact, create a lot more economic activity, including jobs.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): One million unemployed!

Senator Olson: My honourable friend also knows that one of the problems facing this country concerns a matter of confidence—

An Hon. Senator: In the government.

Senator Olson: —in the capability to manage things in such a way that we will have a down-turn in the inflationary rate. The inflationary rate has turned down somewhat for the last three months—not a great deal, but a little; but I suppose that is the kind of news the opposition cannot take, even on division. In any event, the fact remains that this is one of the major problems facing this country and other countries, and we have indicated in a number of ways, including the budget, that we have the courage to come to grips with it.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

THE BUDGET—REDUCTION IN INCOME FROM LIFE INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the same minister, dealing with the subject of investment. The Canadian Life & Health Insurance Association Inc., whose membership includes most insurance companies, estimates that following government budgetary measures their income arising from whole life premiums and annuities will be reduced by one-third.

I wish to point out that in 1980—we do not yet have the 1981 figures—that income totalled $6.5 billion. From $2 billion to $2.25 billion will not be available for investment in the economy of the country through these institutions.

My question is: What steps is the minister responsible for economic development going to take to replace those important investments in the economy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my honourable friend knows that the Minister of Finance has indicated that he is willing—I believe it is fair to say, as soon as the opposition parties in the other place agree—to refer that matter to a committee of that house for more detailed study. I believe there is some delay in obtaining the co-operation of the opposition to do that; otherwise it could have been done by now.

My honourable friend also knows—because I know he has some economic talents—that whether or not that money is accumulated in savings through that route does not shut off the total supply, because it may be that Canadians want to make their savings available for investment by another route.

● (1420)

Senator Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I believe what the minister is saying. The government is again interfering in the free market. They would rather shove these institutions aside and handle the funds themselves, with the results we usually see.

Senator Olson: That assertion is completely inaccurate.

Senator Charbonneau: If the government is taxing the cash surrender values of policies every three years, I do not see who is going to get the money but the government. If the minister can tell me where else it is going to go, I would certainly like to know.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator ought to know that a certain amount of fairness and equity was put into the budget proposals. If he wants to enter into a long term argument as to whether or not there is a number of ways by which assets can accumulate without paying taxes and at the same time by which other people can be asked, by a different route, to pay taxes, that will be a long and involved process. I understand that he is on one side of the argument, but that does not necessarily mean he is correct.

Senator Charbonneau: I must point out to the minister that I am not on one side of the argument while I am sitting in this house. I am trying to look at the whole argument. I still say, however, that since November $2 billion to $2.5 billion is not being invested in the economy. Is the minister going to replace these quite extensive investments?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the reply I gave a few moments ago is just as accurate to that question as it was to a previous question.

Hon. G. I. Smith: There is no accuracy to either.

[Senator Charbonneau.]

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I too have a question on the mega-projects for the Honourable the Minister of State for Economic Development.

On February 17, in reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Bosa—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): A planted question!

Senator Phillips: —the minister listed 14 federally funded mega-projects. Only one of those projects is in Atlantic Canada. The minister was very careful to advise Senator Flynn that a large part of that project would be carried out in Quebec. The project is, by the way, the Panamax drydock. As a matter of fact, only a partial project was listed for the Atlantic provinces. Was that an error of omission or an error of commission?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not accept the interpretation given by my honourable friend. I can, however, give him a more accurate list, if he likes. Perhaps I should say, a more complete list, which would probably add some accuracy.

Senator Phillips: I would welcome some accuracy from the honourable the minister. It would be, as it were, Senate reform taking effect. When he brings in his list I would like the benefits in man-years, and the number of man-years provided in Atlantic Canada from each of the projects.

Senator Olson: Yes. As a matter of fact, honourable senators, we are compiling a list including an estimate of both the direct and indirect labour involved, since I detected some time ago that there is a great interest in that aspect; and, indeed, there is a great desire on my part to give that information.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It is a very impressive list.

THE BUDGET

EFFECT ON PURCHASERS OF WHOLE LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Further to what my colleague, Senator Charbonneau, raised with respect to insurance policies, I appreciate that there have been charges and counter charges on the impact of the budget, especially as it relates to whole life insurance. To help clarify the matter, I have a question for the Leader of the Government to which I would like a specific answer.

Can he confirm that a 25-year-old male in the 36 per cent tax bracket, buying a $25,000 participating whole life policy at an annual premium of $237.25, the savings component of which would be $148.52, would, by the time he reaches age 73, have paid $28,357.60 in tax on such a policy?

● (1425)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Saved by the bell!

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is making inquiries into that, I wonder if he would ascertain whether, in the preparation of the budget—especially with respect to those tax measures relating to insurance—it is indeed true that the actuarial and technical people at the Department of Insurance were not consulted.

Senator Perrault: An inquiry will go forward on that point as well, honourable senators. I would point out, however, the rather doleful phenomenon; namely, the way in which certain members of the opposition seem to relish any alleged adverse aspect of the budget or any other issue. Increasingly, they are becoming the political “bad news bears.”

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Ask him if he is the political bull.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, this is absurd!

Senator Perrault: I did say “alleged.”

Senator Nurgitz: Surely the Leader of the Government would agree that an amount in excess of $28,000 paid in tax on a $25,000 life insurance policy is excessive and represents something for which even he would stand for correction.

Senator Perrault: Only if one accepts the accuracy of the allegation made by the honourable senator.

Senator Nurgitz: Ascertain the accuracy, then.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator builds a straw man and tries to knock him down.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: The honourable senator asked a question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. If my understanding is correct, the Minister of State for Economic Development said a few moments ago that this decision with regard to the budget was made on the principle of equity. Does he suggest that the rules which prevailed until then were not equitable?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the speech made by the Minister of Finance outlining some of the tax exemptions and other aspects of the budget, pointing out where there is a disproportionate share of the tax burden, is very valid. I would recommend to my good friend, the Leader of the Opposition, that he read it carefully, not only once but several times, until he gets the message. I know that he, too, is a proponent of fairness and justice in the taxation system.

Senator Flynn: We should have got rid of those rules a long time ago.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, on this side of the house we have never claimed to be perfectionists.

Senator Flynn: Only more perfect than anybody else!

Senator Olson: We have only claimed that we do our best to improve things as we go along.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Prime Minister, during the meeting of first ministers, supported the policy of high interest rates as the only way to stop inflation. Given today's speculation to the effect that the Bank of Canada would let the value of the dollar fall to the equivalent of 75 cents U.S. in order to lower interest rates in this country, would the minister advise us whether there is any change of policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I am sure that the Honourable Senator Charbonneau is aware that it is not wise—in fact, it is not the practice—of anyone in the government to deal with that kind of speculation. Whether the Bank of Canada has given any indication that it is going to do that is a matter that I would want to double check. I have seen no such indication from the responsible officers involved. I would say that anyone who wishes to speculate on the matter has to be responsible for his own speculation.

Senator Charbonneau: I must say to the honourable minister that, though I specified that it was speculation, the idea is so widespread in the financial community that, given its close connection with the officers of the Bank of Canada, one begins to wonder. Where there's smoke there's fire.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think it would be good advice to the public at large, including the financial community, to listen much more carefully to the government, rather than to the speculations sometimes promoted by members opposite.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I doubt that you would be able to convince the financial community to listen to what the government has to say.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): You are all smoke and no fire over there this afternoon.

● (1430)

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, last Thursday Senator Perrault, in response to my question of February 17, tabled a letter from the Minister of Transport to the President of Air Canada. The Leader of the Government will recall that in my question I cited that letter and the fact that it gave rise to my question, which was to the effect, “Why has the participation of the Quebec government in Quebecair impaired the government's willingness to sell Nordair to Quebecair?” That question is not answered in the letter tabled by the leader, which is from the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin to Claude Taylor, President of Air Canada. So, I ask the leader if he will be kind enough to bring to the chamber a proper reply, thereby settling the question once and for all.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator's expressed concern this afternoon, that my reply of last week may not have been as complete as he desired, will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

THE SENATE

CLERESTORY—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a non-controversial question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Martial Asselin: For once.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Did you give notice?

Senator Asselin: Is it a planted question?

Senator Bosa: It is not a planted question.

Senator Flynn: It is well prepared.

Senator Bosa: Spring is not yet here. The Special Senate Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber reported on June 8, 1977, and that report can be found in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of that date. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can share with us any information he may have as to the implementation of that report. It seems to me that it has to do with changing the decoration of the Senate chamber, including the paintings, which are of war scenes. It seems to me that over the past two or three sitting days there has been a great deal of belligerence exhibited among honourable senators, and that if those paintings are an influence, that may be a good reason for replacing them.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Bosa has posed this question with his usual perceptive insight. I can say that we have had no meetings recently with the Leader of the Opposition to discuss the implementation of the recommendations contained in that report, but perhaps a peaceful moment can be found for such a discussion.

Senator Flynn: This report is rather old now. I am wondering whether it dealt only with the clerestory or the paintings as well. Certainly, if renovations are being considered, the paintings are something to which we could give our attention.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The report mentions the paintings as well.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government aware that the report includes 11 recommendations and that recommendation number 6 refers specifically to the paintings?

Senator Perrault: I am aware of the contents of the report, although I have not reviewed it recently, simply because of other priorities. Perhaps it would be appropriate to discuss ways in which the chamber could be visually given new life and vitality.

Senator Asselin: For once, I agree with you.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On December 9, 1981, I asked the Leader of the Government whether the government still considered the freedom of information bill a priority. I ask him today whether he stands by the statement he made on this topic, which is reported at page 550 of Debates of the Senate of June 27, 1980:

Certainly, this government has established access to information and freedom of information as top priorities—

Unless the Leader of the Government has reversed himself, how does he now define a top priority in terms of legislative scheduling, and when might we expect to hear further on this matter?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that this topic has been raised in Parliament in recent days. One of the principal difficulties in dealing with this legislation has been the very concerted opposition by certain provincial attorneys general, as the honourable senator is aware. That opposition is not confined to any one party and, certainly, it includes a number of supporters of the Progressive Conservative Party.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: It is the first time you have ever listened to them.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition has drawn my attention to the fact that most of the people opposing this legislation are Conservatives. If that is the case, then perhaps the Leader of the Opposition can explain the inscrutable position of the Conservative attorneys general and their opposition to this legislation.

Senator Flynn: And you can tell us why you are listening to them now, when you have never listened before.

Senator Perrault: This government is committed to co-operative federal-provincial relations.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh, I knew you would fall into the trap.

Senator Perrault: We try to proceed, insofar as it is possible, in concert with our friends in the provinces.

Senator Flynn: It was a bear-trap and you fell right into it.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, surely the leader does not expect us to wait for the support of Liberal provincial attorneys general? I will not await the leader's answer, because even he would not ask us to wait that long, if ever, or, indeed, forever. In any event, as I understand it, the leader's answer is that we will not have freedom of information legislation unless we have agreement with the provinces, and that what we ought to be doing is looking to the provinces to get this legislation through.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, diligent efforts are being made to persuade the provincial attorneys general and their premiers to accept the concept of a freedom of information measure which can be dealt with by Parliament and which will enjoy general support across the country. We are striving, not for the political conversion of the attorneys general, although it would be highly desirable, but, rather, to achieve some sort of consensus in co-operation with the federal government. Honourable senators will remember that the provincial attorneys general have stated that there should be a standard approach to freedom of information from coast to coast and that they have expressed this view rather strongly.

Senator Nurgitz: In that case, will the Leader of the Government give us some indication of the status of the negotiations? I am not asking for the particulars of the negotiations, merely their status.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That would be a case of freedom of information, and we can't have that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall ask the Minister of Justice for a statement which can be brought to the Senate and thus provide an update.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary question to the questions raised by Senator Nurgitz. Since it appears that the Government of Canada is looking forward to the help, assistance and co-operation of the attorneys-general of the provinces before the freedom of information measure is made law, perhaps this demonstrates a new approach in federal-provincial relations and, perhaps, the same sort of attitude or set of rules can be applied to the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. Will the government ask the ministers of finance of the provinces for their agreement before any change is made to that act?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, of course, one question is not directly related to the other.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Of course not; this question deals with money.

Senator Perrault: As far as the fiscal relations are concerned, there has been extensive discussion with the provincial first ministers and the ministers of finance in an effort to achieve an agreement. When it is impossible to achieve agreement, of course the national government must demonstrate the qualities of leadership. But every effort is being made in all areas to attain friendly and co-operative agreements on all such matters.

● (1440)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary question concerning freedom of information. Is it the intention of the government to continue the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister that the government and its officials will, in the meantime, act as if the freedom of information legislation has been passed?

Hon. Lowell Murray: That is a good question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: I say that, honourable senators, because I believe that a complete statement from the Minister of Justice should incorporate a reply to the question asked by the distinguished senator from Toronto, Senator Godfrey.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I would return for a moment to the disastrous loss of employment in the manufacturing sector which, as I said earlier, amounts to some 300,000 jobs in the past year.

My question arises from a statement made by the minister some days ago which has just come to my attention. In a statement made in Victoria, British Columbia, according to the Globe and Mail, the minister said that Ottawa is going to stop propping up manufacturing industries that have not been able to make a go of it in the world marketplace and will concentrate instead on the resource sector.

I would draw the minister's attention to the following quotation:

We're going to stop propping up mature industries that will never be competitive in this generation, like textiles, clothing, footwear and a number of others.

Is it the position of the government that the entire textile, clothing and footwear industries will never be competitive in this generation and, therefore, should be allowed to go down the drain; or is it the position of the government that only some of the firms in each of those industries will never be competitive and, therefore, should be allowed to go down the drain?

If the latter position applies, when may we expect the minister to bring in a list of the industries that are being propped up, that are inefficient, that will never be competitive in this generation, and that are to be allowed to go down the drain? This information is essential so that those communities which are dependent on the industries, and the employees that are dependent on those industries, will have some time to plan for their futures.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has indicated that he was absent from the chamber last week. I would point out that I dealt with that question or a very similar question some days ago. The honourable senator will no doubt read my remarks in Hansard.

I said, without equivocation, that what was reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail was taken out of context and that some words were dropped out of my sentences. I do not often complain about being misquoted.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You always do.

Senator Olson: In this case I was selectively under-quoted to advertently or inadvertently leave the wrong impression.

I cannot add much more to what I said last week, and I am sure the honourable senator will refer to my remarks. I know that I said "some" industries. Over 90 per cent of the textile industry in Canada is already internationally competitive. We have set up a board and a mechanism to try to bring some more of that industry up to an internationally competitive position. We have funded that board to the tune of $250 million.

I will not go into the remainder of the details, but I would categorically point out to the honourable senator again that, in my view, the impression left by that press release was grossly unfair.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

CONTINUATION OF LOW INTEREST LOANS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question deals with the Farm Credit Corporation. I am not quite sure who assumes responsibility for that area, but I notice that Senator Argue has had a very easy afternoon, so perhaps I should direct my question to him.

The $50 million for low interest loans provided to the Farm Credit Corporation in the budget was exhausted early in February. As a result, the Farm Credit Corporation has stopped accepting applications for low interest loans from farmers who are in dire straits and are about to lose their farms.

Is it the intention of the government to provide additional funding to the FCC for the purpose of low interest loans to farmers, and, if so, when will this be done?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not have any precise information on the question asked by Senator Phillips, which is whether the government is considering an extension or an increase in the amount available to farmers who are in difficult circumstances.

However, I do have some information, supplied to my office today, which honourable senators may find of interest and which relates to part of the question. Approximately 450 applicants have applied for assistance under this program. To date, 221 applications have been approved and $28 million has gone out. The remaining applications are being considered. My information indicates that there will most likely be enough money to cover the applications that have already been approved and those which will be approved in the next few days. I will be very happy to take Senator Phillips' question as notice.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Argue: Some honourable senators may laugh, but I think it is important in the operation of the Government of

[Senator Olson.]

Canada that senators on both sides of the house express their opinions. The government may consider Senator Phillips' comments and, therefore, I will be very happy to pass on his suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Phillips: I thank the honourable minister for the information he has provided. This information coincides exactly with the information contained in the Globe and Mail article which I have. I presume Senator Argue's staff got their information from the same place.

Senator Argue: They read the Globe and Mail?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): They should show better judgment than to read the Globe and Mail!

Senator Phillips: The honourable minister neglected to mention that the vice-president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture has stated that, in the absence of additional funds, approximately 3,000 more farmers will go bankrupt. I would point out that that amounts to approximately one out of every eight members of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. Would the minister convey this information to the Minister of Agriculture and impress upon him the urgency of the situation?

Senator Argue: I will be happy to do so. The government has responded to this situation. There have been 450 applications and, to date, 221 have been approved. I believe that is a good outcome considering the short period of time this program has been in place. If circumstances warrant a further increase in this allocation, I will be happy to take that suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Phillips: As a further supplementary question, I would point out that $50 million of the budget was voted for emergency assistance to farmers unable to arrange financing elsewhere. On reading the estimates this morning, I noticed that the economic envelope for the Farm Credit Corporation showed a $46.5 million increase. Would the minister explain the difference between the figures contained in the estimates and those contained in the budget?

Senator Argue: I would be happy to take that question as notice.

THE SENATE

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, my question is for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Last night there was some discussion in this chamber regarding Senate reform. If I remember correctly, the Deputy Leader of the Government made it clear that, at least for the time being, we should not expect any government proposals for Senate reform.

At some stage, does the deputy leader intend to move that the report of Senator Lamontagne's subcommittee be submitted to a Committee of the Whole?

● (1450)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Deschatelets for that question. I suppose I ought to have made it clearer last evening. I do not intend to move that this report, or Senator Roblin's resolution, or the subject of Senate reform, generally, be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

My suggestion of last evening was a suggestion made as a private senator. I felt I ought not to intervene on the main subject, because I might be taken as speaking for the government, and for the same reason I feel I ought not to propose a motion that the subject be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

I said I thought that was a good procedure and I invited honourable senators to comment on that suggestion. If it was their opinion that this subject should be referred to a Committee of the Whole, then perhaps a motion to that effect would be moved by a private senator.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I still cannot understand why a new subject was broached in the first place. We have the Lamontagne report, which is being debated, and that will eventually end up with some resolution, so why bring up new subjects? This only creates confusion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, my intention was not to bring up new subjects, but to suggest that Senate reform be a subject in respect of which the Senate should take the lead, or at least keep the debate alive.

Hon. Martial Asselin: A new form of debate.

Senator Frith: Yes, to lead the debate rather than continuing with an Inquiry, which will peter out.

We should have a concrete proposal for the country which represents the majority view of the Senate on the question of Senate reform. Therefore, I am not really raising a new subject, but am expressing the hope that we will lead the debate so that when the country or any government considers Senate reform they will have not just the report of the committee, on which debate just petered out, but also an actual set of suggestions.

There are suggestions in the air now. There is a private member's bill before the other place. There is an ongoing discussion on Senate reform. In the total literature on Senate reform there shall be suggestions made by the Senate.

It seems to me that there are many experts out there on Senate reform, and there have been many experts on Senate reform since 1867. No one has ever had before them the majority opinion of the outstanding experts on the subject of the Senate, namely, the members of the Senate.

Senator Marshall: Would the deputy leader give us his reaction to the recommendations in the Lamontagne report? There are recommendations and proposals in that report. Why does he say there are no proposals? There are proposals regarding the retention of an appointed Senate, and other recommendations. Why not stop the debate and put this to the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that, of course, could happen and perhaps it will happen. I am suggesting that the best way of debating and dealing procedurally with concrete proposals that might be synthesized from the Lamontagne report, or the proposals put forward by Senator Roblin, is to deal with them in Committee of the Whole, for the reasons I gave last evening. That gives all senators an opportunity to debate the subject as often as they wish. There would be a much more thorough examination because we would not be limited to one speech each on the subject.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, further to what Senator Marshall has said regarding the Lamontagne report and the great effort undertaken by Senator Goldenberg, may I ask the deputy leader whether the objective he seeks could be reached along the lines suggested by Senator Marshall? Senator Frith, as well as many other prominent senators on the government side, praised this report to the high heavens. I see that Senator Frith is nodding his head. He agrees with me and I appreciate that.

Senator Frith: I was a member of the committee.

Senator Muir: Then why do you want to kill this? Do you think that this great work undertaken by Senator Lamontagne, Senator Goldenberg, and yourself included, should be thrown on to the garbage pile? As Senator Marshall has stated, can we not go ahead with this report and reach the objectives you seek, or the objectives others may seek? We might even reach the objectives sought by those who want to be elected members of this house, who tried to get elected to the other place but never did, and I doubt they could be elected to this house.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am reminded of a rule attributed to H. V. Kaltenborn, who was one of the first great radio announcers in the days of Gabriel Heatter. He said in verbal communication you must always tell your audience what you are going to tell them, tell them, and then tell them you told them. So, I will now go to the last part of that rule.

Senator Muir asked me why I wanted to destroy or kill the Lamontagne report. Again, it seems to me that the slow and painless, but eventual death of the Lamontagne report would be its continuation as an Inquiry. At some point His Honour will stand and say, "This Inquiry is considered debated." If that occurs, the report would then sink quietly beneath the surface not to be seen again. That has happened, as I indicated last evening, on eight or nine previous occasions.

So, rather than letting it die, I want to keep it alive, refer it to a Committee of the Whole so that the Committee of the Whole can deal with it and bring it forward, concrete, alive and full of vigour, for consideration by others.

So, my objectives are exactly those of Senator Muir, but he has misunderstood how I want to achieve them.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I understand that the deputy leader does not want to kill the Lamontagne, or Goldenberg, report. At the same time he tells us that he prefers another procedure—referral to a Committee of the Whole. He asked us to think about that. We are thinking about it now, but we know very well that, while we can think as hard as we can on this side, if someone on the other side is not thinking along the same lines what we want to happen will not happen. That is why I ask whether the deputy leader has something to propose. He just told us that he is proposing that as a private senator and not in the name of the government, but everyone on this side knows that if the government does not want to refer this to a Committee of the Whole it will not be referred to a Committee of the Whole. So, why does the deputy leader not guide our thinking by telling us what he has in mind? We started thinking last night; we are thinking now, and we will think tomorrow, but I do not know where our thinking will lead us if he does not tell us what he proposes to do.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not know whether this is the “telling you what I am going to tell you,” the “telling you,” or the “told you,” but I will do it again.

The suggestion I make, and the suggestion I made at the very beginning, is that the method of dealing with this subject should not, at this stage, be by way of a partisan approach, be it the government's official position or the opposition's official position.

• (1500)

Again, in my view, there should be, if there is such an expression, a totally “whip-free” debate. It should not depend at all on party lines. It seems to me that we will not be tapping the source, which I consider to be the most expert source—the senators—if we deal with it on the basis of what the government or the official opposition thinks. The reason I am not giving any more guidance than that is because I should like to hear what other senators think we should do, not what the government or the opposition thinks.

Senator Tremblay: Could the following conclusion be drawn from what Senator Frith has said: Let all of us think harder?

Senator Frith: I think that is always a good idea.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, concerning the proposed consideration in Committee of the Whole of the report entitled: “Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution,” we are referring here to the report, published in November 1980, by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs under the chairmanship of the Honourable H. Carl Goldenberg.

The report contains two parts, namely Part I under the heading: “Towards a Renewed Federation: A New Federal-Provincial Council”, and Part II, often referred to as the Lamontagne Report, under the heading: “Towards a Renewed Senate”.

[Senator Frith.]

If we deal with the report in Committee of the Whole, some kind of procedure must still be followed. We cannot consider items at random in the report. We should perhaps start by considering Part I and then Part II. When we discuss Part II, we can appropriately deal with the motion by Senator Roblin concerning election rather than appointment of members of the Senate.

I feel that this way we could consider all the suggestions made in the report. I also have a few proposals to make; in fact, I have already made a few, which may not have been included in the report, but still I would like to discuss them again. This will therefore be an opportunity for senators to discuss again their own proposals and, finally, to try to achieve, not unanimity, of course, but a consensus across party lines, so that we can tell the government: This is what we want.

I feel that in the report and in our discussions we can do a lot without having to amend any legislation or the Constitution.

We could start by discussing what we can do ourselves, without having to amend an act or the Constitution. I believe that we could perhaps concentrate on what can be done here, by examining and modifying our rules, if necessary, and try to make any improvements we can right away, without waiting to be told what to do. Subsequently, if we have any proposals that require amendments to legislation or to the Constitution, we could at that time submit our recommendations to the government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Leblanc has given an accurate analysis of the situation, because what we have now is merely the opinion of a committee. As I mentioned yesterday in answer to a question by Senator Tremblay, I feel that the two parts of the report cannot be separated.

It is true that the question of electing the Senate membership appears both in the report and in the motion by Senator Roblin. That is why I suggested using the report as a springboard for dealing with these issues in Committee of the Whole. It is not a matter of agreeing with or dismissing the entire report, since the report's various aspects can be discussed one by one. That is why I feel that we can use the report as a springboard, as I said just now. I find that dealing with the subject in Committee of the Whole is the best way to achieve maximum flexibility.

[English]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government if it is not possible to continue the debate on the inquiry so that honourable senators who have any contribution to make to it can do so and if, at the appropriate time, it seems that more affirmative action could be taken, there could be a motion that the subject matter of that inquiry be referred to an appropriate forum. I feel justified in asking the honourable senator if his fear of the inquiry debate dying off might adequately be dealt with in the way I just described.

Senator Frith: I think that is a very good point. I ought to have made it clearer than I did. I am not suggesting that we stop the debate on the inquiry, or stop the debate on Senator Roblin's motion, or on any aspect of the subject that comes before us. All I am saying is that in the meantime we should adopt Senator Tremblay's words, and think hard about the matter so that when the debate on the inquiry starts to peter out we shall have a way of keeping the subject alive and giving it more concrete expression.

Senator Marshall: It could be put in the form of a question tomorrow. A deadline should be put on it.

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the text of the telex sent on February 22 to William Marshall, President of the Council and Minister responsible for Energy in the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador. The telex is from the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it relates to the joint form of inquiry. It reads as follows:

Thank you for your telex regarding the Ocean Ranger tragedy. I received this telex this morning. I will be replying in respect of the joint form of inquiry as soon as I have consulted with my officials and my colleagues.

At this point, however, I wish to correct certain impressions left and misstatements contained in your recent telex.

On February 15 I asked for your general comments regarding the federal inquiry. I received no such comments. Instead you notified me the next day that the Government of Newfoundland intended to proceed with its own inquiry and advised as to terms of reference.

I am surprised and shocked that you suggest that I never offered a joint inquiry. I am sure that you recall your conversation with my executive assistant in the early afternoon of February 16th last. He telephoned you on my behalf to indicate that we were finalizing our terms of reference but that I still wished to pursue the notion of a joint inquiry. You indicated, however, that a telex was already on its way from you advising of the Government of Newfoundland's decision to establish its own inquiry.

It is important that we spare no effort to find out whatever we can about this tragedy. A joint effort would assist us in this goal. The people of Newfoundland, and indeed all Canadians, have the right to expect no less from both levels of government. This being said, I want to express regret at the tenor of the comments contained in your recent telex.

It is important that we put such considerations aside.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government tell us what date is on that telex?

Senator Perrault: The date on the telex, in both French and English, is February 22. I have no record as yet of a reply.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND AND U.S.S.R.—SANCTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have further information with respect to the measures announced by the government on Tuesday. This is dated today.

The limited measures announced by the government on Tuesday are designed to demonstrate our concern both to Poland and to the U.S.S.R. at the lack of progress in the return to normality in Poland.

The measures are largely political in nature and, in general, parallel those taken by our western allies. At the same time, they serve to indicate Canadian displeasure with both the continued repression of civil rights in Poland and the Soviet attitude towards these developments.

We have tried to ensure that the Polish people will not suffer as a result of the measures. It is for this reason we will continue to permit Poland to purchase grain under the terms of the existing long-term grain agreement.

To date Canada has contributed $600,000 to support relief efforts by the Red Cross and the Canadian Polish Congress. I expect we will be making further contributions of this kind.

● (1510)

The recent attacks in the Polish media on Lech Walesa and on the Roman Catholic Church are a disquieting indication that no progress is being made that would lead to national reconciliation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the Leader of the Government accept a supplementary question with respect to the Polish situation?

Senator Perrault: Yes, indeed.

Senator Roblin: In the statement given to us last night, it was pointed out that the government intended to extend no new commercial credits to Poland other than for food, but when the minister came to Soviet Russia, no such reservation was made. Is it the policy of the government to abstain from extending new commercial credits to Russia in the same way that it has done in connection with Poland?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have information on that specific point; therefore I shall take the question as notice.

Senator Roblin: I was referring to the statement that no new commercial credits would be extended to Poland except for food. I am wondering if the same policy applies to Russia.

Another point that concerns me is that there is no government policy with respect to the export of high technology items to Poland and Russia. Perhaps the minister could furnish me with a statement of the government's policy on this point.

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SERVICES—USER-PAY POLICY— POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on December 4, 1981, concerning the position of the government on user fees for hospitals. Perhaps the honourable senator would agree to the reply being incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The contributions to the provinces under the national health insurance programs are conditional, in part, upon the plans of the provinces meeting certain criteria contained in federal health insurance legislation. These relate to such matters as the comprehensiveness of insured services covered, universality of population covered, reasonable access to insured services without impediment by way of user charges, portability of benefits, adequate standards of hospital care and public administration on a non-profit basis.

There is nothing in the Medical Care Act (Canada), which was passed by Parliament in 1966, which precluded user charges or extra-billing by doctors per se. Rather, the act requires that a plan of a province be operated "on a basis that provides for reasonable compensation for insured services rendered by medical practitioners and that does not impede or preclude, either directly or indirectly whether by charges made to insured persons or otherwise, reasonable access to insured services by insured persons". In other words, extra-billing is not banned by current legislation as long as it does not impede reasonable access to insured services.

A similar requirement for reasonable access is contained in the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. It too does not preclude user charges for hospital care as long as the charges do not impede reasonable access.

THE ENVIRONMENT

EAST COAST—KURDISTAN OIL SPILL—RECOVERY OF CLEAN-UP COSTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Marshall on February 3, 1982, concerning compensation for the Kurdistan oil spill.

The Canadian government is now suing the owners of the Kurdistan under part XX of the Canada Shipping Act for the full amount of the government's claim, $6.9 million, in the Federal Court of Canada.

The owners of the Kurdistan have commenced limitation action under the Canada Shipping Act to limit their liability. This action will also be heard in the Federal Court of Canada.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Crown has filed a defence in this action, contesting the owner's right to limit. It appears that this action will be proceeded with in the first instance and considerable pre-trial activity is under way, including Discovery of Documents, with oral examination expected in the spring of this year and trial action later in the fall.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL SERVICES—ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL FUNDS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the reply to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on February 16, 1982, concerning the allocation of more federal funds for medical insurance programs.

The national government is not cutting back on the allocation of funds for medical care. In fact, payments to the provinces under Established Programs Financing will increase by almost 12 per cent per year over the next five years to meet increases in payments for hospital insurance, medical care and increases in extended health care services.

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROJECTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Nurgitz on February 18, 1982, regarding the telex sent to the provincial governments by the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy on February 11, 1982.

Honourable senators, I have a copy of the text of the telex sent by the Minister of Employment and Immigration to his provincial government counterparts. Rather than tabling it, perhaps honourable senators would agree to the telex being incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(Text of telex follows:)

During the recent First Ministers' Conference, the premiers expressed a concern we all share for the Canadian unemployed. Positive, effective action on the part of governments was called for and it is in that light that I am pleased to invite you to participate in the most recent federal initiative to use unemployment insurance funds to enhance the long-term viability of our natural resources.

As you know, on February 8, 1982, in conjunction with the Minister of Natural Resources for Ontario, I announced a job creation program which will enable laid-off forestry workers in Ontario to continue working in forestry-related activities during the current downturn in the industry. These activities will be designed to enhance the productivity of this sector in the longer term.

Federal support for this joint federal-provincial undertaking will be provided through the provisions of section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Under this section of the act persons who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits, who have no immediate prospect of employment and who elect to participate in a job creation project set up under the act, are able to receive a supplement to their normal unemployment insurance benefit level. The rate of benefit paid under section 38 is determined by the going rate of pay for the work being undertaken to a maximum currently established at $240 weekly. In the case of the Ontario forestry workers, the Government of Ontario will be providing participants with an additional $60 weekly supplement and is providing a contribution toward maintaining the workers' benefit packages as well as contributing toward overhead and other administrative costs incurred by the project.

This program is currently operating only in Ontario. I am sure, however, that you share my concern that other opportunities for providing people with temporary employment in productive activities should not go unexplored. In the case of the forestry sector particularly, the kind of arrangement underway in Ontario can be a means of providing people with work, of maintaining a cash flow in communities which are dependent upon this resource and of ensuring that the recovery period is not impeded by the need to replace skilled workers who have been forced to move elsewhere.

In my February 8, 1982 announcement of the use of section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act in Ontario I indicated that the federal government would be prepared to consider proposals from elsewhere in Canada where similar arrangements might be set up. I am therefore pleased to extend this invitation to consider ways in which our respective levels of government may be able to act in concert in order to provide increased employment opportunities for those persons to whom this approach may be suited and appropriate.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE
WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:

That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last night I mentioned that there had been some discussion with Senator Murray as to whether we should consider this motion as having been debated, without prejudice to its being revived. Since the motion was introduced we have had some aspects of the National Energy Program before us in the Senate and for study in committee. I believe that legislation will be forthcoming shortly and I am wondering if, under the circumstances, and without prejudice to the reintroduction of the whole subject, perhaps in the form of an inquiry, this item could be withdrawn. I will leave that decision to Senator Murray, because it is his motion.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with the qualification mentioned by the Deputy Leader of the Government, I agree to having this motion withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray will recall that we discussed the possibility of treating this inquiry in much the same way as we treated Order of the Day No. 5, but not because we anticipate getting legislation on it. The honourable senator will recall that there was discussion on whether this subject, which is a fast-moving one, would be better treated in the daily Question Period, again without prejudice to the reintroduction of the subject by way of inquiry.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, on whose behalf I moved the adjournment. Until I have had an opportunity to do so, I would prefer that the order stand.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ESTABLISHMENT OF POSITION OF DEPUTY SPEAKER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 23, 1982, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report on the establishment of the position of Deputy Speaker of the Senate, including the need for such a position, the recommended procedures therefor, and the compensation to be paid the incumbent.

Hon. Jack Marshall: How long is the term?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, from time to time the suggestion has emanated from various sources that the position of Deputy Speaker of the Senate be formalized and that it be established as a position in the Senate. This matter has been discussed rather thoroughly with the Leader of the Opposition and there is an all-party agreement that the best procedure, under the circumstances, would be to refer the matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to determine whether or not there is need for such a position, the compensation, if any, to be paid the incumbent, and other details. I would, therefore, ask honourable senators to support this reference.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words in connection with this motion. This matter was discussed some years ago, and, in my view, action is long overdue. In any Parliament worthy of the name that I have visited, there is a Speaker and a Deputy Speaker. The latter not only undertakes duties within the chamber but also outside, should the Speaker be unable to fulfil his duties through sickness. I do not know why this matter has been delayed so long. I consider it a good move and I hope that the position of Deputy Speaker will be established as soon as possible.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government has indicated, this matter was discussed by representatives of both sides of the house. I wish to draw the leader's attention to the fact that this motion does not accept the principle in advance. It merely refers the question to a committee. Therefore, we are not saying "Yes"; we are simply asking the committee to report on the question.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, as I understand it, this matter was first dealt with by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I am wondering, then, why the matter should not be referred back to the Internal Economy Committee. Why is the Internal Economy Committee being by-passed in this way?

• (1520)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Guay was not present at the meeting when this matter was dealt with. Far from being by-passed, the Internal Economy Committee felt that the best committee to consider this matter in its first stage would be the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Guay might understandably be concerned, because the motion refers to the compensation to be paid. That may end up before the Internal Economy Committee but, as Senator Flynn has pointed out, before any of that takes place the committee is being asked to consider whether it is a desirable thing. The other matters will follow in due course.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am quite sure that the Internal Economy Committee said, "Well, the leaders will look into this matter and refer it to a committee, whether that committee be the Internal Economy Committee or the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs". The Internal Economy Committee is not being by-passed. It will have to consider the matter before it is finally decided.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

REFORM—MOTION RE ELECTION OF MEMBERS—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 23, 1982, moved:

That this House affirms that the federal character of representative and responsible government in Canada will be strengthened if the membership of the Senate is constituted by election rather than by appointment.

He said: Honourable senators—

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Rule 44(2) states that 48 hours' notice, or two days' notice, is required for a motion of this type.

Notice of this motion was given last evening. At that time, when Senator Roblin stated that he wished to speak today, several of us said he should do so on Thursday. I do not recall His Honour the Speaker ruling on the matter, and there is nothing in Hansard in this regard.

I have no objection to the motion being moved, but, honourable senators, I am thoroughly fed up with the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition coming in, having a tête-à-tête, deciding what they are going to do, and tossing the rule book out the window. I suggest that we follow the normal procedure in the future.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand the point raised by Senator Phillips. He is quite correct on that matter. In my respectful submission, however, he is quite wrong when he suggests that a tête-à-tête took place and the rule book was thrown out the window. Senator Roblin made it quite clear last evening that he was giving notice for Thursday. He gave perfectly proper notice with regard to that. He then added, however, that he would prefer to give his address on the subject "tomorrow"—that is, today.

[Senator Murray.]

As Senator Phillips said, no ruling was made. If I am right in saying that Senator Roblin gave notice for Thursday but gave advance warning that he wanted to speak to the motion today, then it seems a simple matter for him to ask for leave to proceed today, and as far as we are concerned we will grant such leave.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think that leave need be granted—unless I read the rules improperly.

Rule 45 says that one day's notice shall be given for the making of a substantive motion, which is the case here. I do not see how rule 44 would apply.

I do not know if Senator Phillips will suffer any prejudice by the debate commencing today. If that was his point I think we should consider it; but I can tell him there was no agreement between the two sides. The rule is there, and should apply unless Senator Phillips says, "I would rather have this debate started later on, for a good reason," in which case we possibly could agree with him.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think it is important, since we are talking about the rules, that this be quite clear. I was not suggesting that the motion fell under rule 44. In fact, I agree with Senator Flynn that it is a substantive motion and comes under rule 45. It is just that my recollection was that, for whatever reason, Senator Roblin gave notice for Thursday—I do not feel he had to, but I thought that that is what he said—at the same time pointing out that he would like to speak to it "tomorrow".

I say that under either interpretation, whether it be rule 44 requiring two days' notice that governs and, as a result, requires leave—which we will, of course, give—or rule 45, which I believe is the case, Senator Roblin warned us yesterday evening that he wanted to proceed today. In fact, we on this side are anxious to hear him this afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I believe this motion falls under rule 45.

Does Senator Roblin have leave to speak to this motion today?

Senator Flynn: We do not need to give leave.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I express my appreciation to the house for the courtesy extended to me in allowing me to make this statement now. I do believe it is in order, in any case, to make it on this occasion, but it is gratifying to know that there is no objection, either within or without the rules, and I appreciate that.

It is not to be supposed, honourable senators, that at the present time there are many members of the Senate who would agree with the thrust of the proposition contained in this motion. Perhaps on a good day we might be able to find six or so—although maybe I am being a little pessimistic—who would be inclined to support it as a matter of principle. So I know that when I introduce the idea now I am speaking for myself alone, not for my caucus, not for members of my party, and not for any other member of the Senate, for that matter. But I think it is a subject which ought to be ventilated in a direct way, as the motion provides.

I rely, however, on the customary courtesy and good temper which the Senate is always willing to display when members of this body wish to address it, particularly when dealing with a matter of this kind, which arouses considerable interest both within the chamber and without it.

As for myself, I hope I will be able to deal with the subject entirely on the basis of principle and avoid any reference to personalities or records or philosophies that belong to individual persons, because it seems to me that there is ample room for discussion of the matter on the basis of principle, without personal references which might indeed be gratuitous.

Throughout the greater part of its existence, the Senate, which is the senior branch of our federal legislature, has been subject to the attentions of a well-meaning series of constitutional improvers. I guess you would have to count me as perhaps one of the latest in that list. Some of these improvers have seen the abolition of this body as its ultimate fate. In the current report under the name of Senator Lamontagne, a report on Senate reform, which we are considering under another heading, it is proposed to re-arrange the powers and functions of this body in an interesting fashion, but a fashion which, in my opinion, is inadequate to the needs of the case, and, I suggest, inadequate as many observers might see it.

The fact is that 115 years after its creation in 1867, the Senate is still in place, still practically unchanged from the original form that the founding fathers gave it. In spite of that impressive record of durability, it seems to me that the pressure for Senate reform has seldom been more intense than it has been in the last few years. There is a widely perceived need outside this house, if not in it, that a more effective instrument is required to incorporate the regional interests of Canadians within the decision-making process of the central federal organs of government. One can only speculate on how much longer the status quo in the Senate can resist change. I give you my opinion, which is perhaps not widely supported, that change the Senate will, or it will ultimately be changed by others.

The agitation for Senate reform these days comes from all sides, and a mere list of the agitators tells a tale.

We start off with the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference, sponsored by the Province of Ontario. There is the Beige Paper, produced by the Liberal Party in Quebec. There was the very important initiative of the Government of British Columbia with respect to a new form of Senate organization. There was the report of the Pepin-Robarts commission, which was an emanation of the federal government. We know that the Canadian Bar Association agonized long over what kind of new Senate they would like to see. We have heard from the Canada West Foundation with respect to Senate reform on two occasions, the last one of which was under the aegis of the Honourable Senator Manning. Of course, we considered the federal government Bill C-60, which occupied our attention in 1978 or perhaps 1979.

● (1530)

The provisions of the new Canadian Constitution, which is being examined in London today, with its limitation of the power of the Senate to block constitutional change—and I think that means, to most people at any rate, the limitation of its power to block changes in the Senate itself—offer, in my opinion, a significant indication of the way in which the wind indeed may blow.

There is, however, a common theme that runs through all of these proposals, which is that a second chamber of some kind or other is favoured by almost all Canadians. We get the impression that these wide-ranging examinations of our Constitution are in agreement with the concept that the Canadian federal system requires a bicameral federal legislature. That, honourable senators, is the first point that I would like to establish.

In a federal state like Canada, governed by the parliamentary political process, peace, order and good government require an effective second federal chamber. This proposition is based on the fundamentally regional characteristics of our country. The nation arose in 1867 from several distinctly articulated regional societies. Our current history must emphasize beyond all dispute that the regions count, and that Canada is still a federation. I believe that Canadians share a common sense of nationhood and destiny, but I also believe that Canadians understand themselves as belonging to regions—regions which vary distinctly from one another in size, in population, in language, in history and in interests. It is this regional variation which must be accommodated within the central federal law-making process.

Today, all of the witnesses that I have called upon, and many more that members of this house could recommend, proclaim the pressing need to reconcile legitimate regional interests with the common good of the nation. Of course, there is absolutely nothing new about all of this. In Quebec, in 1864, the Fathers of Confederation faced up to exactly the same situation. They provided a solution to it. Their answer was that we were to have a federal House of Commons based on representation by population, and we were to have a federal Senate based on territorial representation. Representation by population satisfied the interests of Upper Canada, which was calling for “one man, one vote”, regardless of location. The smaller regions, however—the maritime provinces and the French-speaking minority, concentrated then, as now, in the province of Quebec—had other aims in view. They saw a populous Upper Canada, by means of its own numbers or in special combination in central Canada, able to impose its will on regional minorities. Thus some counterbalance was sought.

In 1864, in Quebec City, out of the 14 days of consideration that led up to the articles of Confederation, six days were devoted to this problem. The solution? The Senate as we have it today, a second federal chamber, was the solution that was agreed upon.

[Senator Roblin.]

Thus I put it to you that the first great principle of democracy—representation by population—is embodied in the House of Commons. The second great principle of federalism—territorial representation—is enshrined in the Senate. This explains the Senate of 1867. Indeed, in 1867 I think it would not have been unfair to say, “No Senate, no Confederation!” It also explains, however, the case for an effective second federal chamber in 1982.

What I have said so far, honourable senators, is a commonplace of Canadian history. We ought to establish, though, in our own minds the compelling reasons that are behind the proposal that an effective second chamber is required in 1982, in the first place, before we attempt to improve on the one we have. It is my submission that Canadian experience, both historically and currently—and, indeed, the experience of similar federations elsewhere—shows that Canada needs an effective second federal chamber to represent regional interests. It may be said that we have a Senate which was designed especially for this purpose. Is it fulfilling that task? Why do you think that it needs to be improved?

At this point I want to pay my respects to the work of the Lamontagne committee, whose valuable report I have already referred to. The members of that committee—I was one, though not of the majority opinion—did much good work.

Senator Frith: Some members.

Senator Roblin: They made interesting comments on the current reform proposals, such as the ones listed a little while ago. They isolated the defects of some of those proposals that were examined and, for good reason, they were set aside. At the same time, that committee underlined the good and useful things that the present unreformed Senate is able to do. Together with Senator Lamontagne and the members of that committee, presided over by Senator Goldenberg as the “grand panjandrum”—the chairman of the whole operation—I defend the diligence and the dedication of the members of the present Senate. I agree that its work as a revising chamber in examining and amending proposed laws is favourably known in many circles. Its balanced, non-partisan, thoughtful, and, Heaven be praised, sometimes original initiatives in the work of the committees that go into matters of public concern and interest have often given the lead to the House of Commons and have earned the praise of experts.

These are all very worthwhile activities and I defend them as a public service. I am glad that the committee has documented, in an incontrovertible and historical way, the facts of this matter for public consideration. I think this is a valuable consideration. It deserves our thanks—indeed, it deserves wider dissemination by the media than it has had so far. These functions to which I refer should be cherished and continued in any new Senate that might be developed in this country.

However, when one proceeds from there to examine the analysis of the committee and its conception of public dissatisfaction with the present Senate, when one looks at the curious arrangement it has for continuing senators by appointment, with a self-perpetuating continuation at that, it becomes clear that the Lamontagne report is not a reform proposal which the public of Canada is likely to approve. I say this because the one area in which the public perceives the Senate to fail most conspicuously—the one area which all reformers examine and also the area of paramount concern in our affairs today, the area that goes to the heart of the matter—is the role of the Senate as part of the central federal legislative authority. In this role, the Senate does not adequately represent regional interests, although that is the purpose for which it was mainly constituted. I submit, therefore, that for any plan of Senate reform to succeed in the public arena, this responsibility of regional representation is the one which must be satisfied.

If I may, I will give my view as to what has happened to bring about this situation. If this failure exists, how has it come about? Why is the Senate not that responsible and effective body of regional representation? Was the Senate of 1867—or is, indeed, the Senate today—powerless? Was it impotent? Far from it. It was and still is vested with enormous power in terms of legislative authority, in terms of law-making capacity. It is fully the co-equal in power of the House of Commons. It is true that the House of Commons has always controlled the purse strings, in the sense that money bills can only originate there. It is true, as well, that no government need resign if defeated in the Senate. Only the House of Commons can make or unmake governments, or make and unmake prime ministers. Apart from those two exceptions, however, the Senate of 1867 was, and the Senate of today is, endowed with adequate power to fulfil its role as the territorial representative, to act as the balance wheel, as the “make weight,” in the federal system.

Therefore, we have, I submit, the present Senate made up of experienced and capable men and women. It does not represent provincial governments themselves, it is true, nor should it, but it is constituted to represent regions within the federal constitutional ambit and the federal constitutional prerogative, and is vested with extensive powers. Generally speaking, though, instead of functioning as the balance wheel of Confederation, it is regarded by most who look at it as being a fifth wheel of the Constitution. The media, by and large, overlook our debates. Our credibility with the general public is undeniably low, and even we senators complain that we are ignored by the federal executive and are neglected by the provincial governments. At the same time the Senate declines to exercise the power it possesses which might either justify its existence or, alternatively, challenge its political legitimacy.

• (1540)

I submit, honourable senators, that the defect in our arrangement in the Senate is quite simple to identify. It is to be found in the fact that the method of making senators is that senators are summoned to office by appointment. They are summoned to office by an appointment by a federal prime minister, and in no other way. The fact that we have a Senate by appointment, in my opinion, undermines its whole position. It vitiates its capacity for independent action. An appointed senator—and let us be frank about this—is responsible constitutionally to no one. Politically, many senators, it is fair to say, recognize the claims of the power that appointed them. But it must be clear that in 1982 a system of political appointment of men and women who are vested with legislative functions and law-making authority is repugnant to modern perceptions of representative and parliamentary government.

The Senate is an instance where we have legislative authority without democratic responsibility, and thus it is clear that appointed senators lack the imprimatur of political legitimacy. An appointed Senate cannot be expected to use its power. Indeed, sensibly, it tries but seldom or almost never to exercise its undoubted constitutional authority. For all its theoretical power, the appointed Senate knows its place. The Senate declines to engage the elected House of Commons, even when legitimate regional interests may be at risk. Thus, the main purpose of the second chamber, if you follow my line of reasoning, the recognition of regional interests at the federal legislative centre, goes by default and is rendered nugatory.

The lack of political legitimacy, in the constitutional sense of that phrase, lies at the heart of the matter. The remedy, in a representative and parliamentary system, is obvious. You simply change the method of selecting senators. You change it from selection by appointment to selection by election. By this one move, by moving from the appointive system to the elective system, constitutional legitimacy is achieved and the Senate is then vested with the moral as well as the political authority to discharge its responsibilities. Political responsibility is then added to regional responsibility, and it offers at least the possibility, if you want to go no farther than that, that an elected Senate could function as it should, within the federal parliamentary system on matters within the federal ambit and the federal authority.

Once the principle of election of senators is accepted, many important election options present themselves for consideration. On what system of voting would senators be chosen? We have an opportunity here to break away from the first-past-the-post system, which is now used to elect members of the House of Commons. I continue to think that the first-past-the-post system is well adapted to the House of Commons, where there is a need, under most circumstances, for a stable majority to support a government. The Senate, however, where the question of confidence does not arise, could be elected in another way. We have heard the proposal that it should be elected by proportional representation. This is often described as a system of voting on the party slate, where the candidates are listed in the order of the party preference.

Some objections are raised that there is far too much party influence in this system and the voter has not sufficient choice. But proportional representation of that kind is not the only way. There is the transferable vote. Here voters may select any candidate they choose and list any number of names, up to the total to be elected, in the order of the voter's choice in order to fill the number of seats available. This system enables the voter's preference to supersede the party choice, and some may think it has much to commend it.

I am sure there are other methods, apart from the ones I have mentioned and the first-past-the-post system in the House of Commons, that could be considered when laying down the rules for election to the new Senate of Canada. Such a system, I think, would be quite compatible with senatorial interests in the representation of minorities.

Senator Frith: "Such a system" meaning the transferable system or the party system?

Senator Roblin: Either. One might have one's views as to which is the better. I happen to think that the transferable vote is a better system. However, I am not attempting in this presentation today to put before honourable senators any strict set of rules about many of the complications that arise. My concern today is to get recognition of the elective principle. Once that preposition is conceded, then we have to sit down and decide just how to put it into action. I offer some suggestions. I do not say that they are exhaustive.

Let us turn to the question of the territorial electoral units that might be used. Our present system consists of a series of senatorial divisions. There were originally three divisions, each one providing an equal number of senators, 24 apiece. We now have four divisions, the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and the west; and we have some adjustments for Newfoundland and the Territories. But the principle behind the divisional system is that they should be, to all intents and purposes, equal and that the territorial extent of the country should be represented equally through these senatorial divisions.

There are some who would say that if you are going to elect a Senate you should have the same number of senators for each province, just as in the United States; and that is a proposition worth considering. If you were to ask my opinion, I would say that for historical and practical reasons, perhaps some modification of the present divisional system is best suited as the next step in Canada, where each province could elect its own senators. In the case of Manitoba, for example, we would elect six on a provincial basis, and larger areas like Ontario might be divided into regions which would also elect six senators apiece. These are matters which could be reasoned and discussed as the matter proceeds. As I have said, the present divisional system could perhaps be modified to take into account recent developments, and this, to me, is a reasonable basis to start from.

When should the senator be elected and for what term of office? There are at least three possibilities that occur to me: elections could be held independently, for the Senate alone; elections could be held in conjunction with elections for the House of Commons; or, indeed, elections could be held in conjunction with each provincial election. If you are anxious to underline the regional character of the Senate, this last proposition has something to be said for it. All these different proposals are ones which could be the subject of further study, if the Senate so chose. The term could be six years. That seems to be a popular number. Possibly, the election could be arranged on a staggered basis, with one half elected at each election. There are several possibilities with respect to how the Senate should be elected, how the vote should be counted and the various matters I have dealt with.

[Senator Roblin.]

A question that is equally important and to which we ought to apply our minds is: How would such an elected Senate work in a parliamentary system such as ours, and what power should this Senate have to discharge these regional responsibilities to which I have referred? I say the Senate should have exactly the same powers when it is elective as it has today. The House of Commons must remain the primary body. The government should only be responsible to the House of Commons. Only the House of Commons should have the authority to empower governments or prime ministers, and only the House of Commons should originate money bills.

However, an elected Senate could retain the present powers of an appointed Senate. Indeed, as an elected body it is appropriate that it should do so. In fact, I would add to the duties. I would say that when the federal government appoints officers to regional or national bodies and the like, a list of them could be compiled, and those appointments could be subject to ratification by an elected Senate.

But if powers such as these are conferred upon an elected Senate, the question of harmonizing the work of the Senate and the House of Commons assumes capital importance. It is a critical consideration for any elected Senate that we should not be automatically providing for a stalemate or for an unlimited legislative deadlock with the House of Commons itself. The federal system should not be stultified by an elected Senate, and the solution of differences between the two chambers must be regulated and workable, with the primacy of the House of Commons recognized.

A number of possible arrangements suggest themselves. Obviously, we would seek to strengthen the joint Senate-House of Commons system of consultation and management, the system of consultation and communication, and perhaps the establishment of a joint management committee would be in order. This would enable us to seek mutually acceptable compromises which are clearly possible on many issues.

If the House of Commons proposes a measure which does not meet with the approval of the Senate, it might be stipulated that the Senate must muster a two-thirds majority in order to firm up its views. Another variation of the same idea is that if the Senate rejects a proposal from the House of Commons on the first occasion by a simple majority, and if it is re-presented by the House of Commons a second time, then at that stage the two-thirds majority might be required in order to deal with the matter. Alternatively, differences could be settled by joint sittings of the Senate and the House of Commons when a simple majority would decide. As a last resort, the federal Prime Minister should perhaps be given the power of a double dissolution. Then both the House of Commons and the Senate would go back to the people and let the people, in a new Parliament, decide what course should be taken.

These are only a few ideas on the vital and critical question of reconciling the operation of an elected Senate with the parliamentary system as we know it. I suggest that either alone or in combination—or with the addition of ideas which other senators may be able to suggest—we can ensure that an elected Senate would conform with the requirements of representative and responsible government in Canada. Both houses must ultimately recognize the sovereignty of the people. That is the central theme of what I present to you today.

Thus, I see merit in turning to an elected Senate as a significant improvement in harmonizing the interests of our regions within the central legislative apparatus and within the federal ambit and authority.

But I do not propose it, honourable senators, as a sovereign remedy to all that ails Canadian federalism. There will always be a federal prime minister, provincial premiers and federal-provincial conferences with direct contact between the governments. In no way would an elected Senate do away with all the regional discomforts we experience. How could it? Its main role is to be played with respect to federal legislation within the federal constitutional ambit and within the federal power. The federal-provincial division of powers remains undisturbed. This new Senate would not represent provinces; it would represent people in regions of Canada. In that respect, I think its role would be clear and unambiguous.

I must warn this chamber that in Australia, a federal state much like ours, there is an elected Senate, whose performance has been criticized as being too heavily influenced by party manipulation and offering perhaps only a pale reflection of the political struggles in the House of Representatives. I would suggest that, if we in this country are to reform our Senate, we should take note of the problems that have arisen in Australia. If an elected Senate were subject to party manipulation, as some suggest the Australian Senate is, or if it would merely be a pale reflection of the House of Commons, one would have to be concerned. If the Senate is elected by transferable vote at the time of provincial elections, we may find that we have gone a long way towards dealing with the problems perceived in Australia.

Our elected Senate can be designed to minimize any disadvantages that may be discovered. It should be deliberately modeled to take into account the experience of other second chambers in other parliamentary systems and particularly shaped to answer to Canadian needs and requirements.

I put it to this body that the question of Senate reform is now pretty close to the top of the constitutional agenda. Senators by election, as opposed to senators by appointment, is clearly a leading option. It is my opinion that public sentiment and expert opinion alike support at least the consideration and investigation of a proposition of the kind I set before you.

If the Senate is to continue to have legislative power of the type it has now, it most certainly ought to be elected. If it is to relapse into an advisory body whose word does not count, it really does not matter what you do.

I think, however, that the present Senate is well qualified to take the lead in the consideration of this question. Indeed, I suggest that our self respect would urge us on such a course. If we fail to propose a timely and effective change ourselves, then undoubtedly others will do it for us. I want to see the Senate take the lead. We owe it to ourselves; we owe it to the nation; and that is why, speaking for myself, I move the motion now before you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Charles McElman: Would Senator Roblin accept a question or two at this point?

Senator Roblin: Gladly.

Senator McElman: Would he tell the chamber if, within his knowledge, there are any elected second chambers which are doing a better and more admirable job than the Senate of Canada is doing now?

Senator Flynn: Is that a joke?

Senator McElman: Are any second chambers not subject to criticisms similar in nature to those levelled at this second chamber? My question is not meant to be a joke; I am asking a very serious question.

Senator Roblin: I take that as a very serious and very reasonable question. I must confess that I have no knowledge of a wide variety of other federal second chambers which would enable me to answer in a definitive way. I simply say that one has to consult the Canadian electorate and consider the Canadian people's view of the Senate. It is a view which has not changed much over many years. If you go no further than that, you must come to the conclusion that whatever good things we do—and we do many good things, which I have mentioned—they certainly do not commend themselves to the public as being sufficient reason for the Senate to continue to operate in its present form.

That is my opinion of the public's view of the Senate. If you look at the current polls, I think you will find some basis of support for the view I express. However, I think it is entirely a subjective matter, and I will leave it at that.

Senator McElman: I might say that I very much agree with your latter comment. The attention that the Senate gets from the media in Canada is such that the public could not do otherwise than hold it in contempt. This arises through lack of knowledge of what the Senate does both in this chamber and in its committees. Perhaps we are not blameless in that respect, but I believe it is more attributable to the irresponsible media.

Senator Roblin: I would not like to damn the media so thoroughly. If you look at the Senate of the United States, where power is exercised constitutionally and legitimately, you can assess how one second chamber operates. It is not a parliamentary chamber; it is part of a congressional system, and I fully acknowledge that point; there is a great deal of difference. If we were making decisions which counted, you would soon find the press taking an interest.

Senator Frith: Even that second chamber cannot initiate a money bill.

Senator Roblin: That is correct.

Senator McElman: I fully understand the difference in the parliamentary and legislative system in the United Kingdom, the Mother of Parliaments. Is it the opinion of Senator Roblin that Westminster would be better served with an elected second chamber?

Senator Roblin has not spoken either in favour of or against the congressional system. Would he see the Canadian Parliament evolving into a similar system? Again, for Senator Flynn's benefit, I ask these questions very seriously because I am as interested as anyone else in seeing Parliament develop in Canada, in both houses, to a much wider extent than it has to date.

Senator Roblin: The honourable senator has posed two penetrating questions, and I will do my best to answer them.

The situation in the United Kingdom is, of course, much different from the situation in Canada because the United Kingdom is not a federal state; it is a unitary state. Unitary states do not, in my humble opinion, have the same set of reasons for a second chamber that a federal state has. For those reasons, I do not think the House of Lords and the Senate are comparable from a constitutional point of view.

● (1600)

I can tell you this, that the last time I was in London I had the privilege of hearing Viscount Hailsham, the Lord Chancellor of the current British government, who was the author, or perhaps the prime mover, of the thrust in the United Kingdom to elect members to the House of Lords. His reasoning for having an elected House of Lords, with respect to parliamentary responsibility, was much the same as mine is for an elected Senate. All I can say, then, is that a very respected constitutional authority in the United Kingdom, and a man of some influence, believes in an elected House of Lords, and believes that that is meritorious and ought to be pursued.

Respecting the difference between the parliamentary system and the congressional system, I suppose I am a child of my background. I prefer the parliamentary system by far. I think we are running into a serious danger at the moment, however, and that is that we have developed a rigid party system in the House of Commons where the main purpose of the majority party is to keep the Prime Minister and the cabinet in office. As a result, the current Prime Minister has an accumulation of powers which are unprecedented in parliamentary governments over the centuries. He has far more power than the King ever had when we started to take powers away from him.

Senator Frith: Or the President of the United States.

Senator Roblin: Or the President of the United States, as my honourable friend observes. So, we have a problem in Canada. This is not meant in any ad personam way to the current Prime Minister, not a bit. This has been going on for a long time, but he wields a power that is extraordinary and there is no check or balance.

Senator Frith: He or she.

Senator Roblin: That is correct: he or she. Perhaps an elected Senate would provide that balance. I do not think it is out of the bounds of possibility that it might not serve as a check on what is really unbridled power on the part of the Prime Minister.

[Senator McElman.]

I have not advanced that as one of the reasons for an elected Senate, but if I had to provide one or two more reasons, perhaps I could dredge that out of the kitbag and ask you to consider it. But, in spite of the development of the elected dictatorship of the Prime Minister, if I can overstate the case by using that phrase, I still prefer the parliamentary system to the congressional one.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate Senator Roblin for giving us an eloquent and thoughtful address, as he usually does. I have a question on the particular point of the method of election.

Senator Roblin spoke about the single transferable vote. As he knows, long before I was appointed to the Senate, I had quite a lot to do with government in Manitoba. If I remember correctly, Manitoba had the single transferable vote for some years, and then decided to change that. I do not remember why. I just thought I would direct that to his attention and ask him if he would have any comment on it.

Senator Roblin: The honourable gentleman has a splendid memory. What he says is perfectly correct. When I was first elected in the city of Winnipeg, there were four candidates to be elected in one seat. Before that there were 10 candidates in one seat in the city of Winnipeg. For example, there were 15 names placed on the ballot and the voters were asked to mark the first 10 in their order of preference.

Senator Frith: Was there no party affiliation?

Senator Roblin: I cannot tell you whether there was any party affiliation. There may have been, but I cannot remember. In any case, that system was in vogue in Manitoba. It was then decided that the 10 or four-seat arrangement was not desired, so they split that up into single-member seats. Once they had done that, then, of course, the merit of the transferable vote had disappeared. So, that was abandoned.

It seems to me that, for the Senate, the transferable vote has a great deal of merit and could well be considered if we got serious about this.

Senator Goldenberg: I was not being political; I just wanted that information. I am not criticizing the proposal.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: May I ask Senator Roblin a question? I noticed at the conclusion of his answer to Senator McElman's question he said that one of the regrettable things, without being personal about any prime minister, was that the function of the House of Commons was to retain the authority of the executive and the prime minister. I assume he would agree that that would also swing into the Senate, with its makeup.

Because of the costs involved in winning an election campaign, surely those who are elected with the aid of a party would be deeply beholden to the party and to the government or the opposition. Is there any way that you could arrange it so that there would be an independent group elected to the Senate rather than a group associated with a party?

Senator Roblin: There are really two systems to which I have referred. The first system is a type of proportional representation. The way that would work, to give you an example using the province of Manitoba, is that every recognized political party—and there are rules as to who they are—could submit a list of six names, if six senators were to be elected. That party list would have them in order. When the time came for the election, the voter would go into the polling booth and would say, “I am going to vote Liberal.” That is an unlikely proposition, but the voters can decide on that themselves!

Senator Frith: Up to now that has been the historic situation.

Senator Roblin: The ballot is cast for one of the six Liberal names. If there were any Tories in Manitoba, they would go into the polling booth and they might vote for the Conservative list with six names on it, as would be the situation with the N.D.P. and the Canada West Party, or whatever it calls itself. When the votes were counted, and if the Conservatives got their usual 50 per cent of the vote, they would get the first three, and they would be in the order in which they were listed on the slate. The political party involved would decide in what order they would appear.

Senator Frith: That is the party slate.

Senator Roblin: One does not have to draw a picture to see the problems that might arise.

Another system, and I think a better one, is to have the political parties name their six candidates, tell the voter that when he goes into the polling booth he does not have to vote for any party slate, that there are 36 names, or whatever, on the list and that he has to elect six of them. He will then pick the six he wants. They could be Conservatives, Tories, Independents, what-have-you. In that system, you would get a cross-vote and that would make it unlikely that the party manipulations that might be feared under the first system would prevail. I think it would be a system that would ensure a relatively unbiased selection of candidates, and the voter would be the one who decided which ones he liked best, not the political parties.

Senator Frith: Under this system, would there be a way of getting on the ballot without being sponsored by a party?

Senator Roblin: I think there would have to be, because you would have to make room for Independents.

Senator Thompson: My point was that there are many people who are not connected with political parties who want to become elected representatives. They campaign but never seem to do very well in elections. With your experience in politics, I think you know that someone who runs as an Independent just does not make it.

Senator Roblin: I do not wish to monopolize this debate, but I can tell you an interesting tale on that very point, because in the days when the city of Winnipeg was a multi-member seat, there was an independent gentleman named Lewis St. George Stubbs—Judge Stubbs. He ran against the government, and everyone in sight, and always came in at the head of the polls. He always streaked ahead of the party politicians and left them plodding along at the rear. So, it seems to me that this system of the transferable vote will allow an outstanding independent candidate to be elected—and Judge Stubbs was outstanding.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

NEWFOUNDLAND

LOSS OF DRILL RIG OCEAN RANGER—ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to announce that a joint commission of inquiry into the Ocean Ranger disaster has been put in place. May I read the following statement:

The Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, Minister of Transport, and the Honourable Marc Lalonde, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, join with William Marshall, President of the Executive Council and Minister Responsible for Energy for the Province of Newfoundland, in announcing the establishment of a joint commission of inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Ocean Ranger on February 15th, 1982.

The chairman of the joint commission of inquiry will be the Honourable T. Alexander Hickman, Chief Justice of the Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland.

Chief Justice Hickman will be assisted by the Honourable Gordon Winter, Q.C., a former lieutenant-governor of Newfoundland, who will act as vice-chairman, and by four commissioners. These are: St. John's lawyer, Fintan Aylward, Q.C.; marine engineer and naval architect, Jan Furst; former president of Memorial University of Newfoundland, Moses Morgan; and engineer, Bruce Pardy of St. John's.

Identical terms of reference for the inquiry will shortly be adopted by both levels of government and released at that time. The commission's final report will be made public.

I am very pleased to be able to make this announcement on behalf of the government today.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, on a point of clarification, I may have misunderstood the Leader of the Government, but I thought he said that Jan Furst was a former President of Memorial University. That is incorrect. Moses Morgan is a former President of Memorial University, not Jan Furst. Jan Furst is a naval architect from Norway who has been working in the province for some time now.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the four commissioners are: St. John's lawyer, Fintan Aylward, Q.C.; marine engineer and naval architect, Jan Furst; former President of Memorial University of Newfoundland, Moses Morgan; and engineer Bruce Pardy of St. John's.

Senator Doody: It was a matter of punctuation.

Hon. Eric Cook: It is the Honourable Gordon Winter, O.C.. The leader said "Q.C."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Apart from that, how did you like the announcement?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is good news.

PROFESSIONAL SPORT

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE—WAYNE GRETZKY—FELICITATIONS ON SETTING GOAL-SCORING RECORD

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That members of the Senate extend their sincere congratulations and best wishes to Canada's Wayne Gretzky, the Edmonton Oilers superstar, who became last night the first player in professional hockey to score more than 76 goals in one season; and—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson:

That the Senate would like to thank Mr. Gretzky for showing the world that Canadian hockey standards, far from being in decline, are producing athletes capable of reaching heights never before imagined.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That's a better record than the government's.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Leave is granted.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Lucier be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Denis on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Charbonneau be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Tremblay on the list of senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. John M. Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Murray and Tremblay be substituted for those of the Honourable Senators Beaubien and Smith on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 2, 1982, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, to follow up on my questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development, I asked him to give us a list of the projects which have been abandoned or postponed, and suggested that the first on that list would be Alsands. I see today that two companies have withdrawn from the project and that no one seems willing to replace them. Is the minister still as optimistic concerning the future of this project? In case he changes his mind and decides to give me a list of the mega-projects which have been abandoned or delayed, can he also give me a list indicating the proportion of bankruptcies representing assets of $1 million or more last year?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, with respect to the Alsands project, the Ministers of Energy of Canada and of Alberta have announced that further meetings will take place today to clear up a number of matters and, more particularly, to attempt to reach some agreement and to find out whether there is a way of taking up the 30 per cent of that project that has now been relinquished by a number of former partners. I do not think it would be useful for me to comment upon what may come out of that meeting until we have heard its results.

Insofar as the other part of the question is concerned, it is a matter of statistical evidence that is published monthly, I believe, with respect to the number of bankruptcies. I believe the Leader of the Opposition asked only for those bankruptcies amounting to $1 million or more. If that information is not in the statistics that arrive in his office, then perhaps on the same day as it arrives in my office I will do his homework for him and dig up the information.

Senator Flynn: I hope that you will be as kind to me as you were to Senator Bosa.

● (1410)

Senator Olson: Senator Bosa asked a question capable of being answered with factual and precise information.

Senator Flynn: You are capable of anything you put your mind to. The inferiority complex doesn't suit you.

Senator Olson: You have not phrased your question in the same way so, as I said yesterday, it is not capable of being answered by substantial and precise evidence which I usually use in the compilation of answers.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In light of the apparent collapse of the Alsands project, a stalled Cold Lake project, the difficulties facing the upgrading of heavy oil in Saskatchewan and Alberta as a result of a decline in international oil prices, and a continuing decline in conventional exploration in western Canada, will the minister re-affirm the intention of the Government of Canada to achieve energy self-sufficiency by 1990? At the same time, will he explain how this will be achieved?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, a response would involve a very long speech. That speech would be a reiteration of a number of arguments or positions which have been put in front of, not only this chamber but the Canadian people.

It is a fact that, when circumstances change, you must re-examine the conclusions based on projections of the past.

One thing my honourable friend did not include in his preliminary comments—and since I am sure he is a man who likes to be fair, he would like it to be added—is that the conservation program initiated and, in many ways, funded by the Canadian government has always been very effective. The projected increase in consumption has gone down rather significantly.

Hon. Lowell Murray: That is because of the Liberal recession.

Senator Balfour: As a further supplementary question to the honourable minister, is the apparent indifference shown by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the withdrawal of the main participants in the Alsands project caused by the fact that he, in the name of the Government of Canada, intends to move into Alsands and achieve de facto nationalization of the project? Is that what is intended, and, if so, at what cost to the Canadian taxpayer?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator prefaces his question with such words as "the apparent indifference shown by the Minister..." Of course, his assertion, in my view, is absolutely untrue, so there is no basis for answering the question.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It is not a question.

Senator Balfour: Is it the intention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in the name of the Government of Canada, to move into the Alsands project and achieve de facto nationalization of this project? Is that what is intended, and, if so, at what cost to the Canadian taxpayer?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the intention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is as he stated, and that is to set up a pricing and tax structure based on the assumption that the advice he received with respect to international oil price escalation, at that time, was valid. If circumstances have changed, and some of the cases indicate that that is so, then I suppose another look at the situation has to be taken.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already said that meetings are taking place today and, therefore, all the subsequent opinions and conclusions that the honourable senator may have come to today have no validity whatever.

Senator Balfour: The honourable minister told us a few days ago that meetings are taking place, but it is perfectly clear to anyone that the project is in severe jeopardy, if it has not, in fact, collapsed.

I would expect the minister to take my next question as notice. In the next few days would the minister bring to this chamber a calculation as to the economic cost to Canada should the Alsands project collapse?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this question too is based on the premise that something is perfectly obvious to everyone. I am not one of that group that reaches a lot of conclusions without the facts. Unless my honourable friend is privy to the meetings that have taken place in the last few days, and which are, indeed, continuing to take place today, he is not in possession of all the factors relating to this project. If he wants to decide something before he has had a report from the people who are in possession of all the factors involved, that is up to him. That does not, however, make it obvious to everyone, and particularly not to me.

● (1415)

Senator Balfour: Is there any reason that the honourable senator can identify as to why the members of this chamber and, indeed, the public of Canada should not be in possession of those factors?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is because it is perfectly logical for the participants in such major projects to have a few discussions with regard to the factors involved before reaching a decision to move forward. I do not see that there is anything unusual about that. Certainly, we ought to have a report from them before it becomes, as my honourable friend says, perfectly obvious to everyone, because it is not obvious to anyone until we have heard from the principals involved.

Senator Balfour: We heard from them today.

Senator Olson: You heard press speculation, that is all.

ENERGY

ALSANDS PROJECT—WITHDRAWAL OF PARTNERS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Given the government's goal of Canadianizing the industry, and in the light of Dome having gone out of the Alsands project, would the minister indicate to us if the government has any idea which Canadian investors would replace Dome Petroleum, and Shell, for that matter, who have walked out on the project?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would expect that that would be one of the high priority items on the agenda of the meeting taking place now.

THE ECONOMY

PROJECTED GROWTH OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question that I would like to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development, if that is his correct title.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Economic and Regional Development, designate.

Senator Donahoe: We have not noticed any distinction in the east between the title that used to exist and the title that now exists.

Senator Olson: It is Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development, designate.

Senator Donahoe: Well, honourable senators, that changes his title but not my question.

I regret that in order to formulate this question it will be necessary for me to make a couple of factual assertions. I am ready and anxious to have any error there may be in those factual assertions corrected, and in that case I will not proceed with my question. If my honourable friend can say that I am at fault, will he please do so? If he cannot, I will take his silence as acceptance of my statement.

The first assertion is that the main estimates provide for spending 16 per cent higher than the 1981-1982 estimates.

I hear no challenge; therefore, I take it that the statement is correct.

Senator Olson: It is not necessarily correct.

Senator Donahoe: The second assertion is that on January 12, 1980—and I have a good memory—then opposition leader Trudeau—and I might explain that that opposition leader Trudeau is the man who now occupies the position of Prime Minister of Canada, since I would not want anyone to make any mistake with regard to the personalities involved here—said, and I quote—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Let us make it non-partisan, now.

Senator Donahoe: It is not partisan. It is from his own lips. How can it be partisan? I said it was a quotation. The words are not mine, but the words of the then Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister of Canada. These are his words:

We will hold the line on government expenditure growth to under the rate of GNP.

I am waiting again for contradiction of the assertion that those were his words. Have I quoted them out of context?

• (1420)

Honourable senators, I have one final statement to make and it is that the nominal growth in GNP for 1981-82 is expected to be 14.1 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: That is very significant growth.

Senator Donahoe: I can readily accept those statements as being factually correct, can I?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, you cannot.

Senator Donahoe: I now come to the point, honourable senators. Is the government projecting a nominal growth in GNP for 1982-83 of 16 per cent, or is this another deceptive campaign promise which has been forsaken by Mr. Trudeau?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, for all the rhetoric that went into the preamble to the question, which my honourable friend alleges to be fact, I will have to check the figure of 16 per cent. The compilation of such a figure depends on whether one is adding apples and apples or apples and oranges. My friends opposite have a bad habit of doing the latter every once in a while.

In any event, I think the honourable senator will agree that the figure of 14.6 per cent growth in the GNP is a rather significant amount for Canada. I would expect that it is substantially ahead of that of most other nations in the world.

For that we would want to congratulate ourselves on both sides of the house.

As to the other numbers, I would like to have a good look at them. I wonder if he would mind telling me how he reached that figure of 16 per cent. With respect to the compilation of such figures, the main estimates plus the supplementary estimates must be taken into account, as I am sure my honourable friend knows. Before accepting what he claims are assertions of fact, we would want to have some discussion with him as to how he arrived at those figures.

Senator Donahoe: If I may be permitted a supplementary question, honourable senators, I would simply ask the honourable minister if the figure 14.1 per cent is less than the figure 16 per cent?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): That depends on your calculations.

Senator Olson: The answer is yes.

Senator Frith: Providing both are apples and one is not an orange.

INDUSTRY

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTER INC.—GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Much has been written and said about the government's involvement in the company known as Consolidated Computer Inc. I am referring to the recent release of a report, which is now referred to in the media as the Anderson report, which stated that this company was never a financially viable company, and that a review of its financial statements at any point in its history could have confirmed this. I wonder if the Leader of the Government would indicate, or undertake to find out, how often this company's financial statements were reviewed subsequent to 1971, when the government did convert its shares to equity. As well, I wonder if he could tell us the rules applied by the government with regard to annual reviews of the financial operations of companies in which the government has public funds invested?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have information with regard to that particular matter. I understand that our colleague, Senator Olson, is also not in a position to bring the information to the chamber immediately. The question, however, will be taken as notice.

Senator Nurgitz: I have two supplementary questions, both of which can be taken as notice. Has the government now, at least, looked into the question of other possible investments of this type? I am not speaking of this specific business, but rather of the investment of public funds in companies where financial reviews are not being conducted. I should also like to know if the Leader of the Government would confirm the authenticity of four letters which apparently were exchanged between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the President of the Treasury Board of this government, one in particular dealing with this company, in which it was said that a company in which the federal government is an important shareholder cannot be permitted to fail in a disorderly manner.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to bring to you a statement on this matter.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the report is now available to members of the opposition in this chamber and to the press, will the government make it available to the people of Canada in general, and government supporters in this house in particular, under the guidelines of freedom of information which the Prime Minister has enunciated in the past?

● (1425)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not know the distribution pattern for this particular document, but inquiries will be made.

Hon. Lowell Murray: It's a cover up.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—STATUS OF EXPORTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the very difficult weather conditions on the prairies particularly in January and most of February, does he expect the Canadian Wheat Board to reach its export target in the coming year, and is it up to date now? Can he give us a report on that matter?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the Canadian Wheat Board's target, for the period August 1, 1981 to March 1982, was set at 15.1 million tonnes with 4.3 million tonnes being the portion for January to March 1982. There have been extremely unfavourable weather conditions on the prairies this winter with persistently low temperatures. There has been excessive snow through the mountains resulting in snowslides which have caused the movement for the first two months of 1982 to be behind target. Unload performance at the west coast was running behind last year for a five-week period during mid-January to early February, but during the last couple of weeks unloads have exceeded last year's levels, and I am optimistic that unloads for this current week may reach the target of 3,500 cars.

Unloads into Thunder Bay were also reduced during a four-week period in late January and early February, but the last few weeks have seen an improvement in unloads at Thunder Bay. The reduced unloads into Thunder Bay did not affect the rail movement from Thunder Bay to the St. Lawrence. This rail program has now exceeded the midway point of the target of 1.5 million tonnes. I am optimistic that the program will be completed by the opening of navigation with only 0.6 million tonnes yet to be moved.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

During the five-month period of March to July 1982, with the heavy snowfalls in the mountain regions, there is the possibility of rail disruptions this spring. Even though there will be a need for catching up, the necessary supplies of grain are adequate to enable the system to continue moving well in both directions once navigation resumes.

The current situation—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Not another page!

Hon. R. James Balfour: Dispense!

Senator Argue: —is such that up to February 17, 1982, producer deliveries from western farms were 14.2 million tonnes compared with 14 million tonnes during the same period last year.

Hon. C. William Doody: May we have a copy of that, please?

Senator Argue: Exports of grain to February 17, 1982, not including products, were 13.2 million tonnes compared with 11.8 million tonnes in the same period last year. This excellent performance, despite recent extremely adverse conditions, has shown that the export target is still attainable. With continued excellent performance from our entire system, I am confident that the 26 million tonnes export target for this year will be met.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I do not know if what I am about to propose is in order or not; if I am out of order, I trust that Madam Speaker will tell me so immediately.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Is it in order to congratulate Senator Argue?

Senator Donahoe: I merely wish to move that this house go on record as commending the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board for the excellent speech of which he has delivered himself in reply to an ordinary question planted neatly by one of his colleagues.

Senator Argue: I thank the honourable senator, but I certainly cannot say the same thing about the speech he delivered a few minutes ago.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Argue if I can get that reply from the Globe and Mail?

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

THE ESTIMATES—JOB CREATION—REDUCTION IN VOTE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the minister who is now responsible for regional development. I did not even hear a sigh. I do not really expect the minister to be able to answer with the spontaneity and total recall of his colleague and seatmate who answers on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board. I did notice in the estimates that the vote for Employment and Immigration for job creation has been cut to $216 million from $318 million last year. I find that startling and frightening in view of the current unemployment situation, particularly in some of the more disadvantaged regions of the country.

• (1430)

I contrast that with the fact that there has been a 14 per cent increase in the advertising budget. It is now up to $70 million. We have $70 million allocated to get pictures of Canada geese flying up the Ottawa flyway to their appointed spots around the cabinet table. In any event, I wonder if the minister can tell us what the priorities are in such a decision and how they are arrived at, and what comfort the unemployed can take from those figures.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, job creation expenditures shown in the Employment and Immigration estimates for 1981-82 come to $318 million, as reported. To this must be added additional funds expended by other departments in the amount of another $100 million for the summer student employment program, which bring 1981-82 expenditures to a total of $351 million. The main estimates show a figure of $216 million for 1982-83, but that must similarly be increased by summer job creation expenditures placed in the estimates of other departments, bringing the figure to $316 million.

I must point out that, as is usual, the main estimates can show only those expenditures which were planned at the time they were printed. The government determines its job creation expenditures on the basis of the need for them as it evolves through the fiscal year, and thus, although an expenditure of $318 million is shown for 1981-82 in the main estimates recently tabled, the main estimates tabled a year ago for 1981-82 showed a job creation figure of only $143 million.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You wanted total recall. There it is.

Senator Olson: The main estimates for 1982-83 are, therefore, only a portion of the story. The government already plans, following the job creation initiatives announced in December, to request supplementary estimates for 1982-83 totalling $25 million, bringing the 1982-83 figure to $341 million. In addition, the government has undertaken a program of work sharing for which $10 million in unemployment insurance funds was authorized and for which, because of the strong interest on the part of employers and workers across the country, an increase to $30 million has been requested. A further $20 million in funding for job creation under the Unemployment Insurance Act has been authorized, and most of this additional funding will occur in 1982-83, bringing the 1982-83 figure to approximately $386 million, an increase of about $35 million over 1981-82—which, of course, is contrary to the assertion my friend was about to make.

I must point out that the main estimates in past years have included only a portion of the funds actually expended during the year for on-the-job training.

To conclude, the government will monitor the needs carefully and will determine this summer whether a new program cycle and additional funds are required for the winter of 1983. That is not in the main estimates at the moment. The $74 million Employment and Immigration reserve is normally allocated to training programs to ensure that they fully reflect cost increases and to maintain training capacity. The minister, of course, will be announcing the funding levels to the new national training program separately, as discussions with the provinces proceed.

Senator Frith: Next question.

Senator Doody: May I ask for a total on that?

Senator Olson: Which total would the honourable senator like? As I recall, the honourable senator spoke about $216 million being the total amount in the main estimates, and I carefully pointed out to him that there had been an increase of $100 million in the summer student employment program, bringing the total up to $316 million. I went on to explain to him, in case he was not following what I was saying, that there was a further amount in the December supplementary estimates for 1982-83 totalling $25 million, bringing the figure up to $341 million. There is more. There is the $10 million in the Unemployment Insurance Fund that was authorized, and which was provided, and indeed another $20 million has been requested. In addition, $20 million in funding for job creation under the Unemployment Insurance Act has been authorized, which brings the total to approximately $386 million, and not $216 million, as mentioned by the honourable senator.

Senator Doody: So it does not take into account the inflation rate up to last year.

Senator Olson: The inflation rate last year was somewhere around 12 per cent. If we take $216 million and multiply that figure by 12 per cent, it falls a long way short of the $386 million which I mentioned.

Senator Doody: It was $318 million last year. Now the total has gone to $386 million.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Ask him if they were in the supplementary estimates last year.

Senator Doody: Perhaps, when the budget is brought down later this month, there will be new estimates at that time to incorporate all these figures.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is no plan to bring down a budget later this month, and there is no plan to bring in any revised supplementary estimates—that is, main estimates. There possibly could be a number of supplementary estimates throughout the year dealing with this program, which I have explained to the honourable senator. The greatest problem we shall have is in getting honourable senators opposite to understand what has been a standard practice in tabling main estimates along with the supplementary estimates for which some funds have already been authorized. They are put in the supplementary estimates from time to time as they are approved for expenditure.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development, for Economic and Regional Development, and all things bright and beautiful.

Senator Olson: "Minister of State for Economic Development" will do.

Senator Muir: In view of the tremendously high unemployment across the country, and the much higher unemployment in the Atlantic region, which generally is the situation—if unemployment hurts a little in Ontario, it hurts like hell on the east coast—can the minister tell me, as a result of all the grandiose and wonderful things that have been done, as he has stated, through the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars, how much the unemployment rate has been reduced across the country, particularly on the Atlantic coast, in respect of this year, the year before and the year before that?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would be happy to bring to the house a compilation of government expenditures for economic development and, therefore, job creation in the Atlantic provinces. Whether or not there is a direct and proportional correlation that can be made between that and the change in the unemployment rate, I am not sure, though it does indicate a sincere and determined effort on the part of the government to be helpful in the situation, however difficult it is.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Has the unemployment rate gone down in the Atlantic region, or has it gone up?

• (1440)

Senator Olson: That is a matter of statistical evidence and is compiled by Statistics Canada. If my honourable friend does not have that report in his office, I shall be glad to provide him with a copy of that Statistics Canada report.

Senator Muir: I would be pleased and honoured to have that report.

May I ask a further supplementary question? Could not some of these millions of dollars in foreign aid that are being spent on these projects be diverted to assist the unemployed in Canada? I realize that foreign aid is important, and I am not against it because I think it is a wonderful thing, but when Canadians are suffering as a result of unemployment, then one has to think about them.

At the moment I am thinking of the $200 million program by CIDA to construct two airports in Trinidad and Tobago. I am also thinking of the millions of dollars being spent in Algeria for a monument. That may or may not be a worthy thing. I am not as bright as the minister and do not know whether that is a great feat or whether that is something that the Canadian government should be involved in, but would he not think that at this particular time in history, and because the economic situation is so bad, some of those monies should be used, and would be put to better use, in Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I agree that that is a correct assumption and opinion. I think my honourable friend would agree that this government is pursuing exactly that line.

[Senator Muir.]

For example, on one project that he partially identified—that being the one in Algeria, insofar as the Export Development Corporation is concerned—all of those funds are being spent in Canada and will therefore, create employment for Canadians.

These projects are not tied to Canadian content, but insofar as the Export Development Corporation is concerned, and the projects that it undertakes, it only finances that portion of those projects that are purchased in Canada, thereby creating jobs for Canadians.

Senator Muir: I hesitate to continue this, but I do not speak often in this chamber. I continue out of the goodness and kindness of my heart, but would the minister not agree, and would the government not agree, that it would be much better to provide monies to feed the hungry of the world rather than to build these gigantic monuments to God-knows-what? Would it not be better to clothe, house and feed the needy in the world, including Canada, instead of creating these gigantic monuments, whether they be constructed of ivory or concrete?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend seems to be well acquainted with some project that he alleges Canada or CIDA or the Export Development Corporation is funding. I am not sure which one he is identifying. The statement I made a minute ago has to do with the Export Development Corporation, and I can tell him again that, while he may have his views on this, I do know that there is no financing done on those projects that do not involve Canadian content and therefore the creation of jobs in Canada.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

CONTINUATION OF LOW INTEREST LOANS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Phillips yesterday. I ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Special Farm Financial Assistance Program

As of February 15, the Farm Credit Corporation had approved $28,376,890 of the $45.4 million allocated to the Special Farm Financial Assistance Program. This represents 221 borrowers. The breakdown by region is as follows:

British Columbia	11	$ 2,406,400
Alberta	12	2,670,200
Saskatchewan	30	3,361,590
Manitoba	22	3,314,900
Ontario	84	10,947,700
Québec	37	3,386,000
Atlantic	25	2,290,100
Canada	221	28,376,890

FCC presently has enough applications on hand to use up the remaining funds. Since the program ends March 31, 1982 it is understandable that funds have already been exhausted. It should be remembered this program was introduced as a form of short term relief. It was the government's intention to provide assistance as quickly as possible to as many farmers as possible who are facing financial difficulties. Funds under this program have to be disbursed by March 31.

For the month of March FCC has between $15 and $20 million remaining in its regular lending program. Every effort will be made to assist as many farmers as possible under this program.

THE SENATE

REFORM—MOTION RE ELECTION OF MEMBERS—POINT OF ORDER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order arising out of yesterday's proceedings. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to permit me to give some of the background.

On Tuesday, February 23, the Honourable Senator Roblin gave notice that "on Thursday next, February 25, 1982," he would move:

That this house affirms that the federal character of representative and responsible government in Canada will be strengthened if the membership of the Senate is constituted by election rather than by appointment.

The Honourable Senator Roblin did not cease his remarks at the end of that motion but went on to state:

In giving this notice, honourable senators, I ask the permission of the Senate to make my speech on this motion tomorrow, rather than on Thursday, in the interest of seeing it advance to the stage where those who may agree or disagree with it will have a full opportunity to take a fling at the subject. I hope that that will be acceptable.

Honourable senators, that portion was not included in Debates of the Senate. I realize it is customary to omit Notices of Inquiries and Notices of Motions, providing there is no debate, but the fact that the Honourable Senator Roblin went on, after giving notice, constitutes debate as far as the Senate is concerned. It may have been that there was no thrust back and forth across the chamber, and quite often there is not, but debate did occur, and I submit that this portion of the Honourable Senator Roblin's remarks was deliberately deleted from the record.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Shame!

Senator Phillips: I want to point out, honourable senators, that I have read those remarks into the record and should like to see them remain in the record.

Honourable senators, we must ask ourselves who took it upon themselves, who assumed the authority, to alter the debates of this chamber.

Senator Roblin stated that he would move the motion on Thursday, February 25, yet the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate list him as having given notice for Wednesday, February 24. I would point out that yesterday no less a personage than the Deputy Leader of the Government, in his remarks, confirmed that Senator Roblin did say he was moving the motion on February 25.

There was a question arising as to whether 24 or 48 hours' notice was required. That is really immaterial, honourable senators, because the notice stated that the motion would be moved on February 25. That provided for 48 hours' notice. I ask you, honourable senators, who had the authority to change Senator Roblin's notice from Thursday, February 25 to Wednesday, February 24?

Senator Flynn, who was not present when Senator Roblin made his motion, argued that the motion would fall under rule 45 rather than rule 44. Again, I submit that is relevant because the notice was for Thursday, not Wednesday. Therefore, in my view, any attempt to move that motion yesterday was out of order, and it could only be moved with unanimous consent. The fact that the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate altered matters allowed the motion to be presented without unanimous consent and agreement being required.

● (1450)

The third portion of my point of order concerns rule 24. Rule 24 states:

A motion made in the Senate, but not seconded, shall not be debated or put from the Chair.

I was present yesterday when Senator Roblin introduced his motion, and I do not recall a seconder being mentioned.

Senator Frith: Yesterday?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

Senator Frith: He mentioned Senator Deschatelets.

Senator Phillips: I did not hear that. In that case, Senator Roblin put the motion properly. However, I have no recollection of the motion ever having been placed before the chamber by the Chair. Debates of the Senate of yesterday gives no indication that the motion was placed before this chamber.

To summarize, honourable senators, I ask three questions. The first is: Who deleted a portion of the debate, and where did the authority come from to delete that portion? Personally, I would have liked to refer to that in my point of order yesterday, but since it was not in Debates of the Senate I could not refer to it. My second question is: Who has the authority to change Senator Roblin's motion from the 25th to the 24th? And my third and final question is: If the motion was not put by the Chair, then were yesterday's proceedings in order?

The Rules of the Senate do not allow me to address a question to the Chair. However, I am hopeful that Madam Speaker will be gracious enough to consider my remarks to be at least a hint and perhaps even a suggestion for a reply, because the Clerk and the staff of Hansard are unable to reply. I think a reply is required.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is no question that Senator Phillips has raised a genuine point of order, and perhaps it must be ruled upon. Certainly, we could use the guidance that would flow from such a ruling.

As I understand the essence of his point of order, as distinct from his questions as to who did what, it is that the motion, having been put down for Thursday, should have appeared under Motions for Thursday. I do not think there is any question there. Most of us can remember Senator Roblin's saying something to the effect, "But I would like to speak on it tomorrow"—namely, Wednesday. I suspect that what happened was that those in charge of the Debates and the Proceedings, not hearing anyone say "Nay" to that suggestion, assumed that Senator Roblin had been given leave to speak on the following day.

I agree with Senator Phillips in that the evidence to support that position is a bit thin, because I do not know how many people knew what was going on. Certainly, there was no specific request in such words as, "Do I have leave to do so?" Senator Phillips is correct in suggesting that one of us should have said, "Now let's be sure that leave is being granted." But none of us made that suggestion. I believe there was a general feeling of agreement that Senator Roblin would be allowed to speak on the following day, but I cannot give it any more credibility than that.

Under those circumstances, it may or may not have been a good idea for those who are responsible for the preparation of the Minutes to assume that leave had been granted. In any event, we have learned a lesson there, that, for their assistance, we should make it very clear as to whether or not we are granting leave.

I am not sure whether Senator Phillips will agree with me on the point that Senator Roblin did not need to give two days' notice. Certainly, we agree that whether or not he needed to, he did give notice for Thursday. Whether or not everybody felt Senator Roblin had leave to proceed on the following day, I agree with Senator Phillips that it was not made clear in the chamber or in the Debates.

So maybe we do not need a ruling when we agree on what should have happened. That is, either Senator Roblin should have given notice for the following day, which was all he had to do, or, when he appeared to ask for leave to proceed on the following day, we should have made our position very clear and we should have had the Speaker put the question as to whether leave was or was not granted. Anyway, no one objected.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Senator Flynn said leave was not necessary.

[Senator Phillips.]

Senator Frith: Yes, Senator Flynn did say during the discussion yesterday that leave was not necessary to give notice for Wednesday. However, Senator Phillips' point is that although leave was not necessary to give notice for Wednesday, for some reason Senator Roblin gave notice for Thursday and, therefore, the proceedings were unusual.

When Senator Roblin indicated that he wanted to speak on Wednesday, it was his duty, or perhaps mine, to ensure that leave was properly asked for. As to whether the motion was actually put yesterday, I can find no evidence in the record and I cannot recall whether or not it was put. My recollection is that in the somewhat unusual circumstances and the confusion as to what was happening, from a procedural point of view, though things seemed perfectly clear to me at the time, perhaps the motion was not put.

In any event, if Senator Phillips and I agree as to what should have happened, that no leave was necessary were notice given for Wednesday, and that if notice was given for Thursday and a request was made to proceed on Wednesday, then the Senate should have given its approval to the procedure—because the Senate can give leave for anything of its own accord on such procedures—and when the motion was called it should have been put formally. If we do not agree, then we should have a ruling.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Frith for his intervention. I am pleased that we agree on several points. However, throughout his remarks I detected the notion that no one objected when Senator Roblin said he would like leave to proceed on Wednesday. At least two and possibly three senators in this area of the chamber said, "Thursday." I do not know what more is expected of us. Are we supposed to shoot poisoned darts at Senator Roblin and at the Speaker? I would have thought that, once we objected, the matter would be debated on Thursday.

• (1500)

Senator Frith: Did you say that on Tuesday evening?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

Senator Frith: I do remember that someone said, "Thursday." I thought you said that yesterday, but if you say it was Tuesday night, I accept your word. It makes it obvious that we should have paused for a moment in order to better understand the situation. I think the point of order raised by Senator Phillips is well founded, and we should learn something from it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, yesterday I put the following question:

Honourable senators, I believe this motion falls under rule 45.

I then said:

Does Senator Roblin have leave to speak to this motion today?

No one rose and Senator Flynn said, "We do not need to give leave," And everyone said, "Agreed."

Perhaps I omitted to put the motion in its complete form. Therefore, at the conclusion of the debate I will put the motion in accordance with the rules, and then everyone will understand that Senator Deschatelets is the seconder of the motion.

I beg Senator Phillips' forgiveness for my omission, and perhaps Senator Frith also seeks forgiveness for his omission.

THE SENATE

ORDERS OF THE DAY—TRANSPOSITION OF ORDERS NO. 3 AND NO. 4

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, although Senator Guay and Senator Murray have not decided when they wish to go ahead with Orders No. 3 and No. 4, am I right that they have agreed that the orders would be better dealt with in the reverse order? Is that agreed?

Hon. Lowell Murray: That is correct, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Perhaps it is not a matter of great consequence, but for the sake of some symmetry, we will reverse these Orders, so that "consideration of the First Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages," standing in Senator Murray's name, appears, from here on, in the Orders of the Day ahead of "Consideration of the Second Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages," standing in Senator Guay's name.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3), the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I still have not had an opportunity to speak with Senator Macquarrie who is out of town, but I had a letter from him this morning in which he indicated that he proposes to close the debate on this matter. From that, I take it that he intends to speak again on this inquiry.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Should we put it in his name?

Senator Murray: I think it would be an excellent idea to put the Order in Senator Macquarrie's name.

Order stands.

BROADCASTING

REGION 2 MF (AM) BROADCASTING CONFERENCE (SECOND SESSION)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter A. Stollery rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 24, 1982:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Region 2 MF (AM) Broadcasting Conference (Second Session) held during November and December, 1981, in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

He said: Honourable senators, I will be as brief as possible. I think it would be appropriate for this chamber to hear a report on a very important conference that took place in the fall, particularly in view of the fact that next Friday, at the Conference Centre here in Ottawa, a seminar on the conference will be conducted.

The Rio de Janeiro plan, which will come into effect on July 1, 1983 and replace the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement (NARBA), is the first western hemisphere plan for medium wave band radio—in other words, all ordinary AM radio stations.

During five weeks of torrential tropical rain in November and December, some 200 communications specialists from 24 countries in the western hemisphere, including a very able 11-person Canadian delegation, met in Rio and laboured over tortuous mathematical calculations by the thousands as they defined the operating areas of some 9,000 radio stations that cover the Americas. Among other things, they worked out an arrangement to ensure that the people who live in North York, Metropolitan Toronto, and who tune into 1010 on their radio dial after sundown, will continue to hear CFRB, one of the most commercial stations in Canada, and not Radio Havana.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Who will continue to hear 1010?

Senator Stollery: The residents of North York, who live in the metropolitan area of Toronto, will continue to hear CFRB, one of the most powerful stations in Toronto, after sundown, and not, as may well have occurred, Radio Havana.

The complicated calculations completely jammed one very advanced IBM computer in Geneva with satellite hook-up.

The conference, sponsored by the International Telecommunications Union, took more than two years just to plan. Some have described it as the most complex technical international negotiation ever. A session in Buenos Aires, Argentina, lasted 19 days just to establish the technical basis for Rio de Janeiro.

One of the unusual features of a conference on telecommunications, refreshing to a parliamentarian like myself who has only witnessed deadlock at international meetings and has stopped going, is that with telecommunications there must be agreement or chaos. "If you don't co-operate with me, then I won't co-operate with you, and our radio stations will interfere with each other and our satellites will interfere with each other." It is a process that I found fascinating, and I would like to share some of the details with you.

There were two interesting issues at Rio de Janeiro. They affect hundreds of thousands of Canadian consumers, and I think Canadians should be more aware of them. The first was technical but certainly comprehensible. It was the issue that attracted me in the first place.

You have to understand only basic broadcasting principles. As many are aware, broadcasting technique is based on the electromagnetic theory, one of the triumphs of nineteenth century science. The electromagnetic spectrum is the range, from zero to infinity, of how frequency per second radio waves are emitted from their source. The frequency of the wave, or hertz, is marked on your radio dial in thousands, or kilohertz. Less frequently emitted waves are longer; more frequently emitted waves are shorter. For example, the actual measurable length of a wave emitted with a frequency of 100 kilohertz is about three kilometers. Emitted one billion times per second, or one gigahertz, the wave is one foot long. Satellite transmission goes up to 20 gigahertz. The reason radio is described in terms like long, medium and short wave is because, in fact, the waves are long, medium and short.

The first issue to be settled in a master plan for the hemisphere was whether there should be more opportunity for AM broadcasting.

In the Americas, medium wave broadcasting takes place at spacings of 10 kilohertz along the spectrum from 535 kilohertz to 1,605 kilohertz. Subtract 535 from 1,605 and you have 1,070. Divided by 10, that makes 107 broadcasting channels. In the rest of the world medium wave broadcasting takes place at intervals of nine kilohertz, which gives you roughly 118 channels.

● (1510)

There is no question that the 9 kilohertz spacing would allow a great deal more competition. That was how the Carter administration saw it in the United States, but that is not how the Reagan administration, the United States and Canadian broadcasters or, remarkably, that defender of Canadian public interest, the CRTC, saw it. MPs were deluged with letters from their local broadcasters telling them to lobby the Minister of Communications not to change it. I do not believe one request was received from consumer interests for more competition. The Reagan approach, presented by Republican appointees to the Federal Communications Commission in the U.S., was summed up by the trade magazine Broadcasting.

The prospect of 200 to 1400 new stations—the precise number would depend on the power of the outlets and the channels given up to satisfy needs of other countries in the region—does not seem worth the candle to a majority on the commission.

[Senator Stollery.]

The comment applies equally to Canadian established broadcasting interests.

The Canadian Department of Communications tried quite hard to encourage open debate on the subject, for once the hemispheric spacing agreement was made it was fixed for time. The broadcasters knew this, but the issue, which has enormous consumer implications—advertising costs being lowered with more competition, community radio, the general principle of the more the merrier—was not appealing enough for consumer groups who were notified by the minister.

The same major U.S. trade magazine, Broadcasting, described the Canadian planners as having "demonstrated impressive technical and political skills in winning major points . . ." Unfortunately, we exercised those skills in the rain of Rio de Janeiro totally on behalf of the established radio interests in Canada.

The second issue at Rio, protection for Canadian stations, revealed a fascinating example of one of the unfortunate characteristics of international relations, that too often the public and their political leaders do not readily see the practical implications of policy and of one country's relations with another.

The registration of national broadcast frequencies with the International Frequency Registration Board in Geneva is a very practical business. To be registered with the IFRB the frequency must be of such a power that the range does not interfere unacceptably with a station in another country. If you put a station on the air that interferes unacceptably then it cannot be registered and it receives no protection. This is where Canada-U.S.-Cuba relations enter broadcasting. Who would ever have thought that the future of CFRB Toronto, one of Canada's most valuable commercial radio stations, was connected with the CIA?

Canada and the U.S. have resolved their interference difficulties since 1950 under an agreement known as the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement. This is the agreement which will be replaced by the Rio plan. Cuba was originally a member of NARBA. In fact, the NARBA office was originally in Havana. In broadcasting Cuba is considered an orderly country.

Nevertheless, because of the breakdown in U.S.-Cuban relations, there has been an increasing number of interference problems. As they are mutually destructive, the Cubans and Americans have met at the official level. Last August, partly in preparation for Rio in November, there was an important meeting in Washington at the State Department. The meeting was described as "delicate and difficult". It began on Monday and ended on Friday. Unfortunately, on Thursday the New York Times reported that the Reagan administration was considering the creation of "a separate agency for broadcasts to Cuba about internal developments and other news being censored in the Cuban press". The possible name for the station was reported as "Radio Broadcasting to Cuba".

Put simply, the Reagan administration was considering the expansion of a major irritant in U.S.-Cuban relations: the 50 kilowatt station operating from Marathon, Florida, broadcasting into Cuba, and owned by the CIA.

Article 30 of the International Radio Regulations says:

Broadcasting stations in the medium band shall not employ power exceeding that necessary to maintain economically an effective national service of good quality within the frontiers of the country concerned.

In other words the Marathon, Florida, station is illegal and so is the planned expansion.

Now, the range of a radio station depends on many things. Power is obviously one of them. The highest power allowed in Canada or the U.S. is 50 kilowatts. CBL Toronto broadcasts with 50 kilowatts power and is permitted by international agreement "skywave coverage". At night CBL bounces the signal off the ionosphere so that at night its protected range is very great. The nearest station to CBL on the same frequency is in Orlando, Florida. Without a skywave you could have stations as close as Albany, New York, or Scranton, Pennsylvania.

As part of the planning process for the Rio de Janeiro conference, countries were obliged to submit a list of their stations to the IFRB by March 1980. Buried in those thousands of submissions were plans by Cuba to put two 500 kilowatt stations on the air assigned to 550 kilohertz and 1010 kilohertz. CFRB is 1010 on your dial. As one Canadian expert said to me, "The Department of Communications ran tests and decided that after sundown the range of CFRB would be an area about the size of a dime."

When our delegation was preparing to go to Rio, led by Mr. Ed DuCharme of the Department of Communications, foremost in everyone's mind was the need to protect CFRB. Working for them was the Reagan administration's penchant for wanting to, as one Latin American delegate told me, "twist the Cubans' nose."

Well, it ended badly for the Americans. I was one of those who watched the dramatic moment as the Cuban delegation walked out of the conference. It alarmed me to see the U.S. delegates, forced by political pressures at home, "twist the Cubans' nose" in full view of 150 or so Latin American technical and political people who would only go home and tell their friends, because, after all, in broadcasting if you do not co-operate you cannot win.

I suppose the omens had turned bad. An enormous boulder had been dislodged by the weeks of pouring rain and rolled down Sao Irmao hill on to the cable connecting the conference with the satellite and computer centre in Geneva, and the head of the U.S. delegation had his passport and money stolen.

The floor fight was brief. The Cubans tried to make a bloc change of 48 frequencies, of which six were controversial. They included the two 500 kilowatt stations. The Americans came back with an announcement that if the Cubans made changes they too would make changes, changes that would not affect Cuba so much but which would damage a lot of other countries, particularly in the Caribbean and northern South America. There was a secret ballot which the Americans won, except that it did not make much sense because the Cubans had no choice but to walk out of the conference.

Just after Christmas Cuba declared its changes unilaterally. As Broadcasting magazine commented:

There now seems little in international law to prevent Cuba from causing additional problems.

CFRB was saved. 1010 on your dial went to 1040, the frequency reported under consideration by the U.S. for their expanded broadcasts into Cuba. Cuba struck out at a number of U.S. stations. One interesting station that will be adversely affected is KDKA Pittsburgh, North America's first commercial radio station.

Honourable senators, when in some months' time you begin to hear Radio Havana at night on your car radio, you will know why.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on this matter, it will be considered as having been debated.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the subject is sufficiently interesting to justify keeping it alive, or "on the air," if I may so express it, so I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 2, at 8 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the eleventh report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 3733.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration on Wednesday, March 10.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Notices of Motions

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is not a Notice of Motion, but I should like to say that we hope to proceed this evening with second reading of Bill C-78. I may also be asking for consent to bring forward an order, standing in the name of Senator Croll, which was adjourned last week until tomorrow, Wednesday. If leave is granted, he would prefer to proceed this evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): To which order are you referring?

Senator Frith: It is not on today's Order Paper because it was adjourned until this Wednesday. I am referring to the resumption of the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk."

Honourable senators, before we commence Question Period, I should point out that Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government, has been delayed. He may be here later this evening, and certainly he will be here tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: We can proceed in the same manner.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I am very disappointed.

Senator Frith: I am happy to say that I have received briefings on some subjects that may be of interest to honourable senators. If I am asked the right questions, I shall attempt to answer them.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are you trying to start something new around here?

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STATEMENTS BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE SENATE AND PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I would prefer to address my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate but, since he has been delayed, I hope that the deputy leader has in his book the music relating to federal-provincial affairs. Last Wednesday the leader in this chamber said:

● (2010)

This government is committed to co-operative federal-provincial relations . . . But every effort is being made in all areas to attain friendly and co-operative agreements on all such matters.

That was on Wednesday.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Nice thought.

Senator Nurgitz: On Thursday, the Prime Minister of this country told his press conference:

I thought we could build a strong Canada through co-operation. I have been disillusioned.

My question, hopefully for the Deputy Leader of the Government, is: Was the leader unaware of this new approach on Wednesday, or was the abandonment of co-operative federalism only formalized at Thursday's cabinet meeting?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have begun, as they say in baseball, 0 for 1.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Touché.

Senator Frith: I do not have an answer to that question, and, anyway, under no circumstances would I attempt to answer a question of that kind on behalf of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or on behalf of any other cabinet minister or senator.

Senator Nurgitz: Would the deputy leader take the question as notice on behalf of the leader?

Senator Frith: Agreed.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CAPITAL OUTFLOW

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development?

On February 18 I posed a question to the honourable senator concerning the rate of capital outflow during 1981, and specifically for the four quarters ending on September 30, 1981, in comparison with the average rate of capital outflow during the 1970s. Is the honourable senator in a position to respond to that question?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no. I do not have the exact information with respect to that with me. I will, however, ask that a reply, or a form of reply that is appropriate for the form in which the question was put, be expedited.

ENERGY

ALSANDS PROJECT—WITHDRAWAL OF PARTNERS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, on a different subject, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development.

On February 9, at page 3570 of Debates of the Senate, in reply to a question concerning the likelihood of self-sufficiency being achieved by 1990, the honourable senator is reported as saying:

—the Alsands project... is a significant part of the increased production that we need.

On February 15 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that the oil reserves off the east coast and in the Beaufort Sea are large enough to ensure self-sufficiency by 1990, even if Alsands does not proceed. Will the honourable senator explain what happened between February 9 and February 15 to render Alsands unnecessary with regard to the achievement of self-sufficiency?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is a matter of perspective, I suppose, and putting into context the possibilities that are available.

The Alsands project, in its present form, I think, is projected to produce about 137,000 barrels a day when it is on full stream. If that project were to go ahead immediately, or very soon, it could be up to full stream by the end of this decade. There are, of course, some very interesting discoveries off the east coast—Hibernia and the surrounding areas, in particular—which are of such a size and nature that they could, I guess, if everything goes well, produce substantially more than that on a daily basis. I suppose that if some of the discoveries that have been made in the Beaufort Sea go ahead as rapidly as the most optimistic scenario, they would also yield in excess of that amount.

Bearing in mind that the deficiency is now substantially less than the total capability of all of these sources, I think it is possible that we could reach self-sufficiency without Alsands by 1990; but that does not change the assertion that I made, namely, that Alsands, and, indeed, perhaps other enhanced recovery processing plants handling heavy oil, and other tar-sands-type projects, would assist in the totality of supply in Canada.

● (2015)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Behold the “totality” man.

Senator Balfour: As a further supplementary, would the minister not concede that in addition to the Alsands project, the heavy oil project at Lloydminster and the Esso Cold Lake project are equally in grave doubt as to their ability to proceed as economically viable projects; and, if he does agree with that assertion, will he indicate what that does to his prognostication concerning self-sufficiency?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is more to it than that. Self-sufficiency, in the view of the government, does not include or exclude any one project, whether it be Lloydminster, Cold Lake, Fort McMurray, the Beaufort, Hibernia, or anywhere else. We have added up the totality of the potential that is there.

There is more. The new oil price will, in our view, enhance the drilling program, starting perhaps in 1982, because of the price that is now being offered by both levels of government under the agreement for new oil coming on stream; and it is the totality, or a combination of the totality of all of that, that leads us to believe that it is both physically possible and perhaps highly desirable to have self-sufficiency by the end of this decade.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary question for the minister. Since he has obviously gone into some painstaking detail in adding up the totality of all of those projects, would he be prepared to indicate—I do not expect him to have this figure at his fingertips this evening, but I am sure he can bring it to the chamber tomorrow—what is his department's estimate, during the calendar year 1982, with respect to conventional drilling activity in the western sedimentary basins in terms of the number of rigs employed and the number of wells to be drilled?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will try to do so; but, of course, what I would be doing is bringing an estimate of the number of oil companies—

Senator Balfour: That is what I am asking for.

Senator Olson: —an estimate of what their drilling programs are, particularly in the exploration area, to bring on new oil. That is something significantly different from developing existing oil fields that do not qualify for the “new oil” price. Therefore, it would be a number of opinions that would be expressed. However, I could obtain some samples, if the honourable senator would appreciate that; but I cannot guarantee that I will be able to discuss it with every oil company which has drilling plans for 1982.

Senator Balfour: I would not expect that, but I would expect that an estimate of this activity would be within the knowledge of the minister, within an accuracy of plus or minus 10 per cent.

Senator Olson: It may be within an accuracy of plus or minus 10 per cent. I know there are some organizations in existence now which make it their business to monitor, if that is the right word, the views of various oil companies in connection with their exploration programs for 1982, and I know of at least one that is already predicting a 50 per cent increase by the third quarter of 1982.

Senator Balfour: Is the minister telling us that his department, or the government, makes no attempt to monitor these numbers?

Senator Olson: I am not saying that at all, but when one gathers information that may be within the privacy of budget preparations for a number of private sector corporations, it is rather useful to try to gather whatever intelligence there is from some of those organizations which make it their business to pick up that information.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, may I ask the minister a question concerning the goal of self-sufficiency from the perspective of demand? Has the government revised the demand forecasts on which the national energy policy was based, and, if so, will the minister undertake to bring the new demand projections to the Senate? Also, will he attempt to reconcile the considerable discrepancy, or difference of opinion, between the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board with regard to the demand forecasts?

● (2020)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that discrepancy may be mostly in the mind of the honourable senator.

Senator Murray: It's on the public record.

Senator Olson: Whatever it may be, I suppose my honourable friend is trying to pin us down.

Senator Murray: On anything.

Senator Olson: He is trying to pin us down on our forecasts.

Senator Murray: The national energy policy is based on those forecasts.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator knows that we make forecasts, as does every government, on an on-going basis. What he also ought to know is that a number of the conservation programs—particularly the off-oil projects, whether they be straight conservation-of-energy projects or whether they be projects touting alternative forms of energy which we have in great supply—have been very effective.

I am talking here about self-sufficiency in crude oil, because in electricity, coal, natural gas and so on we are far more than self-sufficient right now. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources outlined a number of programs and stated, in effect, that some of our off-oil alternatives for fuel conservation have been rather effective. Of course, the effectiveness of these programs would change rather dramatically in some cases the totality of the projected consumption.

Another thing my honourable friend ought to know, if he does not already, is that there are certain assumptions that go into forecasts such as these as to the effectiveness of these programs, as well as other programs which may be coming on in the future. All of these programs must be taken into account, and therein a judgment has to be made as to which ones will be the most effective, and then numbers must be put to them. These projections do not always turn out completely perfect, no matter how competent the government is in trying to make the forecasts.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, you have just heard, in advance, the apologia of the minister.

Senator Olson: You have heard an assertion of truth.

Senator Murray: The fact is that the projections have turned out to be wildly inaccurate. One of the bases on which the demand forecasts were put forward was a certain rate of economic growth by the country every year, and under the economic mismanagement of this government the country has come no where near attaining the economic growth rate on which those demand forecasts were based. Never mind the apologia.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Or the rhetoric.

Senator Murray: Or the rhetoric of the minister.

Senator Frith: Of the questioner.

Senator Murray: I am interested in knowing whether, in fact, demand forecasts have been revised. I gather—and I think it is a fair inference from what the minister has said—that the forecasts have been revised. I am asking him whether he will bring to the Senate—with whatever apologia, qualifications or explanations he wishes to bring with them, because that is his privilege—the revised forecasts, as soon as possible, so that we can have a look at them.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall bring to the Senate a revised estimate from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, if one has been made. I give my honourable friend the undertaking that I shall bring it as soon as it is ready, and that it will have the qualifications as to certain assumptions that may exist therein.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Plus your own.

Senator Olson: I suspect that, as time goes on, it will become substantially more accurate than some of the projections made by other governments. In fact, the particular government of which I am thinking could not even count to 145.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate in the sure and certain hope that his book, in its totality of information, will be able to provide the answer. Can he indicate whether at this time, after hearing uncertain trumpets for some weeks, there is now a consistent policy in reference to El Salvador and, in particular, the observation of the voting? I ask this in that I note that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has declared that an election is better than no election. I have been in Canada long enough to disprove that by my own memory.

• (2025)

Someone else has said that the whole thing is in such a bad state that we should not be involved. One member of the four-person group from the House of Commons suggests that Canadians should support the view that is supported by our American and British allies.

Has there been a change in this position or are we, as a country and as a government, deciding on a policy of no observer participation whatsoever?

Honourable senators, I could lengthen my question so that my honourable friend will find the answer, but I think I have done very well on its elongation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is as sound now as it was when it was first established.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: What is it?

Senator Frith: Our understanding is that the Government of El Salvador is attempting to take reasonable steps to ensure that the election is run in a fair and just manner. Certainly El Salvadoran citizens wishing to vote can do so, provided they hold a national identity card, which is to be presented at their respective polling stations. Such cards are available to all citizens over the age of 18 years. I am able to report that, as far as our investigation has ascertained, the ballot boxes will be constructed of a clear plastic material, making it impossible for any more than one ballot to be inserted without being noticed. Each political party will be entitled to have a representative stationed in each polling station to review the actual balloting and the counting of votes. Each voter will have invisible ink placed on his or her small finger. Detection of the ink is possible only under special light, with which each polling station will be equipped. It will, therefore, be virtually impossible for any voter to place more than one ballot in the box.

Of course, that leaves the question that has arisen as to whether all those who genuinely wish to vote will be there to vote. I know, by reason of some recent trips by parliamentarians to El Salvador, that that is a question that has been left up in the air. However, as to the preparations for the election, that is our information.

With regard to the position of the Canadian government on the question of participating in the elections in El Salvador as an observer, I should say, first of all, that I understand the word "observer" to include the preparation for the vote as well as attendance during the vote. I believe the position of the Canadian government on this issue is the same, namely, that we will not be participating as an observer and will not be on the ground during the actual election.

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the honourable senator and I want to tell him that I listened carefully to the totality of his reply. Surely he is not suggesting that the issue is whether or not the citizens of El Salvador wish to vote? Is not the real question more directed toward whether they are able to vote on account of the structures—and possibly strictures—within that country? For instance, I understand that the women of El Salvador are not allowed to vote. We could not stand for that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I simply wanted to disclose the information I have. As background to the reply, I wanted to show I was not ignoring the fact that the group of parliamentarians who recently went to El Salvador returned with the conclusion, based on their observations, that the question of whether all those entitled to vote would be prepared to vote is still unanswered. Of course, I was only asked about the position of the government and I tried to give that position. I mentioned the other material only to let honourable senators know that I was aware of the fact that this issue is of concern to some of our fellow parliamentarians.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary. Could the deputy government leader tell us whether, in spite of the statement made by Mr. Maurice Dupras, leader of the parliamentary delegation to El Salvador, who said that the election had been rigged by the government, the government of El Salvador will hold that election not according to the basic rules of a reasonable democracy but according to its own wishes? In spite of the advice given by the Canadian parliamentarians on their return from El Salvador, which is the scene of these tragic incidents, will the Canadian government still support the holding of an election in El Salvador? We know that Mr. Dupras stated today that the election to be held in El Salvador had been rigged, that the dice were loaded, that the voters' lists had not been prepared and that perhaps only 25 per cent of the population would be able to vote. In spite of all that, will the government still support the holding of an election in El Salvador?

Senator Frith: No, I did not say that. It is not up to the Government of Canada to say whether the election will be held.

Senator Asselin: Does the government support an election in El Salvador?

Senator Frith: The Canadian government is not involved. It is up to the citizens of that country. As for supporting an election in El Salvador, I do not know exactly what you mean by that. Do you want to know whether we shall support the results of that election?

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Frith: Do you mean whether or not we shall support the election?

Senator Asselin: No. What I mean is that the Prime Minister stated in the House of Commons last week that it was better to have an election in El Salvador than no election at all. A parliamentary committee of the Canadian government—and you can read this in Hansard—has told the Canadian government: You should not support the holding of an election because the dice are loaded.

Senator Frith: Honourable senator, as I was saying, I do not understand what you mean by “supporting the election”.

Senator Asselin: I mean to support the principle of holding an election in El Salvador.

Senator Frith: Would the opposite be to say to El Salvador: You cannot hold an election?

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Frith: This is exactly my point. To support the holding of an election means that if we say no, we shall not support the election, we shall be saying to El Salvador: You cannot hold your election.

Senator Asselin: Not at all. What I am suggesting is that the Canadian government follow the example of Mexico and France and deny that a legitimate election can be held in El Salvador in the present circumstances.

Senator Frith: Thank you for your explanation. I am now in a position to answer your question which was: Are we going to support the election?

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Frith: That was not the question?

Senator Asselin: I mean, support the fact that an election will take place.

Senator Frith: Support the fact that an election will take place? It is impossible to answer this question.

Senator Asselin: I will rephrase my question. Is the Government of Canada in favour of an election being held in El Salvador?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems to me that it does not behoove the Government of Canada to tell the people of El Salvador: We cannot accept the fact that you are going to hold an election.

Senator Asselin: Why, then, was the Prime Minister reported as saying that an election is better than no election at all?

Senator Frith: That is not the same thing.

GRAIN

PROPOSED CHANGE IN CROWSNEST RATES—EFFECT ON EASTERN CANADA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Has a study been done recently on the economic impact that the proposed change in the Crow rate would have in eastern Canada, with particular emphasis on the possible increase in the cost of feed grain which now goes to cattle raisers in eastern Canada?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have no knowledge of a study having been done, but I think it is quite possible that some attention has been given to that by some departments. I would be very happy to pursue that matter, to determine whether or not a study has been made, and, after that, to ascertain whether or not it is the type of document that might be made public at this time.

I do not think that the premise of the honourable senator is quite accurate. I cannot see how an increase in freight rates would increase the price of grain, since that is set on the international market. However, that is a minor detail.

I would be happy to take this question as notice and attempt to get further information for the Honourable Senator Bosa.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I have a supplementary question for the minister. Would the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board explain why such a document should not be made public?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): He said that he does not know whether any exists.

Senator Argue: I am not trying to explain anything. I just said that if there is such a document available, I will see if I can make it available to the Senate.

THE SENATE

SEATING PLAN—REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN BROCHURE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. I think on all of our desks this evening is a new seating plan for this chamber dated March 2.

At least five years ago, I think, I started agitation in the Senate to try to get the seating plan changed and improved, and I see that that is in progress. I understand that from now on the seating plan will always be published separately from the descriptive brochure given to visitors to the galleries, and I think that that is sensible.

At least four years ago I wrote about this seating plan and said that it is completely anachronistic, in that it showed these so-called regions, counties, provinces and cities which senators represent. However, that does not convey anything to the ordinary visitor to the gallery. For example—and I do not wish to hurt Senator Macquarrie's feelings—I gather that most people in this country do not know where Hillsborough is and which province it is in.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Godfrey: But they certainly know where Halifax is, so Senator Donahoe does not have to worry. I am sure most visitors to the gallery would not know where Senator Sherwood is from by simply reading "Royal" in the seating plan. They would not have any problem with Senator Lucier, because he comes from the Yukon; nor with Senator Adams, because he comes from the Northwest Territories.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Where is Rosedale?

Senator Godfrey: Again, I hate to hurt Senator Stollery's feelings, but I suggest that some visitors to the gallery from outside of Ontario would not know which province Bloor and Yonge is in.

This has been going on for 40 or 50 years now, yet 20 years ago we abolished the habit of calling senators by their designation, so why can we not put the province of each senator on this seating plan instead of what is now included, so that those visiting in the galleries will know the province each senator represents?

Further to that, why can we not put one's party affiliation on this document? My recollection is that in the House of Commons they do include this information somewhere.

I have no personal axe to grind, because everyone in the country knows where Rosedale is!

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Before I begin, I should like to say that in the main I agree with what my honourable friend has just said. I would be happy to see the provincial nominations declared, but I am not so sure that I would be too happy to see party affiliations declared.

Senator Godfrey raised this question and used my name and my designation and said, with due deference to me, "Does anybody know where Halifax is?"

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Everybody knows that—that is what he said.

Senator Donahoe: I want to tell him where Halifax is. Halifax is the major portion of Senator Barrow's designation.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, some of the elements of the question put by Senator Godfrey fall on sympathetic ears. For example, it is true that essentially we are here to represent provinces—that is, each of us is appointed for a certain province. It is also true that the system of designation still exists and, therefore, it might very well be worthwhile trying to find a system that would give both the province and the designation.

As to party affiliation, I think there might be less agreement on that question. In any event, this very subject is under active consideration at the present time by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. While the material is fairly well advanced at this stage, we will certainly pass Senator Godfrey's comments along as an opportunity to take into account his views. Since the seating plan will be printed separately anyway and, we hope, will be the subject of a computer program designed to facilitate changes, and will also be more handsomely produced so that designations and names will not run off the edge of the box, we will take into account his views and those of other senators.

● (2040)

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to point out that my name was also mentioned by Senator Godfrey.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Your name or your division?

Senator Stollery: My division, in fact. I am referring to the area I listed in the Parliamentary Guide designating where I come from.

I should like to point out to honourable senators that, when I looked into the matter, contrary to what Senator Godfrey has just told us, outside the province of Quebec there is no such thing as a designation.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Senator Stollery: It is a pure fabrication and something that has sprung up over the years. For example, since my family has come from a certain area for the last 100 or 125 years, I thought I would use that as my designated area. Of course, this has no meaning. It is something that is purely a convention and, outside the province of Quebec, the question of designation simply does not exist.

Senator Frith: I would not like the record to be left as noting that because something is only a convention it does not exist.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Conventions are important.

Senator Godfrey: I was going to ask: Is it only a convention? When I was appointed, I was asked to declare my designation.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Are you sure it is just a convention?

Senator Flynn: In Quebec it is legal; outside Quebec it is a convention.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed reply to a question asked by Senator McElman concerning labour disputes on work sites of the TQ&M pipeline.

I can inform the honourable senator that I have contacted my two colleagues, the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General, and have been told that labour disputes of this nature are a provincial concern and come under provincial jurisdiction. The federal government is, of course, disturbed by reports describing the situation on some of the TQ&M work sites. I must reiterate, however, that the matter rests within the provincial government's responsibility.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SACCHARIN—BAN ON USE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Buckwold on June 16, 1981, concerning the ban on the use of saccharin as an additive in food.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I hope there was no urgency.

Senator Frith: The decision to ban the use of saccharin in foods, including beverages, was based on the fact that it causes cancer in animals. Since the decision to remove saccharin from foodstuffs was taken in March 1977, further information has become available, some of which indicates that consumption of saccharin may be associated with the development of bladder tumors in humans as well as in animals. This has further supported the view of scientists in the Health Protection Branch that saccharin use must be restricted. The Department of National Health and Welfare, as a regulatory agency concerned with health, could not abrogate its responsibilities and continue to permit the use of saccharin as a food additive on the available information on its safety.

It was recognized at the time of the ban that regulatory actions of this type would cause a degree of hardship to certain individuals. Thus, prior consultation was made with medical experts and representatives of the food industry. As a result, saccharin is available in pharmacies for use in the home by diabetics and others who for personal reasons may wish to use this table-top sweetener.

It may be noted that restrictive actions on saccharin have also been proposed elsewhere. In the United States, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), has made such proposals. However, proceedings unique to that country's legal system have resulted in a moratorium on the FDA's proposal. In addition, Sweden has banned the use of saccharin in some foods, including beverages, and placed restrictive limitations on others.

Honourable senators will no doubt be interested in knowing that the Department of National Health and Welfare has recently approved the use of a new, low-calorie sweetener called aspartame. This action will expand the range of products available to those who have to restrict their sugar intake.

EFFECTIVENESS AND QUALITY OF FOOD INSPECTION SYSTEM

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on December 9, 1981, concerning the effectiveness and quality of the food inspection system.

We are indeed aware of the delisting of the Canada Packers plant in Toronto for export to U.S.A. which took place on December 1, 1981. Officials in the meat hygiene division indicate that the plant was delisted because of construction and maintenance problems which were subsequently corrected. It has to be pointed out that the quality and wholesomeness of the finished product has never been jeopardized. Very strong controls were implemented and rooms which were not in compliance were temporarily taken out of production. The plant was relisted on January 7, 1982.

The Ministry of Agriculture provided inspection in 519 registered meat slaughter and processing plants in 1981. Each of these plants was reviewed monthly by regional veterinary supervisors. In the same period USDA veterinarians conducted 525 plant reviews. In addition, the headquarters audit section, responsible for the verification of application of national standards in the department, conducted 951 inspections.

The effectiveness and quality of inspections was, therefore, very closely monitored. New programs and procedures such as AQL, Acceptable Quality Level, and TQC, Total Quality Control, are continually being developed to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of inspection.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—OBSERVER STATUS FOR SENATORS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall. I notice that he is not in the chamber this evening, and I hope that his colleagues will draw his attention to this delayed answer since I know this matter is of great concern to him. The answer relates to a question asked by Senator Marshall on February 23, 1982, concerning Senate representatives at the Law of the Sea Conference.

Honourable senators, Senator Perrault has been in touch with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and we are arranging to send two senators to the Law of the Sea Conference as observers. We are presently working out the details.

POLAND AND U.S.S.R.—SANCTIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on February 23, 1982, concerning the processing of applications of self-exiles in Vienna.

Honourable senators, Canada will be taking a total of 6,000 self-exiles from around the world this year. Most of these people will come from Europe, but not all. I am informed that the number to be accepted from Vienna—and this is out of the total of 6,000—will be 3,500 people.

We have recently augmented our staff in Vienna to be certain that we have enough personnel to process the targeted quota for that city.

BANKS

PROFITS AND OPERATIONS—PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Phillips on February 23, 1982, concerning the government's announcement of a committee study of bank profits and bank operations.

Honourable senators, I have made inquiries and I am informed that this study is to be carried out by a committee of the other place, namely, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MEGA-PROJECTS—TQ&M PIPELINE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I refer to the delayed answer given by the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the TQ&M pipeline labour difficulties in Quebec, and would pose the following supplementary question: Would he be good enough to find out from his colleagues to whom he referred in his delayed answer why this interprovincial work, which is of interest to the whole of Canada, and of particular interest to the Atlantic provinces, is not subject to federal jurisdiction in the same way as any other interprovincial work?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Of course, that assertion is wrong. The pipeline itself, the acquisition of easements, the requirement for plans, profiles and books of reference are federal responsibilities because it is an interprovincial pipeline. However, the labour unions involved on the pipeline come under provincial jurisdiction because the provincial labour law applies.

In regard to some of the other assertions that were made regarding claims or threats and breaking the law, those matters also come under the administration of that part of the Criminal Code which comes under provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Smith: I did not make those assertions; I merely asked, as a supplementary question, for an explanation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the assertions that were made by my honourable friend related to what was contained in the original question. The original question, asked by Senator McElman, included some of those matters. Therefore, the whole question has to be taken into account when responding to a supplementary question. When we build a pipeline, it does not automatically mean that the administration of the Criminal Code or of the labour law in the province will come under federal jurisdiction. That should be completely clear to my honourable friend.

• (2050)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are wrong on the labour laws.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I am always glad when my honourable friend decides to tell me what the law is, but that is not what I asked him. I asked him if he would inquire from his colleagues, who supplied him with the answer he gave us, as to the grounds they had determined that this interprovincial work—which is also, I might say, work for the general advantage of Canada, although it may not have been declared as such, and which is of great interest to the Atlantic provinces—does not come under federal jurisdiction in these matters, in the same way as, for instance, the railways do.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators. I gave my friend, in probably more detail than he wanted, the precise reply to his question.

Senator Flynn: You are wrong on labour law.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps the honourable gentleman had better look up his law, and perhaps inquire from the Minister of Justice whether all labour matters in Canada, especially in relation to works of interprovincial concern and, therefore, under federal jurisdiction, necessarily come under provincial jurisdiction. Before he sets out to give me a lecture on the law, he had better inform himself on what the law is.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have, and my answer is just as accurate now as it was a few minutes ago when I gave it.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, if the thing was wrong a few minutes ago it is still wrong now.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

CONCESSIONAL FINANCING—NEGATIVE SPREAD ON LOANS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, some days ago the Minister of State for Economic Development and I had exchanges on two subjects. I simply want to say for the record that I do not consider those matters closed, and that I am expecting a reply under the heading of delayed answers.

The first matter is with regard to the so-called negative spread interest rates, between the cost of the money to the Export Development Corporation and the rates at which the corporation lends the money out.

The second matter concerns the respective roles and responsibilities of the representatives of the Minister of State for Economic Development in the provinces, and those of the agents of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office in those provinces.

I would like to have, under delayed answers, a report on both of those matters at the minister's convenience.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will take note of my honourable friend's expectations.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I do not think his expectations will be very high in view of his experience in asking questions.

LABOUR ADJUSTMENT BENEFITS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the second reading of Bill C-78, to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-78, the Labour Adjustment Benefits Act, is a part of Labour Canada's participation in the $350 million industry and labour adjustment program announced in January 1981 by the Ministers of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Employment and Immigration and Labour. As a component of the industrial restructuring, work force retraining and employee mobility promoted by the general program, the Labour Adjustment Benefits Act is designed to provide immediate relief from the distress caused to older employees and to communities where permanent plant closures and other large scale terminations affect substantial numbers of workers.

The legislation has two major components, the labour adjustments benefits program, and amendments to Part III of the Canada Labour Code.

The legislation is designed to promote closer consultation and co-operation between labour, management and government, by requiring management to take a more responsible attitude towards its employees, employees to assume a greater share in planning for their own future, and government to assist in those cases beyond the reasonable responsibility of the private sector.

The legislation derives from the recommendations of the Carrothers Commission which was appointed by the government in 1978 to investigate ways of mitigating the adverse effects of redundancies and layoffs.

Following the commission's report of March 9, 1979, the government conducted extensive discussions with business and the unions. The result of these efforts is the bill which we are now considering. This is a refinement and expansion of an existing program in which assistance is given to workers laid off in the textile, clothing and footwear industries. It will also permit the Governor in Council to designate as beneficiaries industries undergoing significant economic adjustment of a non-cyclical nature by reason of import competition, or because of industrial restructuring pursuant to a federal government program.

A labour adjustment review board will be created to screen for eligibility the applications from laid-off employees.

In order for an employee to be judged eligible, the board must be satisfied that he was laid off from a designated industry as a result of economic disruption, and that the number of employees at his work place had been reduced as a result of layoffs in the 12-month period preceding by at least 10 per cent or 50 employees, whichever is the lesser number. Furthermore, while the Canada Labour Code presently provides for a system of graduated lengths of time for notice to be given to the minister of a termination, depending upon the number of employees to be terminated, this legislation amends that provision so that any termination of 50 or more employees will require 16 weeks' written notice to the minister.

The laid-off employee, having received the approval of the board, will then be free to register his claim with the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission. The bill is in no way intended to duplicate or replace other provisions for assistance. However, the government wants the money appropriated hereunder to go directly to those in greatest need, so it will be the commission's duty to determine that the applicant is not in receipt of, or eligible to receive, retirement pensions under the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan, and that he has claimed and exhausted all benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Normally, only laid-off employees between the ages of 54 to 65 will be eligible to apply for the benefit. However, the bill does give the commission latitude to lower the eligibility age to 50 on certain closely defined compassionate grounds. The public interest is protected further by the provisions that recipients be Canadian citizens or permanent residents, have a record of employment in the industry of at least 10 of the previous 15 years, and have no present prospect of other employment. These conditions having been met, the laid-off employee will receive payments equal to 60 per cent of his average weekly insurable earnings.

● (2100)

In addition to these generous provisions, the bill will entitle workers to severance pay after one year of employment rather than after five years as is now the case. The employee will continue to receive two days' wages for each completed year of employment and a minimum of five days' wages will be paid. The maximum of 40 days' wages now in effect will apply no longer. Employees will be required to establish management-labour committees whose members will be responsible for developing plans to minimize the impact of termination of employment, and under certain provisions the minister will be able to appoint an arbitrator to settle disputes during the planning stage.

Honourable senators, while the government does not view this bill as a panacea for all the problems stemming from structural changes in the economy, it nevertheless does provide an important measure of relief to those members of the work force who are too old to be reasonably expected to adapt to these changes. It will assist individuals who need and deserve our help and it will also assist the communities in which they live. Therefore, I urge honourable senators to give this legislation their serious consideration and support.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The honourable senator who has just spoken gave me the impression that the bill was targeted at senior employees who perhaps have been working for a long time and who could not easily be retrained or relocated. Is that what the bill specifically says? My reading of it is that it has a far more general application than that.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I believe it is targeted primarily to the older employees because there are stipulations. In the first instance, the legislation applies to those employees between the ages of 54 and 65, which is the age at which they would be receiving other benefits. However, in certain instances exceptions are made, and the age is lowered to 50 to accommodate certain employees who otherwise would be harmed by the termination of employment.

Senator Roblin: I thank the honourable senator. That deals with my point.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I mentioned earlier, I now ask leave to have the following order brought forward to be dealt with at this time. I refer to the order which appeared on last Wednesday's Order Paper as Order No. 7 and which read as follows:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk"—

At that time the order stood in the name of Senator Croll, who had thought that he would speak tomorrow. However, I understand that he is ready to speak this evening. I therefore ask that that order be brought forward.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure that we would be delighted to hear Senator Croll now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 10, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I was preparing myself to speak on the report entitled "Child at Risk", but on getting into it I realized that there was more to it than I had supposed. I have now divided my speech into three sections: "Child at Risk"; poverty as related to it—and, particularly, how to bring people at least up to the poverty line; and then a further idea I developed, that despite the fact that the government says it does not have any money, it does, in fact, have the money to do what needs to be done—which I believe will interest honourable senators more than a little.

Let me begin by saying that the committee's report entitled "Child at Risk", a study on early childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, conducted by the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, has made a valuable contribution to a little understood and neglected field.

My first words of congratulation must go to Senator McGrand for his interest, assistance and work on the committee, and for his lifelong concern for his fellow man. Congratulations are also due to Senator Bonnell who was most helpful and did a great deal of work in connection with that study.

The committee's report has opened the door, but it has just touched the perimeter of the problem in the hope that concerned citizens will recognize its scope and the need. We recognize the cost of maintaining people in correctional institutions. We know that a pattern of crime begins early in life. We know what effect poverty has on a woman and on a child.

The alarming increase in juvenile delinquency has been placed on record, as have the enlightened efforts to reform offenders and to re-integrate them into society rather than merely to punish them.

The 28 recommendations are thorough and far-reaching. They tell the story. There are recommendations for changes in the Family Allowance, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the National Housing Act, and the Criminal Code. They all have to do with poor people.

I hope that we shall do more than just receive the report and allow it to gather dust on the shelves of the archives or libraries. There is ample opportunity for positive action. Since it originated in the Senate, it is our duty to follow it up, just as we have followed up our recommendations on social measures and in many other committee reports.

Having completed the report, we now have enough experience to follow it up with action and to involve the government in examining the recommendations. In that respect, Senator Godfrey's suggestion, that we should bring the departmental people before us six months after the presentation of our report and ask them what they have done, if anything, about the report, would at least put them on notice so that they would do some work on it. We would simply write to the departmental people involved, ask them to appear before the committee at a mutually agreeable time, and then listen to what they have to say.

However, more than this is necessary. For us to get serious consideration in the House of Commons, it is necessary for one of our friends over there to place a resolution in the same terms on their Order Paper. When they go into their song and dance and decide what will be spoken to, it is quite possible that the resolution will be debated. To get any results at all it is essential that the matter be debated in the other place.

That brings me to one of the points I wish to make on the report, that in reading it one notices that poverty comes up over and over again. It seems that we have difficulty defining poverty. The poverty line has been developed as the main methodology for assessing income insufficiency. It suffers, however, from several limitations. First, it relies exclusively on money income. Resources such as net assets, home ownership, and health and education benefits are not taken into account. The poverty line presents a static view of income. It cannot tell us from year to year whether the same people have remained poor. The data used to compute the poverty line do not include Indians on reserves, people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, or persons in institutions.

There are two principal approaches to establishing the poverty line: there is the absolute approach; and there is the relative approach. The absolute poverty line is established by determining the amount of money necessary for the minimum food, clothing and shelter requirements. The Statistics Canada low-income cut-off line is an example of the absolute approach. The Statistics Canada line is used by the federal government, though it is not an official poverty line. This line establishes a low-income cut-off where family units spend 62 per cent or more of their income on the basic necessities of food, shelter and clothing. The Statistics Canada line also takes into account family size and the fact that the cost of living is normally lower in a rural setting. That is the absolute poverty line.

The relative poverty line approach defines poverty in terms of income inequality, or as a shortfall from community standards. Hence, it is a measure of social as well as economic well-being. This is the approach the committee used in compiling its report. This measure has also been accepted throughout this country and is in use in certain universities, as well as by the Canadian Council on Social Development. The basis for both poverty lines is the average Canadian family income. The Canadian Council on Social Development calculates its line at 50 per cent of average Canadian family income, adjusted for family size. The poverty line established by the Senate committee also took into account family size, but it is set at about 52 per cent of average income. While the Statistics Canada line rises with price increases, the Canadian Council on Social Development line and the Senate line reflect real income growth as well as price increases, so they grow at a faster rate.

At this stage, honourable senators, I would like to have appended to today's proceedings a document entitled "Senate Report on Poverty Updated, 1970-1980"; a series of tables from the Department of National Health and Welfare entitled "Poverty in Canada, 1979"; and a single page headed "How Many Canadians are Poor?" which includes a table giving a province-by-province breakdown of the number of poor people in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For documents see Appendix "B", p. 3740.)

Senator Croll: I shall refer to those documents later. The facts sheet on poverty circulated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Monique Bégin, to all members of the House of Commons and the Senate in July 1980 points out that according to the Statistics Canada low-income cut-off line, the extent of poverty in Canada declined during the 1970s, from 3.3 million in 1973 to 2.8 million in 1978. This represents a decrease from about 16 per cent to about 12.5 per cent over the same period. Relative poverty, however, is unchanged. Throughout the 1970s the percentage of the population with incomes below the Senate poverty line has remained close to 20 per cent. Since 1951 the richest 20 per cent of Canadian families have consistently received over 40 per cent of the national income, while the share of the poorest 20 per cent of Canadian families has remained at about 4 per cent. There has been no change there at all.

Honourable senators, there is no use my playing with the numbers to illustrate to you that we think there are more poverty-stricken than the report indicates. That is not the object of my speaking to you tonight. I merely want to emphasize the importance of these figures.

I should now like to point out the plight of females who live below this poverty line. Females experience a consistently higher incidence of poverty than do males. In 1978 a female-headed family had more than one chance in three of being poor, whereas a male-headed family had one chance in thirteen. For female individuals in 1978 the incidence of poverty was 41 per cent; for male individuals the incidence of poverty was 28 per cent. So, if you are old and a woman, you are just old, poor and forgotten. The high incidence of poverty for single females is a result of several factors. As you are aware, females live longer than males. In 1931 the life expectancy of females was 62.1 years, as opposed to that of males, which was 60 years. In 1981 the life expectancy of females was 77.48 years, whereas that of males was 70.19 years.

According to the statistics, honourable senators, women do live longer than men. It can be seen that, in all of Canada, the poorest of the poor are often elderly women who are widows. Two out of three elderly widows are poor.

Full-time working women earn only 62 per cent of what men earn. For a woman, getting married is a way out of poverty; getting divorced is a way into it. The possibility of education is another means of escaping poverty. Studies strongly suggest that the state of being poverty-stricken is not something which is passed on mechanically from one generation to the next.

Poverty has many faces. To an adult it may bring high stress levels, poor health, high suicide incidence, lack of energy due to an inadequate diet, low paying jobs without benefits and few training or educational opportunities. For the most innocent victims of poverty—the children—the situation is worse. For the poor child, life begins with a 50 per cent greater chance of being born prematurely and underweight, and continues with a 200 per cent chance of contracting childhood diseases and of missing one to three months of schooling each year due to illness.

Who are the poor? Poor is the family of four trying to survive on the income which one of the spouses receives from a full-time job at the minimum wage. Poor is the mother of two young children who suddenly finds herself with a spouse who has no marketable skills, and no form of child care which would permit her to take such low paying jobs as may be available. Poor is the elderly woman who spent all of her life in a comfortable middle-class home, but who was left with nothing when her husband died and she discovered that his company pension did not pay any survivor benefits. These are the poor—these and many others.

Since the late 1960s there has been a lower incidence of poverty, largely due to the major increases which have been made in income security programs—especially the programs of the federal government. These have included the tripling of family allowances, the introduction of the child tax credit, the complete overhaul of the unemployment insurance system, and the increases in our public pension programs for senior citizens. We must not forget that many wives, no matter what their ages, go out and work full-time or part-time to supplement the family income. This is also an important reason why some of the households are able to subsist.

I must tell honourable senators that, thanks to the committee, 800 copies of the poverty report were printed last year.

[Senator Croll.]

They have been distributed, and the impact of that report upon the people of Canada has been truly amazing.

Honourable senators, we shall have to move towards a guaranteed income gradually, over time, just as we have moved gradually and over time towards what already amounts to a guaranteed income for the elderly, through the continually improving old age security and guaranteed income supplement program. I believe that the proposals I shall describe constitute progress. It is realistic to expect that they can be accomplished over the next few years and that they will have the support of the great majority of Canadians.

The purpose of a guaranteed annual income plan is to establish a basic minimum income below which no family unit would be allowed to fall. The method most often proposed for providing guaranteed income payments is the negative income tax. Under a negative income tax system payments are made to families and to individuals whose income falls below some basic level. The level of benefit paid is related to the income of the beneficiary and to family size. Supplements decrease as income increases. At a specified level of income, supplements decline to zero. At the zero supplementation level, regular income taxes are paid. Eligibility for such a plan is determined through an income test related to the income tax system rather than to the social welfare system. A guaranteed income plan could either replace the existing income support programs or, alternatively, could be used in combination with existing programs.

Discussion about reform of the social security system inevitably engenders debate over the universality of some programs. As the Economic Council of Canada has pointed out:

for some Canadians, any breach of the principle of universality, especially in contributory schemes, would be ideologically unacceptable.

Honourable senators, I have taken some comfort in the fact that I was a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science which, in 1952, brought in the recommendations for universality. I think it has been a great boon to this country.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Hear, hear!

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, for those who experience it, is poverty a lasting or a temporary condition? What type of individual or household is more likely to endure either "permanent" or "transitory" poverty? What programs are more likely to be effective in meeting these needs? The answers to these questions have an important bearing on the direction of government policy. Short-term measures, such as income transfers, are adequate to relieve temporary distress. Long-term measures, which include structural changes in the labour market as well as investment in education, training and special services, are needed to address persistent poverty.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance said:

I dedicate myself and this government in this and succeeding years to maintaining a fundamental sense of fairness in our society.

I know that he meant those words, honourable senators; I know him well.

In that same speech, the Minister of Finance identified five areas of priority in terms of economic development policy, one of which was "human resources." The minister went on to say:

In this decade of development, we must work together to renew the foundation for the fair sharing of wealth and opportunity that binds us together as Canadians.

Honourable senators, I agree with those words, and I also agree that human resources ought to be a vital area of concern. At present, the human resource which is not receiving a fair share of wealth and opportunity—the human resource which is largely cut off from a "fundamental sense of fairness in our society"—is that segment of our population made up of the elderly. At one time, the poor were not outside of the middle-class experience. Our blindness to poverty has developed over a period of many years. Once upon a time, almost everyone had to pass through the miserable housing of the poor on their way to and from work, but now prosperous Canadians live either in the affluent suburbs or in new or restored downtown dwellings which have no place for the unskilled, the unemployed, the elderly or the disabled. The development of our cities has in itself done much to remove poverty from the emotional experience of millions of middle-class Canadians.

● (2130)

Perhaps the worst aspect of this invisibility is that it extends to politics. The dispossessed are the least able to speak for themselves, and they have no lobbies of their own. They do not belong to unions or political parties, so consequently they have no clout. They lack the social energy and political strength to transform their misery into a cause. They do not realize that they contribute that which each member of Parliament wants most in each constituency. They comprise eight, nine or ten per cent of the constituency's population. A couple of members of the House of Commons told me that as high as 16 per cent of the population of their ridings are aged.

The elderly continue their appeal for better treatment and more funds in the same fashion that their mothers and fathers did. They forget that they came into the world during the industrial age, they passed through the nuclear age and are now on the verge of the space age, yet they are still operating in the same manner they did years and years ago. They form clubs and associations and pass meaningful resolutions, which have both long-term and short-term purposes. In good faith, they pass them on to their representatives at all levels of government, and hope for the best. They also visit various members of Parliament and other public bodies to impress upon them their needs.

They try to do a good job of education, though their research is terribly poor. They do obtain the wholehearted support of their elected representatives, who actually promise them that they will do as much as they can—and they do. I have never met a member of Parliament who does not support them as best that he can.

In this day and age that is not enough. Not only has the world changed, but the method of how we live has changed, in the past 10 years, and political approaches have changed, too. The elderly need to undertake a twenty-first century approach. The difficulty is that they do not understand how Ottawa operates. They need guidance and imaginative leadership.

The battle today at all levels of government is for the "top dollar and priority." Everybody is reaching for that, and that is particularly true in Ottawa. Every member of Parliament is sympathetic and wants to help, but the ordinary member of Parliament faces many problems, such as tax problems, health problems, and problems of the environment, employment and inflation. It is true that the elderly and the poor have the largest number of lobbyists in Ottawa in the members of Parliament, but they need more than that. They need experts who can make the facts and research material available for the assistance of their members of Parliament. No one can replace their members of Parliament, but those members need assistance. No one can replace Stanley Knowles in this Parliament, or any Parliament. He directs most of his energy toward a single subject. We shall probably not see his like again, although he will be back in Parliament before very long. He is an example of what we need in Ottawa.

What I have reference to is that, in the past 10 years, the lobbyists themselves have made themselves felt in Ottawa. What they are doing is legal and accepted. It is accepted here now as it always was in Washington, although here in Ottawa they sometimes prefer to use the term "public relations man" rather than "lobbyist." A rose by any other name.

Unless you have one working for you, you are at a disadvantage in Ottawa. Every organization of any consequence has a lobbyist in Ottawa to influence and present its point of view. The lobbyists know their subjects. They are experts who provide research material, the odd drink, and they visit whom-ever they think can help them accomplish their purpose.

You might ask whom they represent, and I can tell you whom they represent. They represent labour, farming, business, the teaching community, the medical community, and the legal community as well as the accounting community. All large manufacturing firms are represented, as well as all the oil companies. There must be 100 lobbyists in Ottawa now. There are some who prefer to do their lobbying on their own. The best example I know of is Bulloch in the china shop. He has had some success in his own way.

Older people must learn to participate in the game by the new rules. They need a first class team of young, able and responsible representatives to lobby and work for them in Ottawa.

They first need an umbrella organization to cover the whole country, and then a topnotch director and a good staff. They need money to do this, and that is available. All they need do is ask every person receiving old age security to contribute one dollar a year to a fund, and, if they do, they will have more money for lobbying than anyone else in Ottawa. There are 2½ million of them, so if only half of them came across with the dollar contribution, they would have a lot of money and could afford the best possible representatives in Ottawa. In addition, those representatives could also work for the poor who are unable to finance themselves.

All they need is a responsible advertising agency. They can set up an organization and make it function efficiently. It is like falling off a log, it is so easy to get this organized. They can continue their drive to have a minister of aging, which is long overdue.

The veterans of Canada—and I agree that they are special to all of us—have a minister. There are 772,000 veterans living in this country, and they have always had that and have enjoyed the benefits flowing from that.

There are 2½ million elderly people, and I think it is about time a Department of Aging came about. I think it is long overdue. A hole in the corner for a director of aging is not becoming. As I say, they can really have clout if they know their resources, and learn how to use them.

For a long time now, I have been talking about the need to help the disadvantaged sector of Canadian society. I mean those who, for one legitimate reason or another, never seem to rise above the poverty level. Some of them, unfortunately, have lived a good part of their lives substantially below the poverty level.

Who are these people? I am thinking particularly of the elderly, especially women living alone. They are the truly disadvantaged ones, but if I single them out for mention, it is not to draw attention away from any other group. All of them need help to a greater or lesser degree.

For a long time while I and others spoke on this subject, no one seemed to be listening. I kept talking about the problem, but it did not seem to make any difference. The statistics on poverty grew and grew. Somehow they never declined. Let me tell you that in real terms the effects of that are incalculable. Right across this country, hundreds of thousands of Canadians are living permanently below the poverty level. That means they are not adequately housed; not adequately fed and not adequately clothed. They do not like their circumstances, but they are not there by choice. They are in this situation because they cannot help themselves. I say to you, earnestly, that we must help them.

● (2140)

There is a way we can do this. When I first spoke about this problem, few people seemed to be paying attention while others joined me. Perhaps some thought that I would dry up and go away. I and others kept talking about it for a while and some people in charge started saying that it was a good idea to look into the situation, but that they did not have enough money to do anything about it. I suppose one could call that progress of a sort. At least they have come half-way by accepting the concept. I now call to them to come the rest of the way with me.

I say that we do have the money, and we must make a start. It is a huge problem which we must start to tackle. The money I am talking about is not like tax money. The money I am talking about should not be dumped into general revenues and used only to pay bills—that is what taxes are for. The money I am talking about comes from the sale of a capital asset that is a non-renewable capital asset. When the oil and the gas that lie beneath the prairies is gone, they will be gone forever. Taxes are renewable every year. The oil and gas are not a heritage, a birthright, or a legacy. One day the income will stop. This money should not be treated like tax money because it is in a different category.

When I was a boy, fathers sent their sons out into the world with two pieces of advice: Don't back someone's note, and don't dip into capital. As far as I am concerned, the oil and gas monies are like capital. I do not say that we should not spend them; I say we should spend them wisely because they are only going to come around this way once.

The energy agreement concluded between the Government of Canada and the producing provinces was meant to demonstrate that these non-renewable resources belong to all Canadians, not just those fortunate enough to live in the producing provinces. The disadvantaged people of whom I speak are not confined to one area of the country; they are everywhere—in the "have" provinces and in the "have not" provinces.

I want to see some of the heritage money spent on those below the poverty level, wherever they are. This is not windfall money that happens once; it is money that is part of our heritage.

Where does the money come from? I have in my hand a booklet issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in which it is stated that, in the next five years, the Government of Canada will receive $54.3 billion, which is 25.5 per cent of the total; the Government of Alberta will receive $64.3 billion, which is 30.2 per cent of the total; and industry will receive $94.2 billion, which is 44.3 per cent of the total.

I was a member of the House of Commons when a very famous Canadian asked, "Well, what's a million?" He never did live it down. Now a less famous Canadian is saying, "what's a billion?" Do you know what a billion is? A billion is one thousand million, and a million is a thousand thousands. That's a lot of money. The government wants to use that $54 billion to pay its debts.

I do not disagree with that objective, but one of the debts I want to see paid is the debt we owe our old people in this country. Canada has a debt to them, and it is a major obligation that has been outstanding for a long time. Now is the time to make payment on that debt. It is just as important and just as pressing as the government's other obligations. As a matter of fact, it is more pressing. The government's ordinary creditors can wait for a while; our old people are not ordinary creditors and they cannot wait. Unfortunately, some of them will not be here next month or next year. They need our help and they need it now.

I cannot accept that, with the billions of new revenue dollars that it has, the government cannot lend a hand to raise needy people over the poverty line. I do not ask the government to go it alone. Some of the heritage has descended upon the oil-producing provinces, and I look for them to do their share. It appears that there will be more oil-producing provinces in due course, perhaps Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

I would draw to your attention, honourable senators, the fact that the Province of Alberta has offered additional assistance to its old people. Ontario, Saskatchewan, and the other provinces have not done so. The Heritage Fund of Alberta stands at about $10 billion. Assuming a rate of return on investment of 15 per cent, it will produce an annual revenue of $1.5 billion. Keep that amount in mind. There are approximately 211,000 people in Alberta living below the poverty line. To bring them up to the poverty line would cost about $1.5 million. The percentage of expenditure of investment revenue would amount to one-tenth of one per cent. If those figures do not shake you, they ought to. One-tenth of one per cent could bring everyone in Alberta above the poverty level.

In the case of Saskatchewan, the assets to be invested would be $1 billion. A return on investment of 15 per cent would produce revenue of $150 million. In order to bring those in that province who require assistance up to the poverty line, the percentage of expenditure of investment revenue would be seven-tenths of one per cent. When I received those figures, I had to peruse them very carefully. I just did not believe them.

So far as the federal government is concerned, we are not asking for capital. The government has $5 billion to invest, or do with as they like. They can use the interest on that to bring the elderly and the poor up to a decent standard of living without doing anybody any harm at all. Please keep those amounts in mind.

● (2150)

I say to the Government of Canada, and to the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, that there is no valid reason for failing to meet this obligation. These revenues must be used for socially desirable objectives, and there is no more desirable objective than to lift our own people out of this long period of poverty. What government can possibly begrudge using a tiny fraction of the interest on a heritage fund for this good purpose? I say to them, and I say to you, honourable senators, that the need is great and the time is now. I also point out that the Province of Alberta is not using their money for general revenue, but is keeping it in the fund. All I am saying to them is that they should keep it there, but use the interest to meet these social needs. To the federal government I say, "Keep the money, the elderly are not laying claim to any of it—although they were impressed by the words of the minister to the effect that they would be treated fairly—but use the interest."

We are all agreed that older people in an affluent society ought to be assured of a decent stipend, paid out of the heritage or birthright. We have a lien on that money, legally and morally. The money does not all belong to our children; some of it belongs to us. We want it while we can use it and our time is running out. We are not asking our children for additional money. We are asking for our share now, while we are still breathing. We will let them decide what our share should be, but a share we should have.

We who are already old, need not agree with Browning's comment on old age that "the best is yet to be." If we cannot ensure that they are the best of years, we can at the very least ensure, by the decency of what we do here, that those years are lived with dignity and freedom from want. All we have to do is use this "found" money, which is part of our birthright, from the energy pricing agreement, to relieve the bitter years of people who have gone without for too long.

The various heritage funds—and there will be more in this country, as I have indicated—can, by assigning only a tiny portion of their enormous incomes, relieve the burden of the poor and wage a real war on poverty. In this connection, it is time to end the phoney war.

The Minister of Finance said that he wants to deal in fairness and equity. That is all we ask.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell is not here. I think, since he is the chairman of the committee that made the report, I should adjourn the debate in his name, and leave it to him.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Tuesday, March 2, 1982

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Eleventh Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 16)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee wishes to record certain long-outstanding undertakings of Ministers and heads of agencies in response to your Committee's objections to statutory instruments. It also wishes to note those instances in which Ministers have failed to answer correspondence on statutory instruments.

2. When your Committee objects to or questions some provision in a statutory instrument it takes the matter up through its counsel with the Designated Instruments Officer for the Department or Agency responsible for the instrument. That Officer's response, whether by way of explanation, clarification, justification or promise of remedial action, may satisfy the Committee. If it does not, and further attempts to press the Committee's point with the Designated Instruments Officer are fruitless, or if the promised action is not taken within a reasonable time, the Joint Chairmen and the Vice Chairman take the matter up with the responsible Minister or with the head of the relevant agency. Your Committee may, after hearing, or hearing from, the Minister or the head of the agency, be satisfied. If it is not, and the Minister or the head of the agency declines to take action, your Committee reports the statutory instrument to both Houses. Often, however, Ministers or heads of agencies undertake to take some remedial action, whether by amending or revoking objectionable provisions, or by introducing statutory changes. This has been your Committee's manner of proceeding in this Parliament. Previous Committees did not include reference of outstanding objections to Ministers as part of a settled routine.

3. Your Committee monitors all undertakings received and has decided to draw to the special attention of the Houses in Schedule I those instances in which undertakings are long outstanding, recording also for fairness and comparison in Schedule III the outcome of all matters raised with Ministers and heads of agencies by the Committee to date.

4. Your Committee also wishes to record in Schedule II instances of ministerial failure to respond to correspondence from the Joint Chairmen and the Vice Chairman within a reasonable time.

5. Schedules I, II and III reflect the position on the adoption of this Report by your Committee on 25th February 1982.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN M. GODFREY,
Joint Chairman.

1980	SENATE COMMITTEE LINES	STATISTICS CANADA LINES
Unattached individuals	40.2% (1,058,000 persons)	31.4% (826,000 persons)
Families of two or more persons	21.9% (1,340,000 families)	10.4% (639,000 families)
 1979
Unattached individuals	40.5% (1,017,000)	34.3% (861,000 persons)
Families of two or more	23% (1,383,000)	11.9% (720,000 families)

SENATE REPORT: Poverty level set at approximately 50% of average Canadian family income adjusted to family size, making provision for inflation and gross national product. For families of sizes 2, 3, and 4, the Poverty Lines are almost exactly half of the average income for families of those sizes.

STATISTICS CANADA: Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence.

According to Statistics Canada figures the lowest 20% of families (lowest income quintile) received only about 6% of the total income of families. By way of contrast, the highest 20% of families (highest income quintile) received about 43% of total family income, or about 7 times as much as the lowest quintile.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY ..

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

In view of the British government's decision to reduce the price of crude oil by $4 per barrel, can the minister inform us what impact this decision is expected to have on the Canadian government's energy policy, the agreement with Alberta and perhaps also on the Alsands project?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is a little early to assess what my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, or both, has described—

Senator Flynn: That is quite a combination.

Senator Olson: Yes—as the consequences of the decision by the British authorities to reduce the price of North Sea crude by $4 a barrel. It was, of course, the position of the government that when the national energy agreement was put into place there was a price schedule attached to that agreement that was in large part related to a projection of price increases that the world economy or world oil market is not following at the moment.

We realize, of course, that since September 1 there have been a number of price reductions announced by several major exporters. Even more important, I suppose, there has been a changed pattern, in that spot oil prices have been below contracted prices—at least, I think, in most recent times. That is a changed pattern from the situation that was in effect prior to the signing of the September 1 agreement.

I am sure that the governments of the producing provinces and the federal government will make an assessment of this significantly changed world situation, particularly as it applies to the pricing schedule that was included in that agreement.

When I have more positive—or perhaps that is not the right word—firm assessments of the projections, I will advise the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask questions on the general topic introduced by my leader. I ask the honourable minister if he can tell the Senate the changes that have been made in the heavy oil pricing arrangement that has existed heretofore in western Canada. I understand there has been some change in government policy regarding the pricing of heavy oil, which is quite significant. Can he tell the house what those changes are, and to whom they apply?

● (1410)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to provide that information in more detail. I am sorry that I did not have it with me today. At this point in time I suppose that what I know about the matter is essentially the same as the honourable senator's knowledge, he having read something about it in the press. However, I will try to provide him with a complete description of the change in the pricing schedule, and will also provide a reply to the other part of his question.

Senator Roblin: According to the report that I have on the matter, the average price for heavy oil, now $21.24 per barrel, would be increased to $35.02 per barrel, which is a very significant change. Would the minister care to comment on the reason for that?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe it would be more accurate if I were to provide a more detailed report. I agree that it is a significant change, although it applies, of course, to some fields where heavy oil is produced and, indeed, was going into the stream at the so-called conventional price. I am not sure whether "conventional price" is the right term, but a fairly significant portion of the so-called heavy oil and the upgraded oil were under a different pricing regime related to the Syncrude price and the amended price to Suncor, for example; but, obviously, it is a wider base for the new price than was in effect prior to the making of the announcement.

Senator Roblin: In view of this very significant change in government policy with respect to pricing, can the minister tell me whether it applies to the heavy oil developments which are commonly referred to as the Cold Lake project?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will find that out. If my memory serves me correctly, I believe that a price even higher than $35 was offered to the Cold Lake project a long time ago. As a matter of fact, I believe that $38 plus escalation was offered in that enhanced recovery situation in early October 1980.

Senator Roblin: That may well be true, but in view of the significant rise of around 50 per cent, if not more, in respect of other heavy oil projects, the Cold Lake project obviously has to be considered in this context.

ALSANDS PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would proceed further by asking the minister to give us a statement on the government's policy with respect to Alsands at the present time. According to the latest information we have received, the final offer was made for Alsands some time in January. Obviously, that did not entice anyone to go ahead. In fact, it seems to have persuaded about half of those companies originally in it to opt out. I have asked the minister on a number of occasions whether there is any intention on the part of the government to change its formula in connection with Alsands so that it will become commercially attractive.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I know that further discussions are going on which have been announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Energy for Alberta. I believe that a meeting between those two ministers will be held in Winnipeg tomorrow. I do not believe that it relates directly to the pricing schedule to which the honourable senator referred, because I believe that the total price of Alsands oil was indeed substantially higher than the $35 per barrel he mentioned.

Senator Roblin: Can the minister tell me whether any consideration has been given to a special interest price regime with respect to Alsands?

Senator Olson: Not that I know of. If the honourable senator is talking about the interest on the capital investment, no consideration, that I know of, has been given to any special interest on that capital requirement.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if the minister tells me that there is no special arrangement in view with respect to interest rates on the Alsands project, can he explain to me the policy of the government with respect to interest rates on energy projects in the Soviet Union? We have learned that although no deal has apparently yet been consummated, it is the policy of the government to provide subsidized interest rates for the export of Canadian techniques and materials that benefit energy self-sufficiency within the Soviet Union. A 10 per cent rate of interest, or something of the sort, is available for sales to that country, as against a commercial rate of some 16 per cent, and perhaps higher.

● (1415)

If it is considered advisable to support exports to the Soviet Union, and thus energy self-sufficiency in that country, by means of a subsidized interest rate, why does the government not take a more constructive attitude towards the problems of self-sufficiency within Canada, with particular reference to the Alsands project? Where is the rationale for cheap money for the Russians but no cheap money for Canadians?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we have just had another typical example of the kind of convoluted reasoning that goes on in the mind of my honourable friend. It is too bad he does not tell the rest of the story. I do not blame him, because usually you produce arguments, including in them the pieces you want in and either advertently or inadvertently leaving out others.

The fact of the matter is that there is no outstanding offer for the gas line project in the Soviet Union. There was one until December 31, 1981. I told Senator Roblin then that it is not the practice of the Export Development Corporation to reveal the details of offers made by them in competition with other countries.

There is another even more important factor that my honourable friend, I am sure, in fairness wants to take into account, and that is that the total amount of the offers made by the Export Development Corporation to meet the competition respecting concessional financing in the world applies only to Canadian content, and is therefore 100 per cent applicable to Canadians and to the creation of jobs in Canada.

Senator Roblin: Well, when it comes to leaving out and putting in with respect to questions and answers, my honourable friend need take lessons from nobody, because he is very adept at doing that himself. I suggest to him that it is just as satisfactory to Canadians to create jobs in Canada for Canadians on Alsands, which is regarded by the Economic Council of Canada as being among the mega-projects on which our immediate economic future largely hinges. Canadians would be just as happy to have those jobs as the ones my honourable friend refers to with respect to our exports.

The point is that he is willing to subsidize jobs that are involved with the export trade, but turns a blind eye to the advantages of dealing more equitably with the people in Canada.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: What is your question?

Senator Roblin: My question to my honourable friend is—and I always get around to the question; I always have a question in the end—

Senator McIlraith: Why don't you consult the rules before you ask a question?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to deal with the rules, I am prepared to listen to him, because he is a man whose opinions I respect.

What I want to know is why my honourable friend is not prepared to tell the house—and I am not asking him to give away any secrets—that he is prepared to negotiate from his so-called final position on the Alsands financing project in order to arrive at a position today which would be viable under the present conditions of price referred to by my friend the Leader of the Opposition. Why does the minister persist in stonewalling on that point?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows just as well as I do, in making his selective assertions, that the Export Development Corporation was set up, and is set up, for the purpose of financing export sales.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend not set up for the purpose of getting self-sufficiency in oil in Canada? Is my honourable friend not the main actor in the Alsands negotiations? Of course he is. To say that the Export Development Corporation has another function does not absolve him from having the responsibility for the other matter. Yet he will not tell this house, in spite of repeated questioning, that he intends to do something to make this project successful.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understand the convolutions of these arguments, but if my friend insists on, or persists in, mixing apples and oranges, that is his responsibility; but it does not make any sense.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You do that yourself, and very well.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: I will ask my honourable friend about the oranges if he does not like the apples. What is he going to do about the Alsands situation in Canada today?

Senator Olson: The Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta, both of which are directly involved, are having further meetings with the partners of the consortium for the purpose of exploring where they can and ought to move in compliance with the agreement that was signed between the two governments. Although my friend can ask what has gone on at these meetings, quite obviously he is not going to get an answer from me, because I was not there. When an announcement is prepared—whether an agreement is reached or there is failure to reach an agreement—I will make sure that my honourable friend is one of the first to know.

Senator Roblin: Well, I submit that my honourable friend is preparing the ground for retreat. He has made it perfectly clear to us on previous occasions that he was standing by the agreement reached in January with respect to Alsands. Everybody knows that in present circumstances he will not be able to hold that ground if he intends to make any progress. Why doesn't he come clean?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, now it is a matter of "coming clean." I will say, though my honourable friend seems to disregard this, that I respect the fact that if negotiations are to be genuine amongst all of the people who are directly involved—the ministers and the partners of the consortium I mentioned a few minutes ago—we really ought not to be discussing these details across the floor of this chamber or any other place. They should be discussed only in a meeting where the principals are in attendance. It seems to me that that is so obvious and simple that even my honourable friend should be able to understand it.

Senator Roblin: Of course your honourable friend understands it, and he does not disagree with it. I am not suggesting that the minister should negotiate with me or with anyone else across the floor of this chamber with respect to these matters.

Senator Olson: You are asking for details.

Senator Roblin: I am asking for a statement of policy, and that I have not got.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Neither have they!

Senator Olson: My friend obviously cannot read his mail very closely, because if he did he would know the terms and conditions of the agreement signed between the governments of Canada and Alberta with respect to the negotiating position with consortia such as Alsands. My honourable friend knows very well that the two governments have agreed to move concurrently with respect to any changes that may, indeed, make the whole deal more attractive to the private sector investors that are involved.

Senator Roblin: I can extract one crumb of comfort from these convoluted and partial statements made by the minister. I take it from what he has said to me that he is prepared to alter the final deal that he has offered to Alsands, and that we may expect to see some changes with respect to that project.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can take that crumb if he wants to.

Hon. R. James Balfour: That is all he can get from it.

Senator Olson: I think, however, that my honourable friend has to understand this issue on a higher level. If the two ministers have agreed to attend a meeting to discuss what can be done in order to get this important project under way, they are prepared to do exactly that, which involves discussing all of the factors that are involved, along with the concerns of the consortium which would be expected to finance, build and operate such a project. All of these things together constitute genuine negotiation, something that this government has done for a long time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear!

LEGISLATION

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT BILLS IN SENATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. C. William Doody: Sock it to him, Peter!

Senator Bosa: I am going to try. Since the other place appears to be paralyzed, I wonder whether the leader would consider discussing with his colleagues the possibility of introducing government legislation in this chamber so that the country can get on with its business.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Mind your own business!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Legislation is our business.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the preparedness of the Senate to initiate certain bills has already been made known to my colleagues in the cabinet.

Senator Flynn: Instead of making pious utterances, bring some bills in.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps this is an opportunity for the Senate to do just that.

Senator Flynn: What are you prepared to do today?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Nothing.

Senator Flynn: You are only bringing in hot air, provoked by Senator Bosa.

Senator Perrault: I felt that I spoke on behalf of all honourable senators when I suggested that the Senate is prepared to assist in the parliamentary process to the best of its capacity and ability. I know that this view is held by the Leader of the Opposition, and I hope that he does not misunderstand what I have said.

● (1425)

Senator Flynn: It is not that I misunderstand, but that you are not minding your own business.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I fail to understand how the Leader of the Opposition can take umbrage at what I have said. I said that I have made known to my cabinet colleagues the willingness and the preparedness of the Senate to initiate various government measures, should this process be made possible.

Senator Flynn: The question is as to when you did that. It should have been done four weeks ago, because we have been doing nothing since we returned at the beginning of February. We have produced nothing but hot air and empty words.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition may have been doing little beyond orating from time to time, but many honourable senators have been occupied working very diligently on behalf of this country. I want to remind the Leader of the Opposition that the willingness of the Senate to initiate bills and to be of any help to this parliamentary process has been reiterated time and time again by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Flynn: Without results.

Senator Perrault: And I hope he did the same thing when he served for that mercifully brief period under Mr. Clark.

Senator Flynn: But it has all been without results. How many bills have been obtained from the government to be initiated in this chamber?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: On a point of order—

Senator Flynn: Senator McIlraith, if you want to raise a point of order, then stand up and raise it.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am very glad to stand up and raise my point of order.

Senator Flynn: Then go ahead.

Senator McIlraith: I hope that the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate will listen to me as I make it. We are now on Question Period, which is the period that permits honourable senators to obtain information from ministers here and, to a certain extent, from chairmen of committees.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator McIlraith: But subject to that qualification, "from ministers," that presupposes asking questions and getting answers.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: Is that the point?

Senator McIlraith: The Leader of the Opposition did not avail himself of this opportunity. He went on to debate—well, that is on the record and I leave it to honourable senators to assess—with the Leader of the Government in the Senate some private views he holds. This, of course, is not the purpose of Question Period.

I hope that we can get to a situation soon where Question Period, which is so valuable and important to our parliamentary system, is used by honourable senators for the purpose of obtaining all the information possible from government ministers, rather than to make speeches and to debate other matters. I feel very strongly on the subject, and I believe that I am raising a legitimate point of order because the rules have been abused today.

Senator Flynn: By whom?

Senator McIlraith: I do not wish to name honourable senators, but I will if the Senate wishes me to.

Senator Flynn: Make your point clear. Are you referring to me or to the Leader of the Government?

Senator McIlraith: I am referring to you, your desk-mate and to parts of an answer given to a question.

Senator Flynn: That's fine.

Senator McIlraith: I want to make that very clear.

Senator Flynn: Well, please make it clear.

Senator McIlraith: I am confining myself specifically to the point of order because I believe the right to have a good Question Period and to ask questions of and receive answers from ministers, in particular, is a very important right of all parliamentarians, and I do not wish to see it abused.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on the point of order, I would draw to the attention of Senator McIlraith the fact that this matter was raised by Senator Bosa and subsequently abused by the Leader of the Government. Senator McIlraith should have the courage occasionally to raise a point of order when his leader, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, is abusing the rules—

Senator Perrault: Absolute nonsense.

Senator Flynn: —by not answering questions and dealing with matters that are not relevant to the Senate. If the honourable senator has the courage to state that what I have said is so, then I will accept his point of order.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I hope I made it clear that the rules pertaining to Question Period apply equally to those who answer questions, whether they be ministers or chairmen of committees, and those asking questions.

Senator Flynn: You should have said that before; you simply referred to me. If you had said that it applied also to the Leader of the Government, then I would have accepted your point of order.

Senator McIlraith: I accepted your invitation to raise the point of order.

Senator Flynn: But you did not point out that it concerns both sides.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, at this stage I would like to—Senator Flynn: Stand up!

An Hon. Senator: Cheap, cheap!

Senator Robichaud:—raise a point of order. And I can tell the honourable senator that I am standing up. I will stand up at any time against the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, especially when he behaves in such an infantile manner as he did this afternoon.

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: We were on an equal footing at that time.

Senator Robichaud: I agree with my colleague, Senator McIlraith. It is obvious that something has gone wrong in the other place and we know who is culpable.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Trudeau.

Senator Robichaud: We are not going to discuss the situation in the other place this afternoon. Let us not behave childishly.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Make your point.

Senator Robichaud: Let us not behave as others are behaving in the other place; let us conduct ourselves as honourable senators.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator McIlraith. I agree with what he says is the object of Question Period. I have been on the receiving and the giving end of a Question Period for many years. My experience has been that Question Period gets along best when both sides do as is suggested by Senator McIlraith, and that is when questions are asked in accordance with the rules and answers are given briefly and in accordance with the rules. If we follow that practice, we may reach the very desirable objective that the honourable senator raises.

He and I may have to be very active in pressing this point often to ensure that the question is posed and the response is given in the manner my colleague suggests. I will gladly follow my colleague's advice when I am faced with both situations, and I hope he will join me when I raise the point with reference to some of the answers.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Would he be kind enough to tell us now—or take the question as notice—the number of bills that have been introduced in this chamber since we resumed after the Christmas recess? I am speaking of those bills, private or public, presented in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yes.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: As a supplementary question, I would point out that people have been referring to legislation, and yet some of the most important work the Senate performs is done in its committees.

My question is: In view of the paralysis in the other place, should we not jump into the breach and have our committees take over some matters? As an example, the Minister of Finance said that he was prepared to refer to a parliamentary committee—he did not say a House of Commons committee—rules relating to corporate re-organization, taxation of whole life insurance, charitable foundations, retirement allowances and work in progress. These are five areas the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is well qualified to study.

I do not agree with Senator McIlraith that the sole purpose of asking questions in the Senate is to elicit information. Ninety per cent of the questions I ask are for the purpose of getting some action.

Senator Donahoe: It should be 100 per cent.

Senator Flynn: No reply.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a very brief question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Some weeks ago I raised some questions concerning the freedom of information bill. The staff of the Leader of the Government is, no doubt, busily working on an answer for him.

I read, albeit late, an article that appeared in the November-December issue of Canadian Lawyer wherein the Solicitor General dismissed concerns about limitations on the privacy of Canadians by citing this new proposed bill that would save private citizens from, for example, letter-opening and dossiers being kept on them.

My question, which I am sure the Leader of the Government would prefer to take as notice, is: As it becomes clear that the government intends either to abandon its Throne Speech commitment respecting freedom of information legislation or, as the leader proposed last time, to wait for provincial Liberal attorneys general to surface on the scene, would the leader indicate if the government will justify the faith of the Solicitor General in that some protection for citizens will be provided by introducing other legislation, not covering the whole realm of freedom of information and privacy, but just particular legislation to protect personal privacy?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the statement that I mentioned earlier, which I said I would attempt to bring to the Senate, has not yet been completed. However, the additional question posed by Senator Nurgitz shall be forwarded to the appropriate sources and perhaps a reply to this question can be included in the main reply.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC—JOB CREATION—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government. Last Monday, ministers of the federal government and ministers of the Government of Quebec met to discuss the latter's proposal to earmark $300 million for saving small- and medium-sized businesses. The Quebec government's request was not exaggerated, considering the unemployment rate of close to 14 per cent in Quebec. As a matter of fact, the province must inject substantial amounts of money into the economy if it is to put small- and medium-sized businesses back on the track. However, Mr. Lalonde stated that in the future, the federal government will spend its money and the provinces will spend theirs. Could the Leader of the Government tell us what fundamental reason the federal government had to refuse to agree with the proposal put forward by the Quebec government to create a three hundred million dollar fund in order to help small- and medium-sized businesses? Could the Leader of the Government inform us whether this refusal is final? And could he inform us whether the minister may have meant that the parties had agreed on a mechanism for consultation instead of earmarking funds? Is this the beginning of the end of co-operative federalism as announced last week by Prime Minister Trudeau?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the other place yesterday and, in reply, the Honourable Charles Lapointe said:

We did not refuse to collaborate with Quebec... we indicated to our Quebec counterparts that a firm proposal had been made by our Minister of Employment and Immigration to create jobs in Quebec in the near future. However, the Quebec ministers preferred to play petty politics by leaving the meeting and announcing that we refused to help small businesses in Quebec. However, at the present time, our programs are able to help more than 7,000 Quebec businesses... We asked whether we could fit our programs in with the Quebec programs so that Quebec entrepreneurs and Quebec businessmen and women would be able to make use of our programs sooner and in greater numbers and more federal funds could be put to work in Quebec's economy.

Perhaps our colleague, Senator Olson, may wish to amplify on the statement by Mr. Lapointe or add information which may be available to him.

On the general question of co-operative federalism, the Government of Canada is co-operating in a very real way with the people of Canada in every province, district and region.

The Prime Minister has made it abundantly plain that, in some cases where generous federal aid is directed to certain provinces, efforts are made to denigrate the federal effort and to prevent the citizens of that province from gaining full knowledge of the federal contribution. Those days are over, but not the generosity of the federal government toward the provinces.

For example, the New Democratic Party in the province of Saskatchewan is condemning the Government of Canada for suggesting that there should be a new look at the Crow rate. I would yield on this point to Senator Argue, should he wish to add further remarks.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You had better not.

Senator Perrault: This year alone the federal government is investing over $600 million to assist grain farmers of the province of Saskatchewan and, so far, the New Democratic government of that province has invested mostly oratorical assistance to the farmers. I would welcome a statement by Senator Argue on this point.

Hon. G. I. Smith: On a point of order; how does the Leader of the Government justify the immediately-recent, lengthy and vigorous oration regarding the rule that requires brief answers to questions?

● (1440)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I was asked a question on the important matter of co-operative federalism. I was challenged on that point by the Honourable Senator Asselin, and I find it rather strange that he has not objected to the reply which I have given, but that the Honourable Senator Smith, who is not interested in the question, is objecting.

Senator Smith: I am very interested in the question. The memory of the Leader of the Government may be good enough to recall that one of the honourable senators opposite and I engaged in some discussion on this point of order just a few minutes ago. At the very first opportunity the Leader of the Government has to demonstrate that he agrees with that point of order, and indicate that he will follow it, he abuses it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if I have offended the delicate sensibilities of the Honourable Senator Smith, I apologize.

I can assure honourable senators that this question of provincial and federal relations is an important question, so important that perhaps we should have a debate on the subject.

I cited just one example of what took place in the province of Saskatchewan, where the government was unfairly attacked by a provincial government that knows better.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I just want to say that it was not my sensibilities that were offended by the action and conduct of the Leader of the Government a moment ago; it was the sensibilities of this house and the rules of this house, and parliamentary rules generally, that were offended, as well as the sensibilities of honourable senators opposite who are equally interested in following the rules of order as I.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government, to obtain further details. Could the Leader of the Government confirm that at a press conference last week, the Prime Minister of Canada stated in more or less these terms that, from now on, co-operative federalism was out. When he was in Quebec City, Mr. Lalonde added the following: In the future, we are going to spend our money and the provinces are going to spend theirs. What does this mean? If federal co-operation is finished, could the Leader of the Government inform us what kind of federalism we can expect in the future, since Canadian federalism is based on consultation and co-operation between the central government and the provinces?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice and a full statement will be brought to the Senate so that no one can dispute this point. The days when the provincial governments are not responsive to federal initiatives and fail to credit federal initiatives are over.

The Honourable Senator Asselin comes from a province which has been the recipient of vast amounts of aid, approved by Parliament but initiated by this government. I wonder whether the honourable senator is suggesting that proper credit has been given to those who serve in Parliament for the type of federal aid extended to his province.

THE SENATE

RULES—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the minister in charge of—what is it?—regional, industrial or economic development in the country—anyway, it is to Senator Olson, but with your permission, Monsieur le Président, perhaps I could make one suggestion before I ask the question. The suggestion was sponsored by Senator Frith.

On another occasion when we were proceeding merrily along, strictly in accordance with the rules of the Senate, he did not have the courage to make a motion to accomplish his end, but rose and said that it was his desire to suggest that some senator less conspicuous, some senator less accountable, should make a motion.

With respect to the discussion that has been going on about the rules of the Senate, I have a suggestion. I think the rules of the Senate should be amended; I think the rule should be amended to the effect that the lower the person to whom the question is addressed is cut, the longer he shall have to reply.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. Did I understand Senator Donahoe to say that he has some doubts about my courage, because if he did, perhaps we can find a way of assuring him that I do not think anything I have done in this house was done out of lack of courage. I hope that he did not mean to imply that.

Senator Donahoe: Until the day on which he rose and asked somebody else to do his dirty work for him, I had no thought that there was any question of the honourable senator's courage, and I have none now, because—

Senator Frith: Here we go with another illustration as to why occasionally it is not valuable to have introductory statements to questions, although sometimes it may be.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You have had experience with that yourself.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just on the question of my motivation for not making a motion with respect to the subject of Senate reform, I thought I made it clear that when I raised the question of Senate reform, I was raising it on a personal basis.

I was then, I thought, guided by honourable senators on both sides of the house indicating: Look, I don't think you can hold the position you hold and create the impression that you are not speaking for the government. That is why I said that I ought not to move that motion. It was not through a lack of courage, but simply on the basis—pointed out to me by my colleagues on both sides of the house—that it would not be proper for me to do so unless I were speaking for the government.

I hope that that is clear. Probably, I have not changed Senator Donahoe's mind. He thinks I am getting somebody else to do "dirty work", but I do not consider Senate reform to be dirty work. The only reason that I did not move the motion myself was because of the fact that I was told that if I did I would be creating the impression that I was doing it on behalf of the government. That is the reason and the only reason, and I thought everyone had understood that that was the right and proper thing to do. I am surprised to be accused of a lack of courage or of getting somebody to do dirty work.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, when I rose and made my suggestion, it was only incidental to asking a question. I had no intention of provoking a debate. I can only say to the honourable senator who has just spoken that in this house we have had the example of a deputy leader rising to his feet and taking exactly the same attitude that was taken by Senator Frith. In other words, he said, "I am about to propose a motion, but I want it clearly understood that any motion that I make is not to be considered as a motion from the opposition or from the Conservative Party." Having said that, notwithstanding the fact that he is the deputy leader of his group in the Senate, I am sure you will recall, Monsieur le Président, that he did, in fact, follow that by the very gesture about which he had spoken—that is, of making a motion. I was struck by the obvious differences between the two leaders in this house, both of whom rose, said the same thing, and then acted in an entirely opposite manner. That is all I wanted to say.

Senator Smith: Deputy leaders.

Senator Donahoe: Deputy leaders, I beg your pardon. Thank you for the correction. It was the deputy leaders who made comparable statements respecting two motions, the substance of each of which was almost the same, yet both behaved in a diametrically opposite manner.

That is exactly what happened, and anything I may have said is related to what I observed with my own eyes and listened to with my own ears.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

REDUCTION IN SIZE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, notwithstanding the Auditor General's assertion that the public service is operating at only 60 per cent efficiency, and the commitment made in 1980 by the President of the Treasury Board that he would take steps to reduce the size of the public service, has the government abandoned that commitment, and why does it continue to expand in the face of the Auditor General's views as expressed on inefficiency?

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there are some statements in that question that are not factual. One is that there has been a rise in the total complement of the public service. That is simply not true. I believe that since 1976 the growth in the public service has been something less than 2 per cent over the whole period of time.

It is very difficult to answer questions when the preamble or the premise is based on absolutely false information. I am sorry to say that, but that happens to be what we are presented with today.

An Hon. Senator: Did you say "false"?

Senator Olson: Yes; the preamble to that question is absolutely false. I do not know how else I can answer.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I am highly entertained by the answer to my question, and I am moved to make one statement and to ask one further question. The statement I made was the result of what was positively and definitely stated in the estimates of this country. The estimates are produced by the people who run this country; they are the product of the government of this country; and they are brought forward and placed on the table before those who are elected to represent the constituents of this country. One would think, at the very least, that one could give credence to what the government puts forward as its view. In those estimates it is stated that there is to be a net increase of 2,152 person-years in the public service.

My question is: Can we believe what is in the estimates, or should we ignore it?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, you should believe it.

Hon. G. I. Smith: How can we believe you?

TRANSPORT

MAINLAND-NEWFOUNDLAND FERRY SERVICE—SUBSIDIZATION OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government—and may I be forgiven for giving a short preamble? My question can be taken as notice as I do not expect to have the answer today.

As the Leader of the Government is probably aware, for years we have been combatting the subsidizing of shipping from the mainland of Canada to the Province of Newfoundland—that is, the subsidizing of private corporations which, in turn, are competing with CN Marine, which is a crown corporation. As a result, goods are being shipped directly from Montreal to Newfoundland and from Halifax to Newfoundland and are not going through the Port of North Sydney where the trans-Canada highway ends. The goods are supposed to continue by ship to Newfoundland. As a result, many, many people have been laid off—stevedores and CN Marine crewmen.

The chairman of the Manpower Adjustment Committee for CN Marine in the town of North Sydney—it is a combined labour-government organization—Mr. Guy LaFosse, met recently with the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin. Mr. LaFosse announced to all and sundry that the minister stated that:

he will propose to cabinet that all federal subsidies to private shipping companies be terminated so that the federal government would be subsidizing only the Gulf ferry service.

Could the Leader of the Government ascertain whether that minister has made that representation to cabinet, and, if so, how soon it will be acted upon. If it is acted upon, more goods will go through the Port of North Sydney, thus creating more employment, and this is better than subsidizing a private company such as the Leader of the Government and I might set up, for example, and, finding out that it cannot operate profitably, look to the government for handouts in order to continue operating.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND AND U.S.S.R.—SANCTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Roblin on February 24 concerning the government's policy with respect to the export of high technology items to Poland and the Soviet Union.

The government does not have a policy with respect to the export of high technology items to those countries. However, the government does have a policy to ensure, along with our allies, that strategic goods are not sold to East Bloc countries, such as Poland and the Soviet Union. Consequently, there are security controls that apply to the export of such goods.

A further question was asked by Senator Roblin on February 24 as to "whether it is the policy of the government to abstain from extending new commercial credits to the Soviet Union."

Honourable senators, the short answer is no. The government is not at present considering any further sanctions against the U.S.S.R. beyond those outlined in the chamber on February 23.

COSTA RICA—ELECTION RESULTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Stollery on February 23 concerning whether or not the newly elected Costa Rican government supports the holding of next month's election in El Salvador.

The newly elected National Liberation Party government of Costa Rica, led by President Luis Alberto Monge, does, indeed, support the holding of next month's election in El Salvador.

However, although it has been recently elected, the new Costa Rican government does not take office until May 8, after the election in El Salvador.

LABOUR ADJUSTMENT BENEFITS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for the second reading of Bill C-78, to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, Bill C-78, which Senator Neiman presented so well yesterday, is really one that was presented in the other place back in 1981 and which, because of a ruling by Madam Speaker, had to be resubmitted in its true guise, namely, that of a bill of supply.

I note that the amount mentioned in Senator Neiman's remarks yesterday was something in the order of $350 million, but it is my understanding that this bill represents a small portion of that total sum, perhaps somewhere in the order of $7.5 million to $10 million. I do not believe that anyone can really be sure as to what the total amount will be because no one really knows how many people will be laid off and in need of assistance. Therefore, it is a relatively small supply bill and also a small bill in terms of the number of Canadians who at this time desperately need help, those who are out of work or who are laid off and who have no hope of being re-employed in the immediate or foreseeable future. So, when Senator Neiman mentioned that the bill should not be considered as a panacea, one could regard it as one of the understatements of the year.

The bill really should not be considered in terms of the employment or unemployment situation in this country. As a matter of fact, its title—An Act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code—is a little misleading because of the specifics or the qualifying factors of the bill which are really limited to a comparatively small number of people. My understanding is that it applies to perhaps 500, 600, 700 or 800 persons. The bill may be applicable to more than that number because another commission is being set up to examine the credentials of those who, under the provisions of the bill, may qualify for help. So it is another level of bureaucracy for people to try to beat their way through in an attempt to obtain assistance in these horrendous times. I believe that is unfortunate.

It appears to me, from reading the bill, that it could be discriminatory. I do not know how the terms and conditions in the bill with regard to qualifiers for assistance is consistent with the new Charter of Rights which we expect to receive shortly from another government.

Therefore, honourable senators, I have to say that, all in all, this is not a major piece of legislation. In fact, when one considers the amount of time spent on it in the other place—it was back and forth in committee, presented and re-presented—it really is a rather sad commentary on the efforts of this government to deal with the economic problems of this country.

I know that the problems that exist in the country as a whole are similar to those in the area I represent, and we are in a very bad state indeed. I never imagined that there could be such appalling human conditions as those which exist in Newfoundland today. I was in the province over the weekend, and I never imagined that Newfoundland could be so humourless or so depressed as it is today. The fishery has been a complete disaster both inshore and offshore, which is very unusual. The economic conditions that are affecting the rest of Canada are even more apparent in Newfoundland, which has had a history of seasonal employment, at best, and chronic unemployment, at worst. Today all of these things are aggravating a very sad situation. The seal fishery is on the verge of extinction because of well-meaning but misinformed people all around the world, and, as I say, our regular fishery has been a disaster.

● (1500)

No money is being spent for construction. The industrial effort down there is nothing, and now, to cut off all the hopes and dreams and aspirations of our people, we have had the Ocean Ranger disaster, which has God knows what portents for the future of the offshore development.

Co-operative federalism, as has been discussed here today, has certainly not been very evident in dealing with the problems in that part of Canada, particularly as they relate to our offshore hopes and aspirations with regard to territory that was certainly an associative part of Newfoundland before Confederation, but which is apparently not to be recognized as part of Newfoundland subsequent to Confederation.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: No wonder. Co-operative federalism is dead.

Senator Doody: It has been so announced and pronounced. I hope that is wrong.

This bill is a band-aid measure, though inasmuch as it helps 900 or 1,000 people it is certainly welcome, for any help that any of those people who have been laid off work through no fault of their own can get is certainly to be commended. It seems to build in, in my estimation, more discrimination against those people who have been traditionally discriminated against in the labour force. I see nothing in it which would assume special attention to people who have always been given a smaller share of the labour market, such as women, for instance, who have never had the opportunity to compete fairly in the labour market. I see nothing in it to help the under-educated or the untrained or the young. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the great criteria are having attained the age of 54 years and having worked a certain specified number of years. That is fine for people who fit into that category, but people who do not quite fit are thrown on the mercies of this commission that will be set up. I think that is a bit demeaning for people who need help.

As I say, honourable senators, the bill is an infinitesimally small dent in the horrendous economic problems facing our country today, and as regards those people who will qualify for help under it, we certainly wish them well. As far as it goes, I will certainly vote for the bill.

Hon. Robert Muir: I wonder if the honourable senator would accept a question.

Senator Doody: Certainly.

Senator Muir: I listened, honourable senators, very carefully to Senator Neiman yesterday. Clause 3(1) of the bill says:

3. (1) For the purposes of this Act, the Governor in Council may, by order, designate any industry either generally or with respect to any region of Canada.

The reason I would like to put this question to Senator Doody is this: Does he feel that this would cover those employees who are being laid off by CN Marine at Port aux Basques in Newfoundland, and North Sydney in Nova Scotia, through no fault of their own? In yesterday's paper I read that 60 more positions had been eliminated on the boats operating between Newfoundland and the mainland.

I am just wondering what the honourable senator's views are on that. Does he think this bill will cover these men, some of whom are in the age bracket mentioned by Senator Neiman and who have no alternative employment?

Senator Doody: I think this is a question that would more properly be directed to Senator Neiman, the sponsor of the bill.

In clause 3(2), immediately following the clause referred to by Senator Muir, a description of the designations is given. It refers to an industry in Canada that is generally undergoing significant economic adjustment of a non-cyclical nature by reason of import competition or by reason of industrial restructuring—

In my estimation, that could very well rule out most of the basic resource industries, and certainly the transportation industry could very well be ruled out. As I say, it is an interpretation that is left up to the Governor in Council, but it offers very little help for those people in that part of the world which is suffering the most in the present state of the economy.

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, normally, of course, we refer bills to committee on second reading, and I am not putting forward any reason why we should not do so in this case. Frequently, however, we do so because during second reading debate on a bill honourable senators speaking to it suggest that there are matters they would like to have considered in committee. According to our rules, this bill would go to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, under the rule that provides specifically that labour legislation shall go to that committee, where the Senate wishes it.

I am wondering if the position of the sponsor, or the position of the opposition, is that we do or do not need to send this bill to committee. I have no objection to its going to committee, but if there is no reason for this to be done, there is no point in having that committee convene just to look at something that the Senate does not feel requires further study. As Senator Doody has just pointed out, the bill has been before Parliament for some time now.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have no strong feeling on this. If it were left to my tender mercies I would scrap the bill and try to deal with the causes of the disasters that we have in this country today; but I do not think those disasters are going to be dealt with by this bill, no matter how many committees it goes to. As far as I am concerned, it can pass now. I have no strong feeling on the matter, as I say.

Senator Frith: Another suggestion, honourable senators, would be that I could adjourn the debate until tomorrow to give an opportunity to those who are concerned to consider whether or not they want the bill to be sent to committee on second reading. If it turns out that the bill does not need to be sent to committee, we can have third reading next week. If, on the other hand, it turns out that some honourable senators wish the bill to go to committee, we can so move tomorrow and have it go to committee for consideration next week.

That is the feeling on this side. I leave it for comment from the other side by Senator Roblin.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order, I think my honourable friend's suggestion that he should adjourn the debate, to give us a little time to think about this matter, is a good one. My own prejudice is, I must confess, that the committee stage is usually productive of some good, although, as my honourable friend said, in the case of this bill it may be an open question.

If left to my own devices at the moment I would think that the committee stage would be valuable, but I am quite prepared to leave the matter open. We can come up with a definitive proposal tomorrow.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Roblin and Senator Doody to a certain extent but, until we get answers to some of the questions we are interested in in this connection, I think it might be a good idea to refer the bill to committee. The instance referred to by my friend today, and the matter that I raised in my question to the house leader earlier involves hundreds of stevedores and CN Marine crewmen today on ships operating between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, as well as other workers in those two provinces. All we want to know is, will they qualify for what is provided for in the bill, as Senator Neiman has suggested?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, again on the point of order and responding to what Senator Muir says, I should like to say that this strengthens my view that the bill should go to committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Roblin. I think our general rule is that legislation always goes to committee. A bill's not going to committee should be the exception.

If Senator Muir feels that he would get answers to his questions better in committee, then I think that is decisive of the matter as far as I am concerned and that we should send it to committee. If he feels he can get an answer from the sponsor of the bill here in the Senate, that is fine, but if he has any doubts about it I think we should send it to committee.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I think it should go to committee, as long as it does not go this week, because I shall be in the National Defence Medical Centre for a couple of days. I hope we will have a chance to address the matter later.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Neiman speaks now her speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

● (1510)

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I want to thank both Senator Doody and Senator Muir for their intervention. I am inclined to agree with them, because they have both raised what I consider to be important questions, and I am not in a position to answer those questions myself.

I might just say, in reply to the remarks made by Senator Doody, that of course the bill does not provide answers to all of the economic and social problems that are facing us today. Perhaps it represents a small effort. I really do not know how small or how big it is. I would remind Senator Doody, however, that there are other bills which deal with specific problems such as unemployment among the youth and among women. This bill is part of a much larger group of bills which deals with these problems.

I do think that there are some specific areas of the bill that require clarification, and I would be happy to see the bill referred to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Neiman moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am not a man who is usually troubled, but I am troubled over this bill. For a month now I have been asking about the procedural niceties with regard to it. I believe it is a well-known parliamentary tradition that, when a bill stands in the name of a minister, it is in fact a government bill.

Some weeks ago I asked if the Senate could be given an indication whether this has become a government bill or, if it is not a government bill, whether processes have been set in motion to make a change in the name of the mover. I do not think that we can proceed with the matter "half lost and half saved", as the Evangelists say. It is either a government bill, as is indicated by the name of Senator Austin, or it is not.

I would ask this question one more time. I do not live in British Columbia, I have no personal interests in that province; we will be voting early in P.E.I. I think, however that the matter should be clarified. There will be an election held at some point, and I understand that the Chief Electoral Officer needs all the lead time he can get in preparation for that very important event. I should like to hear from Senator Frith.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with most of what Senator Macquarrie has said. I do not think that we should proceed with the bill in the minister's name. In fact, I do not think we could proceed unless it were a government bill.

As a result of questions which were quite properly asked by Senator Macquarrie, I have sought information and have been assured that the matter is under study with a view to preparing a government bill on the subject of the so-called "electoral clock." However, because of some other electoral reforms that I think are now before the other place, I had asked for some time in order to have the picture clarified. Senator Macquarrie graciously gave me that time, but I have not yet received the answer I sought. I will, therefore, renew my efforts to clarify the procedural position of this question of legislation relating to the electoral clock, as it is called.

Order stands.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MOTION TO ADOPT SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Second Report of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, which was presented on Wednesday, December 16, 1981.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, last December the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages presented its Second Report to Parliament with two main recommendations, namely, a request to be reconstituted in the new session of Parliament and a request to be empowered to travel both within Canada and abroad. Before addressing these two recommendations specifically, I should like to say a few words about the excellent work done by this committee since it was created in the spring of 1980.

In order to monitor implementation of the government's bilingualism policy in federal services dealing with the public, the Parliament of Canada decided, at the end of May 1980, to create a Special Joint Committee on Official Languages. The concept of a committee that would deal specifically with matters related to linguistic reform was first suggested by the Commissioner of Official Languages in his annual report to Parliament. Similarly, twice during 1979, a motion to establish a committee was put on the Order Paper of the House of Commons, without, however, being submitted for consideration by the House, owing to the fact that a general election was called.

The committee's job is to consider the last three annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages and to report on its findings to the two houses of Parliament. In fact, this assignment is extremely wide-ranging, because the reports on implementation of the Official Languages Act deal not only with the government's policy on bilingualism within the public service but also with aspects of constitutional reform relating to official languages, and even with second-language teaching in the provinces.

Within its terms of reference, the committee has defined three main objectives: First, to study the manner in which government departments and agencies implement the Official Languages Act, in terms of the three main components of the official languages program in the federal public service, namely, language of service to the public, language of work and equitable participation of both language communities. The second objective is to review the cogency of the act itself as the resources and methods used by the organizations which are responsible for its application. The committee will thus review various provisions of the Official Languages Act to ensure the effectiveness of this legislation as the foundation and the legal basis for the language reform. Finally, the third objective is to make members of Parliament, public servants and the general public aware of both the progress achieved and the problems encountered with respect to the language reform initiated when the Official Languages Act was passed in 1969, and to explain the objectives and background of the legislation.

The joint committee started holding its public hearings in October 1980, but had to suspend its activities to let the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution proceed with its work. During its first four meetings before its work was interrupted, the committee heard testimony from the Commissioner of Official Languages and from the Deputy Secretary of the Official Languages Branch of the Treasury Board Secretariat.

After resuming its regular meetings in February 1981, the committee heard testimony from senior officials from central bodies responsible for the implementation of the official languages policy. It heard further testimony from the Commissioner of Official Languages, the President of Treasury Board, the Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the Under Secretary of State. Having thus gained an overview of the roles, responsibilities, policies and programs of these central bodies the Committee decided to devote its immediate attention to issues relating to the provision of federal services in both official languages to members of the public. In this context, it has heard testimony from the Fédération des francophones hors Québec, the Council of Quebec Minorities, the Speaker of the Senate, senior officials of the House of Commons and deputy heads and other senior officials of over fifteen federal departments, agencies and crown corporations.

Based on the testimony presented since October 1980 the Committee tabled its first report in the Senate and the House of Commons on July 9, 1981, which addresses exclusively issues associated with the provision of federal services to the public in both official languages. This report contains six recommendations which can be summarized as follows: The formulation of guidelines and appropriate time frames by the Senate and the House of Commons; the removal of all references in the Official Languages Act to federal bilingual districts; the inclusion in this act of the concept of "where numbers warrant" and the concept of "active offer of service"; the establishment of regulations under the Official Languages Act on the locations "where numbers warrant" and "where there is significant demand"; the examination before March 31, 1982, of the identification of all positions providing service to the public in each department and government agency; confirmation of the deadline of December 31, 1983 by parliamentary resolution, after which there should be no conditional appointments.

Since last fall, the committee has been reviewing issues related to the working language and equitable representation within the government departments, agencies and crown corporations. In addition to the Commissioner of Official Languages and the President of Treasury Board, as well as representatives from the two major employee unions of the Public Service, the Public Service Alliance and the Professional Institute of the Public Service, up to now the committee has heard testimony from 14 federal departments, agencies and crown corporations about the issues related to the working language and the equitable participation of both linguistic groups. In addition, the committee decided to hear again the Departments of Fisheries and Oceans, Energy, Mines and Resources and Environment Canada on the issue of service to the public, in order to assess their progress, because these three departments had been considered at fault when they first appeared.

In a few weeks, the committee will be submitting to Parliament its third report on the working language and fair participation of both language groups, based on evidence heard since early fall in 1981.

Despite all that excellent work already performed, honourable senators, there remains much to be accomplished. The committee intends to analyze federal government activities in the area of official languages outside the Public Service, including the various language and cultural programs of the Secretary of State. The committee will deal with the amendments to the Official Languages Act proposed by the commissioner, and the resources and activities of the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages, to ensure that he is in a position to guide and assess language reform. The committee also wishes to scrutinize private members' bills that have been referred to it. Considering the large amount of work that remains to be performed, the committee felt it essential to recommend to Parliament, in its second report submitted in December 1981, that it be revived during the new session.

As far as I am concerned, honourable senators, I would go further than that recommendation and suggest that during the new session that committee be established on a permanent basis. I think this is vital. That recommendation indeed is in line with the report submitted by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, entitled "Certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution," tabled in the Senate in November 1980 and which recommended the establishment of a standing committee of the Senate on official languages, comprising an equal number of French-speaking and English-speaking senators. However, it would be better in my view to maintain the joint nature of that committee with participation from both houses, because official language matters are of interest to members of both houses. That committee would be responsible for monitoring the implementation of the charter of language rights enshrined in our Constitution, the Official Languages Act, and more generally the federal policy on bilingualism. A permanent committee could more easily promote on-going public awareness of official languages matters.

The second recommendation in the committee report tabled in December 1981 deals with the authority to travel in Canada and abroad. It is based in part on the same reasons. Travelling in various regions of Canada is essential, in our view, to make the public aware of their language rights. In return, while travelling in the regions, the committee would be in a position to check on the spot the quality of bilingual services available to minority language groups. On the other hand, the committee would find it most useful to travel to countries which have implemented official languages policies. Discussions with those responsible for law enforcement in those countries would give the committee a good idea of those countries' achievements as far as official languages are concerned. Of course, if leave is given, the committee intends to travel during the adjournment of the Senate.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking for Senator Macdonald, I believe that Senator Leblanc would like to resume the debate this afternoon, in which case we would be delighted to accommodate him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: I thank Senator Roblin, for giving me the opportunity to speak this afternoon. Honourable senators, in a recent statement made in this house, Senator Frith told us that Senate reform had been discussed in Canada since 1890. Since that date, a hoard of material has been gathered—speeches, magazine and newspaper articles, radio and television interviews, books and pamphlets, seminars, bills, meetings of joint committees, Senate committees, meetings and caucuses of all kinds. I certainly do not have the impression, nor do I entertain the presumption that my intervention will provide any new material for that debate. However, if the Senate could only remember how urgent it is to undertake its reform before other politicians take the matter in their own hands, I will be satisfied that I have done my share in that debate. As mentioned by other senators who spoke before me in this debate, we can proceed with some reforms simply by changing our Standing Orders, without having to amend the Constitution or some of the laws that govern us.

I presume that everybody here is interested in this subject. It would be interesting to hear all senators state clearly and precisely what methods they propose not only to increase the Senate's productivity but also to extend its usefulness in its present form and with appropriate changes.

It would certainly be very easy to quote numerous excerpts from authorities who have made an extensive study of the Senate and who are familiar with its operation, excerpts praising and commending the Senate for its legislative, investigative and sober-second-thought role. And it would be just as easy to quote authorities that support the opposite views, because most have not bothered or had the courage to look fully into the necessity of the Senate in the present Canadian Parliamentary system.

Honourable senators, Canada will soon have a new Constitution. Section 44 provides that, after the expiration of a period of 90 days, the Senate will no longer have the right to voice its opinion on any amendment to the Constitution and, consequently, on abolishing, retaining or reforming the Senate. Hence the urgency for us senators to take a position in the near future. I am quite confident that we do have within this chamber all the necessary elements to recommend the changes to be made. I know that all honourable senators are more concerned with the constitutional future of the country than with their own future. It is in that nonpartisan and unbiased spirit that we should pursue the debate.

In November 1980, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, under the outstanding chairmanship of the Honourable Senator H. Carl Goldenberg, submitted a report which could surely be used as a basic working document. As you know, that report is entitled "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution."

I particularly want to congratulate the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne, the chairman of a subcommittee on which I had the privilege of sitting. There are two parts to that report: Part I, "Toward A Renewed Federation: A New Federal-Provincial Council", and Part II, "Toward A Renewed Senate".

It is possible, and surely it must be true, that several senators do not agree with all its recommendations, and in particular, the Honourable Senator Duff Roblin who advocates an elected Senate, contrary to the recommendation contained in the report.

Senator Asselin: That possibility is also dealt with in the report.

Senator Leblanc: Yes, it is. I believe the recommendations advocate that present procedures be maintained but that, in addition, the provinces be asked to assist with the appointments.

Some honourable senators may not agree fully with Part I. It might be interesting to hear them on the subject, and also to find out what their own proposals might be in this respect.

● (1530)

Some senators may not agree with all the recommendations of Part II. Some may wish to present recommendations not included in this report. Now is the time and the opportunity to express and to command them to the Senate and thus to all Canadians.

Perhaps right from the start we should stick to reforms which require neither changes to our Constitution nor amendments to existing legislation and concentrate on the fourth conclusion of the report which is that the internal operation of the Senate should be improved.

Sad to say, there are 14 vacancies in the Senate at the present time. I believe that this lack of human resources should be corrected as soon as possible so that we can discuss this problem with people who also have opinions on the main objective, namely, to see that the Senate becomes a more efficient tool of federalism through which regional interests of all citizens could be represented.

I, for one, endorse the report's recommendations, although I am open and receptive to any further recommendations that might be put forward in this chamber. I hope that for the benefit of all Canadians and our political system, the government and the provinces will heed us and retain the bicameral system which has proved successful politically, socially and economically in this country and which many other countries have envied and, indeed, often copied. One thing is sure: the Senate in its present form is now on its way out and any changes made will have an impact on the whole Canadian parliamentary system.

Honourable senators, I had many misgivings when drawing up the conclusion to my brief remarks. Since I am convinced of the usefulness of the Senate in the Canadian system, I wondered if, as an accountant and a Canadian citizen, I should reply to the argument often made in some circles that the Senate is not worth the money it costs the Canadian people. In reply—and I repeat that I was not without misgivings, but I believe that these figures are rather significant just the same—I should like to say to the Canadian people that each senator, including the 375 or so members of the Senate staff, costs every citizen of Canada $1 per year, since our budget for 1982-83 is $24 million and Canada has a population of over 24 million, which means that it costs one third of a cent per Canadian per day.

Proceeding with this financial analogy, I might determine the cost per year per taxpayer. As there are approximately 14 million taxpayers, the cost per year per taxpayer would be about $1.70 per day. And proceeding with this financial analogy even further, I might say that the budget of the Senate represents 3/10 thousandths of 1 per cent of the total $74 billion budget of the Canadian government.

Senator Haidasz: That is all?

Senator Leblanc: Yes, that is all. Of course, I do not mean to suggest that the 90 honourable senators and 375 employees are not worth more than the figures I have quoted. But I think it is important to provide such information while the question of Senate reform is being debated and to emphasize that it would be impossible to find within a single institution so many highly qualified Canadians at so small a cost, even in the private sector.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, June 11, 1981, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Macquarrie calling the attention of the Senate to:

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Macquarrie speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my closing of the debate will be somewhat pro forma and certainly brief. I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Frith for his excellent contribution and for his fine thoughts. He looks as if he has almost forgotten making his contribution, because it was, indeed, many months ago. I also extend my thanks to my colleague, Senator Murray, for keeping the subject before us.

While I am suggesting that we consider the matter debated, we all know that we cannot consider the matter closed in the broader scene, nor is there anything that has happened, alas, in the months that have ensued since this was put down which could or should diminish our concern for the situation in El Salvador.

As I look at the four points in the Notice of Inquiry, I can think of nothing that has happened in El Salvador or in the world around it which diminishes the cogency or urgency of any of the aspects which have been set out.

We are all, I am sure, hopeful that some resolution of the difficulties will be found, and that Canada will make a worthy and helpful contribution thereto.

I thank all honourable senators for their interest in this matter, which is one of great concern to Canadians and to the broader world.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT BILLS IN SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that yesterday, Senator Bosa put an interesting question to the Leader of the Government. I should like to know whether today, he is prepared to table a list of the bills he would like the Senate to consider before the House of Commons does.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That related to government bills introduced in the Senate?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senators, that matter was taken up this morning. We are hoping that next week there will be some bills available for the Senate. Those immediately available relate to the expenditure of money and cannot be initiated in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: We know that.

Senator Perrault: I bore the glad tidings that the official opposition supports this initiative as well.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but we want action, not only words.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): So do we!

Senator Perrault: As the Leader of the Opposition is aware, one of the continuing problems in the progress of legislation through Parliament is the delay in the other place caused by the official opposition.

Senator Flynn: That is none of our business.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: All I ask the Leader of the Government is: What can we do? That is all he has to consider. If he has no bills to present, he knows what he should do—stay put.

THE ECONOMY

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—GROWTH RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I hope you can get an answer.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It will be better than the question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the question is precise and specific, and I hope that the minister will have an answer that is equally precise and specific. Does the government stand by its budget projection of a 2.2 per cent real growth in the GNP for the year 1982? I ask the question in view of the fact that the Toronto Dominion Bank and the Bank of Montreal both predict a 0.6 per cent rate of growth in the GNP for 1982. The highly respected Data Resources Limited predicts a rate of growth of minus 0.2 per cent. I also ask this question about the projected rate of growth in 1982 in view of the fact that Mr. MacEachen, in his November budget, predicted that the 1981 growth rate would reach 3.6 per cent. In actual fact, it appears to have been no higher than 3 per cent.

Senator Olson: Yes, honourable senators, I have heard the precision of the question, but the honourable senator failed to include one or two other factors. One is that the projection made by the same people a little more than a year ago was also wrong—more so than the projection made by the Minister of Finance.

• (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think they were precisely wrong.

Senator Olson: Yes, they were precisely wrong. The Minister of Finance did admit something which these people do not seem to have the courage to admit themselves, and that is that he underestimated the growth in the last quarter of 1980 and the first quarter of 1981. I believe the figures will indicate that we had approximately 3 per cent real growth in 1981, most of which occurred in the first two quarters because there was very strong growth in the first quarter and positive growth in the second quarter of 1981.

Another factor which must be taken into account, obviously, is that those people who revise their forecasts every few days do so on the same basis of taking current trends and projecting them over longer periods of time, which has the effect of creating the picture of a somewhat softer international market in many sectors, but particularly in the energy sector. So I expect that the prognosticators in the Department of Finance and other departments of government where prognostications are made will also adjust to what the real world is at present, thereby alternating the projections made last September and October.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that being the case, can the minister explain why the Minister of Finance, when the year was almost 11 months completed, persisted in projecting economic growth at 3.6 per cent when it turned out to be at no more than 3 per cent?

Senator Olson: That projection is reasonably close.

Senator Balfour: It is only 20 per cent out.

Senator Olson: What my honourable friend ought to know is that there is usually a bit of delay while the statistics are being gathered from the quarter. Those statistics are not available on the last day of that quarter. Considering that, I am sure that my honourable friend will find that Department of Finance and other departments are being as open, frank and forthcoming as is possible under the circumstances.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION—INVESTIGATION OF CANADIAN JAVELIN LIMITED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and one which, I appreciate, he will have to take as notice, but I hope and expect he will give us an answer at the next sitting. It relates to a matter dealing with the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission and an investigation which it is conducting into the affairs of Canadian Javelin Limited. Will the Leader of the Government ascertain for us whether a statement of evidence prepared for the commission will be either tabled, published or made public in some manner? I do know that the Chairman of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission has indicated that the documents are public documents.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice, though I am given to understand that the matter will be dealt with in accordance with the terms of the act. But I shall bring a more complete explanation to the chamber.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, while at this point it is not ascertainable whether those documents can be tabled or even released, I am aware of some documents which are in circulation, and in which the chairman of the commission in fact indicates that these documents are public documents. I do not know if, in fact, that is the case.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The documents have probably been circulated, according to the statute, to the people involved and to the people who are to appear before the commission.

● (1415)

Senator Nurgitz: I would direct my question to the deputy leader and go one step further: That statement was delivered to a non-party to the proceedings with the notation: "This is a public document."

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CAPITAL OUTFLOW

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I would direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister's failure to respond to my question concerning the alarming rate of capital outflow during 1981 the result of his unwillingness or his inability to answer the question?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, it is not related to our inability to answer the question, nor is it related to our unwillingness to answer the question. As a matter of fact, I believe I have that answer with me today. If the honourable senator will allow me a few minutes, I will locate that answer.

THE CABINET

HON. H. A. OLSON, P.C.—DESIGNATION

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: My question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. How should we address him in terms of his cabinet responsibility?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I can answer that without further explanation.

Senator Tremblay: Appended to the Debates of the Senate of March 2 is a list of the ministry which indicates that Senator Olson should be addressed as "Minister of State for Economic Development," and that the Honourable Herbert Gray should be addressed as "Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion." Does, in fact, the Honourable Herbert Gray have responsibility for regional economic expansion, and does Senator Olson no longer have responsibility for that department?

Senator Olson: The change in the designation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, commonly known as DREE, is not effective until Parliament gives statutory approval to the change. In the meantime, the Honourable Herbert Gray is the minister responsible for DREE and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. When the statutory changes are made, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will become the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion.

In regard to the first part of the question, this matter has somewhat the same implications since it requires some statutory change. I am now the Minister of State for Economic Development—in other words, MSED—and my designation will change to that of Minister of State for Economic and Regional Expansion, MSERD.

Senator Tremblay: Is it effective yet?

Senator Olson: The announcement of the intention has been made.

Senator Tremblay: As a supplementary question, does this mean that the legislation, which established the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1969, will be abolished and replaced with new legislation?

Senator Olson: There will be a change in the legislation to add the word "Regional" to cover the functions that MSERD will be carrying out.

If you want to nit-pick, I do not mind if you call me the Minister of State for Economic Development although we have announced it will be changed to the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development. This will not be an administrative department but secretariat support, and will have a co-ordinating capacity both here in the national capital and in the regions, to the cabinet committee on economic development.

Senator Tremblay: What will happen to the legislation which established the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in 1969? This legislation has already been amended once. I am concerned as to what will happen to that legislation since there are some parts of it which are quite important.

Senator Olson: I expect it will be amended to add the capability for regional support to the cabinet committee.

● (1420)

Senator Tremblay: I have a further supplementary question for the minister. That legislation, if I am correct, provided for compulsory joint planning between the federal government and the provincial governments. Will that part of the legislation be abolished?

Senator Olson: I do not know. I will have to read the legislation. I would seriously doubt, however, that there is any legislation that would make it compulsory upon the provinces to plan with the federal government. They do that if they wish to, and if they do not wish to, they do not.

Senator Tremblay: I suggest to the minister that he should read the legislation of 1969 again. I think it is quite clear in that legislation that it was in the context of joint planning that action should take place, both on the—Senator Olson: There is that possibility.

Senator Tremblay:—part of the federal government and the provinces. I am concerned about that part of the legislation, and should like to know whether this part of the legislation will be abolished.

Senator Olson: The requirement that there be liaison and joint planning, and hopefully some co-operation with the provinces, will obviously still be in the legislation, but it cannot take the other form. I am not sure if you are placing a different connotation on the word "compulsory" or not, but we do not pass legislation that compels the provinces to co-operate with us, because we know better.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN CAPITAL OUTFLOW

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on February 19, 1982 by Senator Balfour which concerned capital outflow.

I can inform him that traditionally Canada has been a net borrower on international capital markets and funds have flowed inwards on a net basis from abroad. This was also the case during 1981. During the first three quarters of last year there was a net capital inflow of $10.4 billion. Official statistics for the balance of payments for the fourth quarter of 1981 have not yet been released by Statistics Canada.

Over the first three quarters of 1981, there were sizeable net outflows on direct investment account, with corporate takeover activity, particularly in the energy sector, playing a large role. On the other hand, capital inflows in the form of new issues of long-term securities abroad were up strongly.

Additionally, there were large capital inflows in short-term forms, related, in part, to takeover activity. Preliminary evidence strongly suggests that outflows related to takeovers eased back considerably in the fourth quarter, while inflows in the form of new issues of Canadian securities abroad increased.

Canada's financial markets are closely linked with those in a number of other countries, particularly the United States. In any period there are both outward and inward financial flows, with Canadian residents acquiring financial claims on non-residents and vice versa. In general, however, the outflows have been outweighed by inflows. To concentrate only on the outflows, especially when there are large flows in the other direction, cannot provide a balanced picture of financial transactions between Canada and other countries.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Obviously, the minister did not understand my question, or he has attempted to present a distorted answer. The average capital outflow in the decade 1971 to 1980 was of the order of $2.4 billion. The capital outflow—I am not talking about the net capital outflow—for the four quarters ending in the third quarter of 1981 was of the order of $15.6 billion. That figure suggests to me an alarming aberration.

I asked the minister to explain that figure. I am not talking about inflows, I am talking about outflows; I am not talking about net, I am talking about the outflow of capital from Canada. I asked the minister to explain that and he has failed to do so.

● (1425)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I fail to follow that kind of convoluted reasoning. If my honourable friend wants to pick out selected figures and does not want to look at both sides of the ledger, then that is his option if he wants to make that kind of distorted convoluted argument. What I gave him was a balance between the two. He claims that in 1981 there was an outflow of $15 billion, which he said was something like six times larger than some other date that he arbitrarily picked. That kind of selected statistic does not impress me. I told the honourable senator that for the first three quarters of 1981—and these are the only figures that are available—there was a net capital inflow of $10.4 billion. If he wants to selectively pick out this one or that one, he can get even more distorted figures than he gave, but it is not a very intelligent exercise.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I am sorry that the minister finds it necessary to denigrate my intelligence.

Senator Olson: I said that if the honourable senator wanted to select convoluted figures, it meant nothing.

Senator Balfour: I put to the minister two straightforward figures. The first was the average capital outflow during the 1970s, a 10-year period, which is very simple for the minister to understand. I also presented to him the capital outflow figure for four quarters ending September 30, 1981. I pointed out that the figure was six times the average in the preceding decade and I asked him, as the Minister of State for Economic Development, to offer an explanation for that alarming figure. He is a member of the government and he should have those figures at his fingertips, and also the explanation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is like a lot of other things. We can always take dollar figures and flows for a certain year, back 10 years or whatever, and pick out certain figures. The honourable senator is picking out capital outflows, but what he does not put into the equation is that the totality of flows in both directions has gone up rather substantially. I am also saying that he should balance it out and be fair about it by looking at both sides of the account. The interpretation that he tried to put on his analysis—wherever he got his figures from, I don't know—is an unfair assessment.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I now ask two short supplementary questions. First, does the minister disagree with my analysis?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Balfour: Secondly, is the minister refusing to answer the question?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the minister disagrees with the type of analysis that is being made, and he is not refusing to answer the question because he has just answered it in great detail.

INDUSTRY

MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Massey-Ferguson is currently seeking to ease the terms of its refinancing agreement reached last summer—at least, its officers are talking about this matter, and certainly accounts in the media indicate that the private bankers are saying that the company will have some considerable difficulty in renegotiating with them for more financial aid. Could the minister indicate if Massey-Ferguson has made any overtures to the government seeking either an increase or some modification of its present loan guarantees over and above the $125 million given last year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, not to my knowledge. I do not believe that Massey-Ferguson has approached the government for any change at all, but I will check into the matter. All I know is that there has been some speculation in the press that the company is trying to ease—I believe that is the word used in the press—some of the terms and conditions in connection with the refinancing package with the banks. However, I have not heard of any overtures being made to the government.

THE SENATE

SEATING PLAN—REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN BROCHURE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to, or at least a follow-up on, a question that was asked by Senator Godfrey on the subject of the seating plan for this chamber. I told Senator Godfrey that I would be making this report, and he advised me that in his opinion this is a propitious time for doing so because he first asked the question a year ago today.

What has happened in the meantime, as some honourable senators may know, is that work has gone forward with regard to the seating plan, the brochure, and information material intended to be handed to guests, tourists and others who may be interested. It has been studied by the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, and of course there will be a more detailed report from the chairman of that committee at some later stage. At the moment, I just want to report on the specific question asked by Senator Godfrey.

You remember, honourable senators, that Senator Godfrey's question referred to the problems arising from the seating plan with regard to the designation, province and party affiliation of senators. The plan is to have a printed brochure, telling something about the Senate, with the picture that was taken earlier. That picture is excellent, by the way. In general, I would say that a lot of promise is demonstrated in this brochure.

The intention is also to include with the brochure, but separate, a seating plan. It, of course, will change from time to time for various reasons.

The question was, can we put in the block appearing for each seat in the seating plan the name of the senator, the province he represents and the designation, together with the senator's party affiliation, or some combination of those elements.

The answer is that because the seating plan must be bilingual, there are cases where it is virtually impossible to get all of that information, in both languages, within a block of any appropriate size within the seating plan. It seems that the solution is to have the seating plan show the name of the senator only, though we could probably add his province and perhaps the designation. It would, however, be better to have a separate sheet listing provinces, with the senators listed alphabetically under those provinces, plus the designation and party affiliation. In those circumstances, the block would show only the name, and perhaps the province, but, ideally, I think, just the name, with all the supplementary information set out on a separate sheet. The seating plan will be computerized, so that we will not have the problem of having names not fit into the block, of having names typed in different characters, and so on.

That is the answer to Senator Godfrey's question. I believe we can look forward to having in our hands within the next month or so the plans I have just described.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intitled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I must rise again on a point of order and procedure with regard to this matter. I profoundly hope that this will be my last intervention on this particular measure.

I have said that we cannot properly proceed with this until something has been done with regard to deciding whether or not this is a government bill. Having to request the Senate to stand this matter puts me in an invidious position, since such a request might be taken to mean that I am indifferent, that I am not ready, that I do not care, that I am in a hurry, or that I simply do not want to make a speech today. That, however, does not matter, although I maintain that I am not ready to speak simply because of the matter to which I have alluded already, namely, the importance of knowing whether this is a government bill.

I suggest to the deputy leader that he ascertain whether or not this is a government bill or whether he does not know, or whether no one in the government can tell him. Should the latter be the case it would probably be purer, procedurally, to withdraw the measure and to start again properly.

[Senator Frith.]

I wonder if the deputy leader, who is a most excellent man, despite his affiliations, could find out what the real disposition of the government is on this measure. Electoral machinery and legislation with regard to it are important matters. I do not want to be put in the position of having to ask the members of this house to stand this order again.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators know that I share Senator Macquarrie's passion for procedural purity, and they also know that I share his analysis of the procedural dimension of this order, namely, that since it was first introduced as a private bill its sponsor has become a minister of the Crown.

The second fact is that it is quite undesirable—in fact, I think it is quite improper—that a private bill stand in the name of a minister of the Crown and create ambiguity as to whether it is a private bill or a government bill.

A third factor is that it is perfectly true that Senator Macquarrie, in whose name this order stands, has been very patient with regard to his request to have this procedural impurity corrected. I have taken steps, as he knows, as recently as last evening, as a result of his questions of yesterday, to clarify the situation, and have asked that I be authorized, on behalf of the government, to make a statement by Tuesday evening as to exactly what we are going to do with this order and, if I understand Senator Macquarrie's question properly, as to what we are going to do with the subject matter involved.

I am not going to stand here and say that we want to drop the whole thing. It may be that I will say that we want to drop this order, but it seems to me that I am going to have to say also what we want to do about the subject matter, the so-called electoral clock.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, before the adjournment motion is put, I wish to raise one matter with the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. Although the effect of this motion is that we adjourn until Tuesday evening, based on the motion that was put and carried earlier today, could he, in light of the unusual situation in the other place, tell us whether his motion should be amended so as to indicate an adjournment to a later date?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can understand that question being raised. The present situation is unusual. We normally take it for granted that the other place will sit every week, but we do not know whether it is going to be sitting next week because of what, as far as I am concerned at any rate, is a very unusual procedural situation over there. Senator McIlraith, of course, has a much longer memory than I, and would be able to tell us whether this has ever happened before.

We do have a certain amount of business in the Senate that could occupy us next week, however. There is the question of Bill S-11 to be clarified, and certain inquiries that have to be dealt with. We also have committee work, arising out of the study of bills and the subject matter of bills.

● (1440)

I must say that, as far as legislation is concerned, as the Leader of the Government has said, we hope that we can, in some way, step into this situation in a helpful manner and introduce some legislation in this place. The spectrum is somewhat limited by the fact that we cannot introduce money bills, but the leader has told us that the government is trying to find bills that, constitutionally and procedurally, we can introduce. In this way, we will try to solve the problem that we are faced with by somehow having Parliament proceed in spite of the fact that one of the houses of Parliament does seem to be paralyzed, as someone said yesterday.

I must say that I am still a little new at the job, compared to Senator McIlraith. For that reason, I propose the usual motion, in spite of the fact that we have no assurance that the other place will be sitting and producing any business for us next week.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I must thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his lengthy answer and for all of the material he put into it. There is, however, something that I want to take exception to. He spoke of the Senate's stepping in. I think it would be better if he clarified the situation right now. The difficulty in the House of Commons is its own business. We must not put ourselves in the position of telling them what to do. At the same time, however, I should like to know what effect that situation has on the Senate. That is the point on which I was seeking information from the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I think that we should take full cognizance of the situation in the House of Commons in determining the action we take in the Senate with regard to our own business. We should thoroughly understand that the situation in the other place results from a simple motion to adjourn the house. If I remember correctly from last Tuesday—I have heard so many bells ringing since that time that I am not sure—the motion was that “this house do now adjourn.” Honourable senators, for obvious reasons that is not a debatable motion and is one which is used on extraordinary occasions. I can remember one such occasion when a minister of the Crown unfortunately died in an accident just before the house sat. On another occasion a member of the House of Commons died on his way down to the sitting. In such instances, of course, there is a motion to adjourn the house.

As I understand it, the practice involved with such a motion is very simple. Once the Speaker puts the motion and the required number of members rise, they call in the members. In the process of calling in the members they start to ring the bell. As an act of courtesy, the whips go out and sometimes wait quite a while before bringing the various members in from wherever they may be. In any event, a vote is then taken. That, again, is not our business.

I would like to point out that in this instance we are placed in the extraordinary position of having all the nationally elected representatives of the people of this country denied the right to meet together to conduct the public business of this country. Perhaps I am naive, honourable senators, but I have a firm conviction that these representatives were elected and sent to Parliament to attend to the public business, which, goodness knows, probably needs attention in light of certain economic situations. That is the purpose for which they were sent here. They have been kept from carrying out their duties for almost 48 hours. That bell has been ringing for two days to prevent the House of Commons from meeting and carrying out the business of this country which is in desperate need of being taken care of.

Honourable senators, I am one of those who are naive enough to believe that the government has the right to have government business brought before Parliament, and that Parliament has the right to meet, in both houses, to pass on that legislation and either accept it or reject it. When the elected representatives of the people of Canada cannot get into the chamber to do the business they were sent here to do, we are seeing a complete negation of the whole system of government.

Honourable senators, the situation in the House of Commons has nothing to do with the energy bill, with what the leaders have agreed upon privately as to how they will conduct themselves afterwards, or with anything else of that nature. I think the situation has implications for the Senate in terms of our internal business. I want to find out from the deputy leader whether he considers there is anything we may have to do, in light of this extraordinary situation in the other place, though I want him to stay clear of interfering in what they do in their own house.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have listened closely to what my honourable friend has just said. It was not my intention to rise at this time—indeed, I did not expect to have anything to say. However, in response to my honourable friend I would like to say that we were sitting in this Parliament on the occasion when the Prime Minister of this country said, in unequivocal terms, that although there is a convention that the Constitution of this country cannot be amended without the consent of the provinces, that is only a convention; it is not binding. The Supreme Court, when questioned, said that the convention exists but there is no such law. Therefore, the Prime Minister said, “We shall do what we said we would do because we are legally doing what we have the right to do. We will ignore the convention.”

Honourable senators, there may or may not be a convention with regard to what should happen to enable the members of the other place to resume the work of Parliament when the bells are ringing. We all know what is customary. We all know that the whips enter the chamber, approach the Chair, and thereby acknowledge that they have done everything they wished to do. We then know that all the members who intend to be present are in fact present, and then the vote proceeds. That, honourable senators, is not taking place in the House of Commons today. Whether it takes place or not is entirely the business of the House of Commons. It is not our business and it should not even be mentioned in this chamber. It has, however, been mentioned. An honourable senator has risen to his feet and has given us his views with respect to what should be done, so I will now give honourable senators my views.

In my view, the members of the opposition in the House of Commons are entirely justified in remaining out of the chamber because they are being subjected to a procedure which makes it impossible for any man of conscience to vote. I have seen such a thing happen in my day. I know that in this country we have a law with respect to abortion. I know that that law became the law of the country because it was included in an omnibus bill to amend the Criminal Code. I know that there were other matters contained in that omnibus bill to which no reasonable man could have taken objection and for which any reasonable man would have voted. However, the members were placed in a position where they could not vote for provisions of the bill they agreed with unless they also voted for a provision they disagreed with.

In the House of Commons today this situation has arisen because of the attempt to have 15 bills incorporated into one. Many of those bills are such that they might be supported. More of them, however, are such that they might not be supported. Many of them contain a principle which is objectionable in any good Parliament. That principle provides in advance for the expenditure of money by the government of the country without reference to the legislative body.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

● (1450)

Senator Donahoe: I may be out of order, but I am no more out of order than Senator McIlraith.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): You certainly are.

Senator Donahoe: I did not rise until he commented the rights and wrongs of what was taking place in the House of Commons, and I am sure you will give me that much credit. But I did rise when he finished his comments because I felt, though it is quite in order for the senator to say what he feels, that it was not in order for us to let his comments go without rebuttal.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I understand the position we were in before Senator Donahoe spoke, I was asked to explain the motion for the adjournment of one house of Parliament, which is to continue its business next week, while there is the possibility that the other house of Parliament will not. Two honourable senators said that the matter is none of our business but then proceeded to talk about it, so I assume that to some extent it is our business.

Certainly, the procedural situation is quite clear. It is that an omnibus bill was presented, and objected to by the opposition in the other place on the grounds that it was out of order to present such a bill, for the very reasons suggested by Senator Donahoe. As a result, Madam Speaker made a ruling on the grounds that she was bound by the precedent that previous omnibus bills had been questioned and found in order.

[Senator Donahoe.]

Although the ruling was discussed, it was not appealed, and at that point a member of the opposition moved the adjournment.

It seems to me that that is a means of taking an objection to a ruling by the Speaker and to government conduct. Personally, I agree with Senator McIlraith as to the appropriateness of such a procedure, but just as do members of the other place, we too have different views on the subject. However, I believe the procedural situation is exactly as I have described it, and I believe that the political situation is as I have described it. Perhaps it is not right to use the expression "step in" in trying to deal with some of the legislation, but whether that is so or not, I feel that we in this place—as I have indicated in moving the adjournment—should wait and see, and that we should proceed next week whether we are called upon to step in or whatever.

We all have our views as to the propriety of what is happening in the other place, but in the meantime I think that we should proceed next week and wait and see what happens.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I do not think I have made myself clear.

Senator Donahoe: You certainly did not.

Senator McIlraith: I do not wish in any way to tell the House of Commons what to do with regard to their procedure. All I know is that the motion is before the House of Commons and that the bells are still ringing 48 hours later, which is unusual. The motion is very simple and very narrow in its wording.

With the greatest deference to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, the motion has nothing attached to it that has anything to do with severing a bill. The procedure for severing a bill is an old one, and there are clear procedures for that. The motion has nothing to do with the procedure the honourable senator explained. The motion is "that this House do now adjourn"—nothing else.

With the greatest deference, the situation here is that Senator Donahoe began discussing the business of the other place and a grievance he alleged against the government. At the moment, I am not interested in grievances either for or against the government.

Senator Donahoe: You introduced them.

Senator McIlraith: Rather, I am interested in what we in this chamber should do in light of what has happened. I wrote down part of Senator Donahoe's remarks. He said that "they were justified in staying out of the chamber." Whether the members of the House of Commons are justified or not in staying out of the chamber is not our business, nor is it the point I sought to raise.

What is going on in the other place is not a case of the opposition staying out of the chamber. Rather, because of the motion and by virtue of the practice of voting on a motion only after the whips are seated, the members of that house are prevented from conducting their business. The whips are preventing their fellow elected representatives, whether they be for or against the government, from considering the business they wish to bring before Parliament and from taking decisions on that business. Those are the facts with which we in this house must contend. It is not a matter of whether the members of the other place are justified in their action. That is their business and, since they are an elected body, they will have to answer for that. The point I wish to make is that one of the whips is preventing the house from meeting to do public business, not that the members are staying out of the house.

Senator Donahoe: In an improper way.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, it is improper.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, my clear impression of Senator McIlraith's point is the matter of procedure. Rather than direct my question to His Honour, I shall direct it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and ask: What procedure would the Senate adopt were such a procedural difficulty to arise in this house? I think this is a matter which should be reviewed in case of any such future emergency.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, precisely the same situation would prevail. The adjournment motion is not debatable. If the two whips did not enter this chamber, representing the preparedness of the members to have the vote taken, then we would be in a similar situation.

However, I cannot contemplate any conjunction of events or any circumstance which would immobilize the Senate in that fashion. The traditions of this chamber and the way the senators on all sides approach their duties, I think, are such that we would want the work of the chamber to proceed.

Senator Thompson: Can the Leader of the Government tell me whether such a situation has ever occurred in the upper chamber of any parliamentary system? Also, assuming that we were not men and women of sound reasoning and that such a situation did arise, how would the deadlock be resolved?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have never heard of such a situation occurring in this fashion. I can assure honourable senators that this matter is under intensive study by parliamentary authorities at this moment. Certainly, the duration of this impasse in the other place—

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, on a point of privilege—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, I am trying to reply. You are not on your feet and you do not have the floor.

An Hon. Senator: He is trying to raise a point of privilege.

Senator Perrault: What is your point of privilege?

Senator Donahoe: I have not advanced it yet.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I was on my feet to follow up on a question—

Senator Donahoe: My point of privilege deals with the fact that there have been assertions made by several senators that what occurs in the House of Commons is none of our business.

Senator Perrault: That is not a point of privilege.

Senator Donahoe: Notwithstanding that, the Leader of the Government continues what was begun—

Senator Perrault: May I appeal to you, honourable senators—

Senator Donahoe: —by another honourable senator on his side.

Senator Olson: Sit down!

Senator Perrault: —to recognize this for what it is.

Senator Donahoe: He continues to impute blame for the events in the House of Commons. I say that if blame is to be imputed to one side of this chamber, then that side has the right of defence.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the statement by the honourable senator opposite is clearly out of order. He has already made one speech, and he is trying to make another while I am trying to reply to a question asked by an honourable senator, in which reply I have said that studies are now under way in order to determine whether or not—

Senator Donahoe: He is trying to impute blame to somebody.

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Perrault: —a similar circumstance has occurred before and how impasses of this kind can be dealt with. Certainly, the situation in the other chamber, from the standpoint of the duration of time itself, is unprecedented. Attempts are being made to determine, how a parliamentary assembly—which is established to allow spokesmen from various sectors of the country to meet together, to reason together and to pass legislation on behalf of the people—can continue if one section of the members elected, or appointed, refuse to enter the chamber.

● (1500)

Senator Donahoe: There you go again.

Senator Stollery: On a point of order, I would follow up on what appears to me, by any rule under which we operate, to be a clear question of order. I should like to ask the deputy leader what will happen in the Senate if this unprecedented occurrence in the other place continues into next week. Since we have no way of knowing how long the bell will ring, at what point, and on what instruction from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, will senators have to stop their activity and go home?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are dealing with an unprecedented situation, but the Senate has enough business to operate next week. There is no constitutional or procedural provision I am aware of that states that we act only derivatively from the House of Commons. Many matters can be and, indeed, have been initiated in the Senate, and we can deal with those next week. Committee work also is planned for next week.

I understand the concerns of honourable senators, but I believe we have enough work to keep us going next week, and we may have enough to keep us going even longer if we introduce some bills in the Senate.

If we were to behave as though we were totally unaware of what is happening in the other place, we would lose credibility, but to react to it in such a way as to become infected with the same paralysis, I think, is unnecessary. We should proceed.

I point out for the record, since we have been talking about points of order here and elsewhere, it may appear to some observers that the same procedures apply here for the motion to adjourn, namely, it is not debatable. What have we been debating for the last half hour? In fact, we were not debating that motion; we were dealing with a series of questions that were asked and, therefore, in that purist sense, I would point out to Senator Macquarrie that we were in order.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Cannot we, as senators, benefit from the experience of the other place to ensure that that kind of nonsense will not happen here, and refer the question to our Rules Committee? They can then consider the question and recommend a rule for adoption by the Senate to ensure that there is no possibility of this happening here in the future. I am quite prepared to refer it to the Rules Committee myself.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I suggest that we reflect on that proposition over the weekend? We could add this matter to the other business that awaits us next week.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I have a question but I would first like to say a few words by way of introduction. Clearly, a number of our colleagues could not resist using questions or points of order to get involved in a debate on the substance of what is happening in the other place. And now for my question.

This year, the House of Commons resumed sitting on January 25. Is that correct?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Tremblay: The Senate came back a week later, and so, since the Senate is under no obligation to sit when the House of Commons is sitting, as far as the principle of simultaneous sittings of the House of Commons and the Senate is concerned, we already have the answer.

My question is, can the Senate sit when the House of Commons is not? If we have the answer to the first eventuality, the same answer applies to the second.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that the question is a rhetorical one, since the answer has already been given. I cannot blame Senator Tremblay for adding a last touch of rhetoric to this debate, and I feel he has given a very clear analysis of the question whether or not both chambers must sit simultaneously.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 9, at 8 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

GROUP OF ITALIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS ACCOMPANIED BY HIS EXCELLENCY F. PAOLO FULCI, ITALIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence in the gallery of a distinguished group of parliamentarians from Italy. They are part of a delegation of the Western European Union Defence and Armaments Committee. This afternoon they met with members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of the House of Commons, as well as with officials of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence. They are accompanied by His Excellency Paolo Fulci, the Italian Ambassador to this country.

I extend to the members of the delegation and their wives a hearty welcome on behalf of the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MEETING OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of privilege relating to the Senate.

In my capacity as Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages I was advised at noon today, by the other joint chairman of that committee, Mr. Emard Corbin, M.P., that he had instructed the joint clerk of the committee from the House of Commons to cancel a meeting of the committee, which had been scheduled for 3.30 this afternoon, on the grounds that while the bell was ringing, summoning the members of the other house to a vote, it was out of order for the committee to meet. Further, he advised me that he had had advice to that effect, and to the effect that one joint chairman of a joint committee could unilaterally cancel such a meeting, from the appropriate Table officer in the House of Commons.

My position was, and is, that I could not, as a member of the Senate, accept the premises on which Mr. Corbin issued his instructions. Therefore, I declined to advise senators that the meeting had been cancelled.

At 3.30 this afternoon I attended at the committee, and after ascertaining that a quorum, consisting of four members representing both chambers, was present, I called the meeting to order. I noted the absence of the witnesses, senior officers of the Department of Justice, who were to have appeared this afternoon. A telephone call was made to the Deputy Minister of Justice, who said that he had received one advice from the House of Commons clerk that the meeting had been cancelled, and another advice from the Senate side that a meeting was going ahead. A motion was then made, seconded and agreed to, calling another meeting of the committee for 3.30 tomorrow afternoon, and inviting the Department of Justice to have its witnesses on hand.

I thought it appropriate to inform the Senate of these facts concerning the meeting of that joint committee today, and of its intention to sit tomorrow.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (2010)

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Honourable Senator Murray, joint chairman of the committee, on the point he has just raised. Were members of more than one party present when the decision was made?

Senator Murray: I can tell the honourable senator that the answer to his question is no. All of those present were members of the Progressive Conservative Party. I may say with great respect, however, that the point is irrelevant because the only rule to which I have been referred on the subject is that the quorum consist of four members, provided both chambers are represented.

Senator Stollery: I have a supplementary question which I direct to the Honourable Senator Murray. Normally, under the terms of reference laid down for parliamentary committees, it is made clear that votes shall not take place unless representatives of two out of the three parties in the House of Commons are present. I wonder whether similar terms of reference were laid down for this joint committee. If not, I would like to know why not.

Senator Murray: The answer to the first part of the question is no, there is no such reference contained in the order under which the committee was formed. As to why there is no such reference, the honourable senator would have to address his question to the government, which proposed the motion setting up the committee.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in speaking to that so-called "point of privilege," which really is not a point of privilege, it should be observed that a joint committee ideally and necessarily involves members from both chambers representing diverse political viewpoints.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No!

Senator Perrault: It seems to me that Senator Murray should be encouraged to proceed in agreement with representatives of the other parties represented on that joint committee, so that it will truly be a balanced reflection of the views of both houses of Parliament.

Senator Flynn: He rose in order to invite senators from all sides to attend.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is a joint committee involving the House of Commons and the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but the house was represented.

Senator Olson: The members of the other place do not attend committee meetings when they have been summoned to the chamber.

Hon. G. I. Smith: How do you know?

Senator Olson: I was there for 10 years.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to Senator Murray in his capacity as joint chairman of the committee. If there were a vote called in this chamber at the time a committee was meeting, is he suggesting that the committee would not be entitled to adjourn and that it should not adjourn for the purpose of taking a vote in the chamber?

Senator Flynn: For the purpose of taking the vote, yes. Make your joke elsewhere.

Senator van Roggen: It is not a joke!

Senator Flynn: Yes it is. You are a joker.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Why, then, are the bells ringing over there? Is that not why they are ringing?

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator van Roggen: If I may, honourable senators, I will ask a perfectly proper question of the chairman of a committee, to whom I am entitled to address a question. If he were chairman of that committee and if it were sitting at a time when a vote was to be taken in this chamber, would he advocate that the committee not adjourn for that vote?

Senator Murray: With great respect, the honourable senator is not asking me a perfectly proper question. He is asking me to interpret the rules of this chamber.

Senator Frith: Under the rules, if the question deals with the proceedings of the committee of which you are the chairman, it is a proper question. That is exactly what the rules say.

Senator Flynn: It was for your information; if you don't want to come, don't come.

Senator Olson: How about an answer?

Senator Smith: How often have you refused to answer a hypothetical question, Mr. Minister of State?

Senator Olson: I have attended a lot of committee meetings, and they adjourn when the division bell rings.

[Senator Flynn.]

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Wednesday, March 10, 1982, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: At what time?

Senator Frith: At four o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, the motion has to do with a bill that was referred to this committee. The vice-chairman, Senator Bird, has asked me to propose the motion so as to enable the committee to continue and, if possible, complete consideration of the bill this week.

● (2015)

[English]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to this motion for a moment. I attended a meeting of all chairmen of committees of the Senate just last week. I understood then that the question of when committees meet is of great importance in terms of space, staff and services, and that one should consult with the honourable senator who has undertaken—upon request, of course—to correlate these meetings so that there is not a duplication of demand. Before we are asked to vote on this matter I should like to know whether or not the consent of the Honourable Senator Lafond has been obtained.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I must say that Senator Smith has laid a good foundation for his question. I agree with what he has said, both as to what took place at that meeting and as to the fact that we had agreed that that procedure would be followed.

I must also say that I assumed the committee clerk had checked with Senator Lafond before I was asked to put the motion. If that is not correct and I made that assumption on insufficient ground, then I apologize.

If I may have permission of the Senate, I can find out from Senator Lafond now whether that procedure was followed. It certainly ought to have been.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I must apologize for not consulting Senator Lafond, but my problem was that it was getting rather late. The deputy minister was there to speak to us, and two committee members requested that he return for a further meeting. We want to deal with the matter expeditiously because we are most anxious to get to the people the pensions that will be put into effect by this bill.

Another difficulty I faced was that, although we could have gone on for another half hour, unfortunately there was no member of the opposition present at that time in the committee. Therefore, I felt I had to act quickly and ask the deputy minister to attend at a further meeting. I do apologize, but it was just at the dinner hour. I hope that I will be forgiven and that you will allow me to hold the meeting tomorrow.

● (2020)

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I apologize for being absent from the chamber for approximately one-and-a-half minutes when this question was raised. I gather that the question concerns a delay in the commencement of the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science this afternoon.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was asked to move a motion to permit the Health, Welfare and Science Committee to meet at 4 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, even if the Senate is sitting at that time. I received the message about a half an hour before we convened this evening, and I assumed that the Clerk would have followed the point raised by Senator Smith and asked Senator Lafond for clearance, because it has been agreed, that all committee meetings, ordinary and extraordinary, would be cleared through his co-ordinating office. It seems that there has been a bit of a contretemps here, and the matter was not cleared with Senator Lafond's office. That is the background to what we are discussing at present.

I was given leave to move the motion, I explained it, and we are now discussing whether the motion should be adopted.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, as it happened, there were two contretemps. The first contretemps occurred this afternoon. I should have known that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science was meeting at 4 o'clock. However, because of my absence since Thursday evening on other business, I was not aware of this, and I apologize for carrying on the meeting of the Subcommittee on National Defence until 4.05 p.m. I can say that it will not happen again.

The second contretemps occurred the moment that meeting was over because I left the premises and if anyone had wanted to reach me within the next few hours, I was not available. In any event, I gather that the matter is resolved and that the committee has permission to sit at 4 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Smith may have stated as much before I entered the chamber for the second time, but I believe that the committee chairmen have agreed to put to the leadership of the Senate on both sides the proposal that in order to help with committee scheduling it should be more or less routine for one committee—if need be, a designated committee—to sit at 3.30 on Wednesday afternoons. When I say “designated”, I mean on a first-come-first-served basis.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we have not implemented the suggestion that a committee have the automatic right to sit on Wednesday afternoons. The question now is whether the explanation, quite properly asked for by Senator Smith, is sufficient to show that there was an attempt to give proper notification. Senator Lafond has said that he would not have been able to deal with the matter of that kind of notice because he was not available. So the question is whether, such permission not having been given in advance, there has been sufficient explanation for the Senate to agree to this motion.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, with all due deference to Senators Smith, Lafond and Bird, it was through my efforts, with the co-operation of all honourable senators, that Bill C-78 was brought before the committee. Senator Bird very kindly presided over the committee, and we worked hard at dealing with the legislation.

Perhaps I did not hear Senator Bird correctly, but I believe she said that no representative of the opposition was present at the meeting. I was there until the meeting finished. However, if a senator who is a member of the Liberal Party would like to continue the meeting of the committee in order to obtain further information—and there was one—then he has every right to demand that. We hope to conclude our business tomorrow so that the bill may be passed as quickly as possible. I hope I have shed some light on the situation.

● (2025)

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, it is not my wish to prolong this matter, but I think I was the person who asked that the meeting be adjourned. Senator Muir expressed the hope that we could continue, although he did not mention that fact in this chamber just now.

We have dealt with Part I of the bill, and two parts remain to be dealt with.

In fairness to the deputy chairman of the committee, there are still many questions we would like to ask on this bill, and perhaps that could be done tomorrow.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, it is certainly not my wish to cause any difficulties for this committee, but I must say that, as chairman of a committee, I have encountered many such difficulties. I thought we had disposed of the likelihood of any such difficulties occurring in the future as a result of our meeting last week.

I heard Senator Lafond, for whom I have the greatest respect—as I have, of course, for Senator Bird and the other senators who have spoken—and, in the circumstances, as long as Senator Lafond is satisfied I have no complaint to make.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MEETING OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I ask Senator Murray if, in setting up the meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, which he referred to earlier, he followed the procedures that were explained a few moments ago.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That does not apply.

Hon. Lowell Murray: In answer to the question, I can only tell the minister that a motion was moved, seconded and passed in committee that the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages meet again tomorrow afternoon. Upon that motion being passed, I instructed the clerk of the committee to so notify the members of the committee.

Senator Olson: Is it not a fact that you did not comply with any of the rules with which every other committee has to comply?

Hon. G. I. Smith: What are you talking about? You were not there.

Senator Olson: I am asking if he did it; that is all.

Senator Flynn: If you want to attend, go.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Did you have a long, tough debate in committee?

Senator Olson: The rules apply to everyone except Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: On the point that has just been raised by the Minister of State for Economic Development, and on a number of spurious points made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I should point out that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments met within the last few days while the bell was ringing summoning the members of the other place to their places.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We are talking about while the Senate is sitting.

Senator Olson: Have you asked for permission to sit while the Senate is sitting?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would point out that ever since I have been a member of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, now over a year, a procedure has been followed whereby members are informed of committee meetings ahead of time.

My question, to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or, alternatively, to Senator Murray, is: Is it not appropriate that permission should be sought from the Senate for that committee to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow afternoon? Our usual procedure has been to ask for permission for a committee to sit while the Senate is sitting. We may be instigating a new procedure if Senator Murray calls a meeting of the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages for tomorrow, Wednesday, since that committee does not usually sit on that day of the week.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: What about the steering committee?

Senator Guay: As a rule, it deals with such matters prior to a committee meeting. I am sure that Senator Murray is aware of that, because he sits on the steering committee.

• (2030)

So, my second question is: Has the steering committee also agreed to this?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, a number of questions arise because of the—

Senator Frith: Deal with the one he asked.

Senator Murray:—events of today.

As the honourable senator has just pointed out, the steering committee decided on a schedule of meetings some time ago, and that schedule was adopted by the full committee when the full committee adopted, I think, the ninth report of the steering committee. Included in that schedule was a meeting for today, Tuesday, March 9, 1982. That was a decision of the steering committee and it was adopted by the full committee.

Of course, the first question I had to face, as a member of the Senate and as joint chairman of that committee, was whether—in view of the decision taken by the steering committee and the full committee to hold the meeting today, Tuesday, March 9—it was in order for one of the joint chairmen—that is to say, Mr. Corbin of the House of Commons—to cancel the meeting unilaterally.

Senator Flynn: He could have attended.

Senator Murray: To his assertion that he was authorized to do so, honourable senators, I, as a representative of the Senate and as joint chairman, took the position that he was not, and that I was going to show up at the committee meeting. When I attended the committee meeting there was a quorum, a quorum representing both houses. That being the case, I saw no choice but to call the meeting to order. Four members, according to our—

Senator Olson: Without the other joint chairman?

Senator Smith: That often happens.

Senator Perrault: Without the other joint chairman?

Senator Frith: You were going to go ahead without his being present?

Senator Murray: There was a quorum present representing both houses, so I called the meeting to order. I noted the absence of the witnesses who had been invited, and—

Senator Perrault: A kangaroo committee!

An Hon. Senator: We've got a kangaroo government.

Senator Murray:—in due course, a motion was moved, seconded and passed by a quorum—that is to say, by the full committee—calling a meeting for tomorrow afternoon. That decision was taken by a quorum, the full committee. As joint chairman, I had no choice but to put the motion. It carried unanimously.

Senator Perrault: That was a tough decision.

Senator Guay: I have a supplementary question.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Are you already in opposition?

Senator Guay: My supplementary question is this: Ever since I have been in Ottawa, in the other place and in the Senate, it has been the common practice of all committees that I have sat on to wait for all parties to be represented, or at least one representative from each party, before the committee sits.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: Your party—that is, the Conservative Party—is so technical about wanting to follow rules and regulations that I think you ought to set the example when you are the one who advises them and are paid a large salary. You ought to follow the proper procedure.

Senator Olson: Earn that $60,000, Senator Murray.

Senator Perrault: Earn that $60,000.

Senator Smith: May I ask the Leader of the Government why he always gets so upset when he does not have his own way?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as the Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I can say that we met last Thursday and that we will meet this Thursday. There is no reason for our not meeting and, as far as I am concerned, Senator Murray has followed exactly the right procedure.

There is no requirement that our committee have representatives from each party. As long as there is one senator and one member of the House of Commons present, we can meet, and we shall continue to follow the same procedure as Senator Murray has followed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just so there is no question about oral questions being asked of committee chairmen, rule 20 provides that questions may be asked, without notice to the chairman of a committee—

Senator Flynn: We know that.

Senator Frith: Someone called “Order!” when I tried to put a question to him.

The Leader of the Opposition says that I am in order, so now I will ask the question.

Just to be absolutely clear, both Senator Murray and, I take it, Senator Godfrey are saying that they, as joint chairmen representing the Senate, can call meetings of their respective committees and can call such meetings to order without the co-operation, consent or presence of their joint chairman. Is that what Senator Murray is saying? Am I not right that that is what he did?

● (2035)

Senator Perrault: That is what he did.

Senator Murray: The Deputy Leader of the Government is completely inaccurate in one very important respect: I did not call the committee. The committee—

Senator Frith: Senator Murray said he called it to order.

Senator Olson: Senator Murray called the meeting to order.

Senator Murray: The committee meeting was called by the steering committee, many weeks ago, for Tuesday, March 9, a decision that was adopted by the full committee.

Senator Flynn: The notice is in Debates of the Senate.

Senator Murray: My contention is that one of the joint chairmen may not cancel that meeting unilaterally.

Senator Frith: But he can call it to order, which is what Senator Murray said he did.

Senator Murray: There was a quorum present. One can call, one has called and one does call a meeting to order when there is a quorum present.

Senator Frith: Just to be perfectly clear, do I understand that Senator Murray could call the meeting to order and also that he could call the meeting himself tomorrow?

Senator Flynn: No, no; that is not what he did.

Senator Murray: On the contrary.

Senator Flynn: Senator Frith should listen to what Senator Murray says.

Senator Frith: Well, I'm trying to. Let him tell me.

Senator Murray: On the contrary, the position is—

Senator Perrault: Senator Murray needs your help, does he?

Senator Flynn: The leader's help would certainly not be very useful.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Flynn: Senator Perrault's remarks are more confusing than helpful.

Senator Murray: The position is that the full committee meeting today, including representatives of both chambers, passed a motion calling a meeting for tomorrow afternoon. I, as joint chairman, had no choice but to put the motion and, as I said—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: —it carried unanimously.

Senator Frith: It depends on whose action is unilateral. That is what counts.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I should like to pursue one element of this matter. My question to Senator Murray, as joint chairman of the joint parliamentary committee, is: Does Senator Murray think that it is proper to preside over a parliamentary committee and to take decisions in Parliament with only one party being represented? Further, did Senator Murray seek advice from any of the officers at the Table in either chamber before taking the decision?

Senator Murray: To answer the second part of the question first, I requested that the opinion which Mr. Corbin told me he had from his officers be relayed to me in writing. This, for their own reasons, the Table officers in the House of Commons declined to do. I then had inquiries made of the officers of the Senate, and I invited them to tell me that I could not proceed because Mr. Corbin had attempted to cancel the meeting, but the officers of the Senate were unable to give me that advice. Whereupon I proceeded.

Senator Stollery: Would Senator Murray be so kind as to answer the first part of my question, which is: Does he believe it appropriate that a parliamentary committee sit and take decisions without members of both parties being present?

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Frith: The same thing holds true for the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: Let the government vote in the House of Commons and ignore the bell then, shall we?

Senator Frith: And let Senator Murray set the precedent.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Murray: Senator Murray believes in conducting himself scrupulously within the rules.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Let me suggest to Senator Murray—

Senator Flynn: Sit down!

Senator Smith: Sit down!

Senator Perrault: —that he is not within the traditions of Parliament. Typical Conservatives, not willing to let parliamentary democracy operate.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Flynn: Sit down!

Senator Perrault: Typically Conservative! Typically Tory! Muzzle Parliament, that is what you are trying to do.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Perrault: That is what you are trying to do, using an axe against Parliament and destroying Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

• (2040)

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Perrault: Senator Murray says that technically he is correct. But his actions in relation to the joint committee fly in the face of the traditions of Parliament and the practices which Parliament has established.

Senator Flynn: Stop making a fool of yourself.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I have a point of order, and it is this: If the Leader of the Opposition insists on making himself look foolish, in the interests of good conduct—

Senator Perrault: You said “Leader of the Opposition”!

Senator Smith: —and order in this house, we should prevent him from doing so.

Senator Perrault: You said “Leader of the Opposition”.

Senator Smith: You do not have to prove yourself foolish every day.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I say a few words of explanation on the question as to whether or not the opposition needs to be guarded. When our committee met at its organization meeting, one of those present was Mr. Nielsen, who proposed a motion that we could not meet without representatives of both parties being present.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: I pointed out that our committee had acted in a non-partisan fashion for seven or eight years, that partisan politics had never entered into our deliberations, and that in view of that fact I did not consider that we should have that as one of our requirements. Mr. Nielsen was overruled, and we have been going along quite happily for seven or eight years with only the requirement that a senator and a member of the House of Commons be present for a quorum, and it has worked out fine.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, if we were to follow Senator Murray's version of how to proceed with the committees, I am sure the House of Commons could take the vote right now and solve the matter.

Senator Flynn: That's none of your business.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

1982-83 CROP YEAR—INITIAL PAYMENT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, of which I have given him advance notice. As he is probably aware, this is the time of year when the minister usually makes his pre-seeding recommendation to the prairie farmers. Until last year he announced his initial price for the coming crop year. As it is important for farmers, particularly those in the area I come from, to know what the initial payments will be before they start seeding, will the minister indicate to the house his plans in regard to this matter?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his question. I will give a little background information. It is true that last year's announcement of the 1981-82 initial prices in July marked a departure from the practice of the last decade. Two years ago I announced the 1980-81 initial prices in March, as usual. Farmers complained that they were too low, but they did reflect world market conditions at that time.

World prices improved by July and I was able to announce an increase in the 1980-81 initial price. Prices continued to climb and I was able to announce a further increase in 1980-81 initial prices and make an adjustment payment.

World prices then dropped. So rather than announce no initial payments for 1981-82 last March that would not necessarily reflect market conditions that would prevail in August, I decided to delay announcing initial payments until July.

Although the initial price for No. 1 CW Red Spring Wheat was 50 cents higher than August 1, 1980, it constituted a reduction from the 1980-81 adjusted initial price by some 60 cents per bushel. Again farmers complained that it was too low, but again it reflected world market conditions.

My annual pre-seeding report, which suggests how many acres should be seeded to various crops, is in the final stages of preparation and should be available for release at an early date.

Farmers and farm organizations have made it clear that they consider initial payments an important guide when making their seeding plans. Therefore, I have decided to accept their advice and I have placed before cabinet recommendations for initial prices for the 1982-83 crop year. I am hopeful that a decision will be reached in time to make the announcement before the end of this month. This announcement will be accompanied by the details of the pre-seeding recommendations.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, why does the minister not have courage enough to make a ministerial statement, instead of arranging to plant a question with a colleague?

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Smith: The minister should feel ashamed.

Senator Argue: I believe my courage in this place compares favourably with that of the honourable senator, so I do not consider that that kind of innuendo is necessary. In any event, Senator Guay gave me notice of his question. It is not an announcement of policy because the policy has not yet been formulated. I am not yet able to announce it. It is a statement that I have submitted recommendations to cabinet.

Surely, the purpose of the Senate is to raise questions and to receive answers. I consider the question a good one. I believe that producers in western Canada are interested in the question and answer, and in view of the shenanigans which have gone on during the last half hour or so, I believe the question and my reply compare quite favourably.

Senator Smith: If the minister feels so confident of his courage, then I do not challenge it; but I am asking why he does not make it a ministerial statement so that it can be dealt with as such.

Senator Guay: Order!

Senator Smith: Order? What is the honourable senator talking about? He heard the nonsense that was going on over here a while ago. Why is he calling, "Order"?

Senator Guay: On a point of order, if Senator Smith will look up the record of our proceedings for last year, he will find that I asked a similar question last year. It was my intention to do so again this year, and the record will speak for itself. I don't appreciate the honourable senator's comments.

Senator Smith: That makes two of us.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You don't have to get excited about nothing, Senator Guay.

UNITED NATIONS

OUTER SPACE TREATY—CANADIAN INITIATIVE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask what I believe is an appropriate question dealing with disarmament.

Hon. G. I. Smith: You are right.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Détente.

Senator Thompson: As background for my question to the Leader of the Government, Canada was involved in the original move for the 1967 Outer Space Treaty. Honourable senators may recall that Senator Bonnell, on his return from a NATO conference, reported that there was dissatisfaction with the treaty and that it required more teeth.

My first question is: What initiative has the Canadian government taken to give this Outer Space Treaty more teeth?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

INTERNATIONAL SATELLITE MONITORING AGENCY— CANADIAN INITIATIVE

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have another question concerning the International Satellite Monitoring Agency. The United Nations issued a report last year about such an agency. What initiative is being taken by Canada with respect to that report?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question also will be taken as notice. I do not have any information on the specific point this evening.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—ANNUAL SEAL HUNT—DYE SPRAYING OF SEALS BY PROTESTERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, which he will probably have to take as notice. There is an intent on the part of the Greenpeace organization to interfere with the current seal hunt off the Magdalen Islands, to the extent that the crew of the Greenpeace vessel have threatened to spray the coats of the seals with green dye.

Two years ago the Food and Drug Directorate indicated that the green dye could interfere with the relationship between the mother and baby seal. If the Greenpeace Organization is so humane, why does it intend to use this dye when it knows that it will cause harm to the seals? Indeed, if the green dye is used in increasing proportions, it could do more than damage the coats. It will have a detrimental effect on the baby seals. If the organization is so humane, why is it doing that?

• (2050)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know whether any information is available from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on the possible deleterious effects of dyes on the seals and seal pelts. However, that information will be sought. In the meantime Senator Marshall may want to contact the Greenpeace organization. Perhaps they would provide an explanation for him.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I think it would be dangerous if I contacted them.

I wonder if the evidence is in the files of the food and drug section of the Department of National Health and Welfare. In any event, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask for a copy of that letter, even if it is two years old? Could he also ask if there is any new evidence on the green dye that the Greenpeace organization might be using, or will use, and whether the department can provide a sample of it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when the information is made available it will be brought to the Senate.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That is no answer.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to Senator Nurgitz's question about freedom of information legislation and the status of negotiations with the provinces, I can say that consultations with the provincial attorneys general have recently taken place. The government is now re-examining certain aspects of the legislation in light of the representations made by the provinces on the subject.

Senator Godfrey inquired whether the government and its officials will act as if the freedom of information legislation has been passed. I have made inquiries on this point and can report that the policy announced by the Prime Minister has not been countermanded or nullified. However, it is certainly difficult to give a definitive answer on this point since certain aspects of the legislation are being re-examined. Obviously, we may end up with slightly different provisions in the bill when it comes before Parliament again.

Senator Nurgitz asked whether the government would separate the protection of individual privacy provisions from the freedom of information legislation and introduce them in a separate bill. Honourable senators, the government views Bill C-43 as a whole, including the provisions protecting individual privacy. Also, certain aspects pertaining to privacy are also being re-examined consequent to representations made by the provinces.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE STATUS DETERMINATION PROCESS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Haidasz on February 11, 1982, as reported at page 3608 of Senate Hansard, regarding the refugee status determination process. Honourable senators, the answer is a rather long document. I am prepared to have it printed in the record of today's proceedings, if honourable senators agree, and then perhaps other questions can be asked.

[Senator Marshall.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In reply to the first question of the honourable senator, I would like to inform him that the refugee status determination process was reviewed by a Task Force on Immigration Practices and Procedures appointed in September 1980, and their report was released in November 1981. Three positive steps were taken at that time.

(1) The number of private members appointed to the Refugee Status Advisory Committee was increased from four to seven.

(2) The pamphlet "Claiming Refugee Status in Canada", which has been prepared jointly by the CEIC and the UNHCR, was revised and given wider distribution.

(3) Committee members were advised that in all cases of tie votes, recommendations were to be made in favour of the claimants.

(4) A commitment was made to hold a symposium in late February to discuss the report.

The symposium was held in Toronto on February 20 and 21, 1982, and new guidelines were announced for the Refugee Status Advisory Committee dealing with both the criteria for determination and the assessment of credibility.

Henceforth, the committee is to be governed in its deliberations by two overriding presumptions. First, the applicant is presumed to be telling the truth unless there is clear evidence to the contrary; and secondly, the benefit of the doubt must always be resolved in favour of the applicant. This pertains both to the application of the criteria as well as to the assessment of credibility.

When the current Immigration Act was being considered in a parliamentary committee, refugee determination was discussed in the context of removal procedures. This fact has given rise to the perception by some that a refugee claim is simply a device to beat the Immigration Act.

Changing this attitude is even more important than clarifying each and every aspect of the definition or of credibility. There are, to be sure, important issues that demand clarification. For example, the RSAC was instructed that an individual need not be singled out for persecution to be a convention refugee, that highly visible political activity is not a prerequisite for refugee determination; that a person may be a refugee even if there is no evidence of past persecution but there are reasonable grounds to fear persecution in future; or that the possession of a valid passport is not a basis for rejecting a refugee claim.

Guidelines to assist in the assessment of credibility are equally important. By issuing these new guidelines, it is hoped that, together with the explanatory material set forth in the UNHCR'S handbook on procedures and criteria for determining refugee status, they will assist committee members in meeting both the legal requirements of the legislation and the "spirit" of Canada's international commitment to refugees.

Other changes were also announced dealing with the composition, the structure and the operational procedures of the RSAC. First of all, the RSAC is to be made independent of the Immigration Commission. It will have its own resources sufficient to allow five panels to operate weekly. This will cut down on the long period of uncertainty and anxiety faced by claimants. Also announced was an increase in the number of private members from seven to ten and that the RSAC will make appointments to ensure regional representation. In this context, the minister will also be reviewing all the existing appointments.

The Minister also intends to appoint immigration or external affairs officers who are to serve on the committee. In the future, departmental appointees will be required to serve full time and be free of departmental responsibilities during the term of their appointment.

The secretariat of the RSAC will be substantially increased and positions will be established at a sufficiently high level to attract and retain the quality of individuals who can carry out this extremely important and demanding work. The minister is particularly anxious to immediately enhance the research capability of the committee so that the fullest and most current documentation on conditions in refugee producing countries is made available to members of the RSAC. This would include information from human rights groups such as Amnesty International and from church groups and other agencies and individuals. The Minister also feels that the RSAC secretariat, like the committee itself, would benefit from the recruitment of some individuals from outside the government.

In reply to the question as to whether the Immigration Appeal Board will be expanded to include a special refugee panel, this also was discussed at the national symposium and is now under review. That was one of the recommendations made by the Task Force on Immigration Practices and Procedures in its November 1981 report.

THE SENATE

SEATING PLAN—REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN BROCHURE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is by way of a final answer to a question asked by Senator Godfrey on the matter of the seating plan. It will be remembered that there was a discussion on the form this should take. I put an answer on the record in relation to this matter previously, and tonight we have that plan realized. I think it is a great improvement, and I assure honourable senators that by next week, when it is reproduced by the offset process, it will look even more handsome.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES—GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATOR—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin asked me some questions regarding the terms of reference for Dr. Clay Gilson's negotiations with regard to freight rates on grain. I was subsequently able to provide some information to Senator Roblin, but I believe I now have the complete answer, in that Dr. Gilson's terms of reference have been released by the Minister of Transport today. I have them in my hand. If it is agreeable to the Senate I would ask that they be printed in today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The terms of reference follow:)

The responsibility of the federal representative on western rail transportation, Dr. Clay Gilson, will be to identify and enhance the consensus among agricultural organizations on a number of issues related to the transportation of grain and to propose to the government specific measures which in his judgment will most effectively achieve the objectives contained in the Government of Canada's policy statement on western rail transportation. He should do this through intensive consultation with the major agricultural organizations in western Canada and the railways. More specifically, he should address with them the subjects listed in the policy statement requiring discussion, together with such other subjects he might consider appropriate.

In developing the consensus, the federal representative must have due regard for the financial limits contained in the government's statement, especially the total of $3.2 billion the government is prepared to commit to the western railway system over the next four years, of which about $440 million has been committed for branch line rehabilitation and the cost of existing hopper cars. Some of the funds will also be required to procure additional hopper cars. The residual will be the total amount of funds the government is prepared to make available as its share of meeting the cost of transporting grain over the fiscal years 1982-83 to 1985-86 inclusive.

The federal representative shall determine the appropriate procedure for the consultative process in order to accomplish the objectives outlined above.

The Minister of Transport will assume primary responsibility for consultation with the provincial governments concerning subjects related to western rail capacity. The federal representative may at his discretion seek information or advice from provincial officials.

He will advise the Minister of Transport on the progress of the consultations on a regular basis and will seek ministerial approval on those subjects which might require it during the consultative process.

At the conclusion of the consultative process, the federal representative will report to the Minister of Transport on the results of his consultations and make recommendations relating thereto.

The federal representative will also be available to provide the Minister of Transport and other ministers with advice on implementation of the western rail transportation policy including advice on required legislative measures.

The federal representative will be based in Winnipeg and will be provided with an office and support services to be funded out of an overall budget for his office. All salaries and expenses, with the exception of those of federal government employees will also be funded from this budget.

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government has an answer to Question No. 59 on the Order Paper, which will become a year old in a few days. This question has to do with the order of precedence, and considerations of protocol, being destroyed on Parliament Hill. I think the answer should be available by now, unless the government is embarrassed lest the answer proves that a destruction of the order of precedence and consideration of senators is, in fact, taking place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret the delay in supplying an answer to this question, and I thank Senator Marshall for reminding me of the matter.

THE ESTIMATES

DISTRIBUTION TO SENATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us whether he has any information on the tabling of the estimates, referred to by me on February 24 last, and also whether he can give us the reason why the Senate is always the last to receive them. The leader said he would make an investigation as to why they were so late in arriving.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the investigation has not yet been completed.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Has it been started?

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER DISCHARGED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act".—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last week, when this order was called, Senator Macquarrie asked that we try to have some final answer for him this week, in order to avoid his having to continually ask the Senate to stand it. I undertook to do this.

Honourable senators will recall that Senator Macquarrie's reason for requesting an explanation was the problem created by the fact that the bill, being a private member's bill, stands in the name of Senator Austin, who is now a minister of the Crown.

Senator Austin is here and will speak to the matter. I just want to advise honourable senators that I had a little research done on the procedural framework for dealing with this motion and this bill.

There are three possibilities on the basis of precedents. There is precedent for a motion by a senator that his name be substituted for that of Senator Austin as sponsor of Bill S-11. I should point out that all of the precedents I could find supporting that procedure involved situations in which the sponsor had either been defeated or unseated, or had died, or something of that kind, which does not seem to be perfectly applicable in this case.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Well, from the head up, at least.

Senator Frith: A second possibility is that a motion could be made to discharge the order for the second reading of Bill S-11, and to withdraw the bill. Another senator could then present a bill exactly the same as Bill S-11, if so advised. There is a recent Commons precedent, dated January 1981, supporting that procedure.

A third possibility would be to leave the order standing on the Order Paper until the end of the session. I understand that many senators do not feel that this is a good alternative, and I do not think it is either, so it seems to me, and I think Senator Austin agrees, that the second option is the most desirable. I recommend it to Senator Austin. Of course, he will require leave to have the order discharged and to withdraw the bill.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Senate for leave to remove Bill S-11 from the Order Paper. As I have become a minister of the Crown, I understand that it is not possible for that bill to remain a private senator's bill.

The principle of the bill is a most important one in my part of Canada, and in asking leave to withdraw the bill, which has been supported by senators on the other side of this chamber as well as on this side, I would like to say that I am pressing, and am pressing with optimism, for the introduction of a bill constructed on similar principles by the government itself.

With that, honourable senators, I ask leave to withdraw Bill S-11 from the Order Paper?

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I may say that I can hardly take exception to that proposal, since I pointed out about 11 weeks ago that something had to be done about this bill. I might say to my friend across the way that there is no use having good advisers around if no one is smart enough to take their advice. Justice delayed is not as desirable as justice promptly executed, but I do appreciate that a correction has been made.

● (2100)

Of course, it could not be a private member's bill of the Senate if a minister moved it. I had hoped, in the interval that I have been waiting, that Senator Austin would have received the support of his cabinet colleagues and that this, in fact, would have emerged as a government bill. It deals with a very important matter, one which I think has the support not only of the Senate but of the people of this country. To that extent, then, I will forego delivery of the great speech with which I am pregnant—

Hon. C. William Doody: No, no!

Senator Macquarrie: —hopefully to say a word another day.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

MEETING OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, by way of further information on the point of order raised previously regarding the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, I think I can give you what might be called good news and bad news.

A question was raised as to whether Senator Murray needs the authority of the Senate to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow. The good news is that the terms of reference provide:

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

For the benefit of honourable senators, the reference appears at page 137 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate dated May 27, 1980. Therein it is provided:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1978, tabled in the Senate on February 20, 1979, and the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages, 1979, tabled in the Senate on April 22, 1980;

That six Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of its powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to retain professional, clerical and stenographic help as may be required;

That the quorum of the Committee be four members— Obviously, from what Senator Murray said, there were four members present and, therefore, there was a quorum.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Senator Frith:

That the quorum of the Committee be four members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented—

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, here is the bad news:

—and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when three members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons—

Senator Flynn: Finish the sentence. It says that to hear witnesses only three members are needed. Your interpretation is incorrect when you say that both chairmen are needed to decide; it says there that only three members of the committee are required to hear witnesses. Four members are required to make decisions and three members are required to hear witnesses. Finish the sentence.

Senator Frith: I will finish the sentence. Before I do, I want to say that I did not make an interpretation. I was reading from the Minutes. I did not interpret a single thing. I will read it again:

That the quorum of the Committee—

I am not interpreting; these are the words.

That the quorum of the Committee be four members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when three members are present so long as both Houses are represented;

Honourable senators, it says right here that “the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings,”—

Senator Flynn: No, no, no. You are mixing it all up again.

Senator Frith: No, I am not. I am reading exactly what it says.

Senator Flynn: I just read it a moment ago.

Senator Frith: I am reading what it says; I am not interpreting. I suggest that there is no need to read it again. I have already read it twice. Honourable senators, I have not made an interpretation. The words in the order are what I read, not what I interpreted.

Senator Flynn: It is quite clear from the wording of that resolution—

Senator Frith: —that you are wrong!

Senator Flynn: —that only three members need be present to hear witnesses. It is only when a decision is taken—

Senator Frith: Nobody is disagreeing with that.

Senator Flynn: No, but you did not read that on the first occasion.

Senator Frith: Of course I did.

Senator Flynn: Three members must be present in order to hear a witness. If somebody from the other house wants to be present at the committee meeting, if he does not want to go and vote, he can attend. The two joint chairmen do not need to be there.

Senator Frith: According to the order, “the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings,”.

Senator Flynn: Either of them.

Senator Frith: It says “joint chairmen”—plural.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): “Chairmen”—right.

Senator Flynn: That is your interpretation. You are wrong and you know it.

Hon. C. William Doody: A most disorderly meeting! I am shocked. We never had anything like this in Newfoundland.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.
